

San A. Hinduism Library

0 1976 0012775 1

387

V.03

Ja

WITHDRAWN

Digitized by the Internet Archive
in 2025

CONSTITUTIONAL HISTORY OF ENGLAND

STUBBS

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS

AMEN HOUSE, E.C. 4

LONDON EDINBURGH GLASGOW

LEIPZIG NEW YORK TORONTO

MELBOURNE CAPE TOWN BOMBAY

CALCUTTA MADRAS SHANGHAI

HUMPHREY MILFORD

PUBLISHER TO THE UNIVERSITY

THE CONSTITUTIONAL HISTORY OF ENGLAND

IN ITS ORIGIN AND DEVELOPMENT

BY

WILLIAM STUBBS, D.D., HON. LL.D.

BISHOP OF OXFORD

VOL. III

FIFTH EDITION

OXFORD

AT THE CLARENDON PRESS

Lenoir Rhyme College LIBRARY

Impression of 1929

First edition, 1878

Fifth edition, 1898

Printed in Great Britain

CONTENTS.

CHAPTER XVIII.

LANCASTER AND YORK.

299. Character of the period, p. 2. 300. Plan of the chapter, p. 5.
301. The Revolution of 1399, p. 6. 302. Formal recognition of the new Dynasty, p. 10. 303. Parliament of 1399, p. 15. 304.
Conspiracy of the Earls, p. 26. 305. Beginning of difficulties, p. 27. 306. Parliament of 1401, p. 29. 307. Financial and political difficulties, p. 35. 308. Parliament of 1402, p. 37. 309.
Rebellion of Hotspur, p. 39. 310. Parliament of 1404, p. 42. 311.
The Unlearned Parliament, p. 47. 312. Rebellion of Northumberland, p. 49. 313. The Long Parliament of 1406, p. 54. 314.
Parties formed at Court, p. 59. 315. Parliament at Gloucester, 1407, p. 61. 316. Arundel's administration, p. 63. 317. Parliament of 1410, p. 65. 318. Administration of Thomas Beaufort, p. 67. 319. Parliament of 1411, p. 68. 320. Death of Henry IV, p. 71. 321. Character of Henry V, p. 74. 322. Change of ministers, p. 78. 323. Parliament of 1413, p. 79. 324. Sir John Oldcastle, p. 80. 325. Parliaments of 1414, p. 83. 326. War with France, p. 88. 327. The remaining Parliaments of the reign, p. 89. 328. The King's last expedition and death, p. 94. 329.
Bedford and Gloucester, p. 96. 330. Arrangement for the minority of Henry VI, p. 99. 331. Impolitic conduct of Gloucester, p. 101.
332. Quarrel with Bishop Beaufort, p. 104. 333. Visit of Bedford, p. 105. 334. Gloucester's attempt to govern, p. 109. 335. Renewed attack on the Cardinal, p. 113. 336. Henry's visit to France and change of ministers, p. 115. 337. Continuation of the quarrel, p. 117. 338. Bedford's second visit, p. 119. 339.
State of the government after Bedford's death, p. 124. 340.
Approaching end of the war, p. 128. 341. Character of Henry VI, p. 132. 342. The king's marriage, p. 135. 343. Death of Gloucester and Beaufort, p. 139. 344. Administration of Suffolk, p. 144.

345. Fall of Suffolk, p. 149. 346. Cade's rebellion, p. 155. 347. Struggle of Somerset and York, p. 157. 348. First rising of the Yorkists, p. 165. 349. First regency of the Duke of York, p. 168. 350. Results of the battle of St. Alban's, p. 175. 351. Second regency of York, p. 177. 352. Sole rule of Henry and Margaret, p. 180. 353. The war of Lancaster and York, p. 182. 354. The claim of York to the crown, p. 190. 355. Accession of Edward IV, p. 193. 356. Edward's first Parliaments, p. 200. 357. The close of the struggle, p. 203. 358. The struggle of the Nevilles, p. 206. 359. Edward's supremacy, p. 219. 360. Reign of Edward V, p. 226. 361. Richard III, p. 231. 362. Fall of Richard, p. 239. 363. The claim of the house of Lancaster to the name of Constitutional Rulers, p. 240. 364. Parliamentary theory under Lancaster, p. 243. 365. Fortescue's scheme of government, p. 247. 366. Practical illustration of constitutional working, p. 253. 367. The council, p. 254. 368. The elections to the House of Commons, p. 262. 369. Freedom of debate in the House of Commons, p. 266. 370. Money grants, p. 270. 371. Interference with the Royal household, p. 271. 372. Want of governance, p. 275. 373. Case for and against the House of York as rulers, p. 280.

CHAPTER XIX.

THE CLERGY, THE KING, AND THE POPE.

374. Problem of Church and State, p. 295. 375. Plan of the chapter, p. 297. 376. The clerical estate or spirituality, p. 298. 377. Relations between the Pope and the Crown, p. 299. 378. APPOINTMENT OF BISHOPS, p. 303. 379. The pall, p. 305. 380. Legations, p. 306. 381. Papal interference in election of bishops, p. 310. 382. Elections in the thirteenth century, p. 313. 383. The pope's claim to confer the temporalities, p. 315. 384. Papal provisions, p. 319. 385. Legislation on provisions, p. 324. 386. The compromise on elections, p. 326. 387. Elections to abbacies, p. 329. 388. The ecclesiastical assemblies, p. 330. 389. ECCLESIASTICAL LEGISLATION; for the clergy by the clergy, p. 332. 390. By the clergy for the laity, p. 335. 391. By parliament for the clergy, p. 337. 392. Statute of provisors, p. 338. 393. Statute of præmunire, p. 341. 394. Legislation in parliament for the national church, p. 343. 395. ECCLESIASTICAL TAXATION; by the pope, p. 346. 396. Taxation by convocation, p. 349. 397. Attempt in Parliament to tax the clergy, p. 351. 398. Of the clergy to tax the laity, p. 352. 399. ECCLESIASTICAL JUDICATURE ; of the king's courts over the clergy, p. 352. 400. Of the court Christian ; in temporal matters, p. 356. 401. In disciplinary cases, p. 357. 402. Over ecclesiastics, p. 359. 403. Appeals to Rome, p. 360. 404. Legislation against heresy, p. 365. 405. Social importance of the clergy, p. 378. 406. Intellectual and moral influence of the clergy, p. 382.

CHAPTER XX.

PARLIAMENTARY ANTIQUITIES.

407. Parliamentary usages, definite or obscure, p. 388. 408. Plan of the chapter, p. 390. 409. Choice of the day for Parliament, p. 390. 410. Annual Parliaments, p. 393. 411. Length of notice before holding Parliament, p. 394. 412. Choice of the place of session, p. 395. 413. The Palace of Westminster, p. 396. 414. Parliaments out of London, p. 399. 415. Share of the council in calling a parliament, p. 401. 416. Issue and form of writs, p. 403. 417. Writs of summons to the Lords, p. 404. 418. Writs of the justices, p. 408. 419. Writs to the Sheriffs for elections, p. 410. 420. County elections, p. 417. 421. Return on indenture, p. 421. 422. Borough elections, p. 427. 423. Contested and disputed elections, p. 435. 424. Manucaption and expenses, p. 439. 425. Meeting of parliament and opening of the session, p. 440. 426. Separation of the houses, p. 444. 427. House of Lords, p. 446. 428. Ranks of the peerage, p. 448. 429. Number of lords temporal, p. 457. 430. Number of lords spiritual, p. 458. 431. Justices in the House of Lords, p. 461. 432. Clerical proctors, p. 462. 433. Numbers and distribution of seats in the House of Commons, p. 463. 434. Clerks, p. 468. 435. The Speaker of the Commons, p. 470. 436. Business laid before the houses by the king, p. 473. 437. Supply and account, p. 475. 438. Form of the grant, p. 476. 439. Proceeding in legislation, p. 477. 440. The Common petitions, p. 478. 441. Form of statutes, p. 481. 442. Details of procedure, p. 484. 443. Sir Thomas Smith's description of a session, p. 484. 444. Judicial power of the Lords, p. 494. 445. Prorogation, p. 498. 446. Dissolution, p. 499. 447. Writ of expenses, p. 501. 448. Distinctions of right and privilege, p. 503. 449. Proxies of the Lords, p. 505. 450. Right of protest, p. 507. 451. Freedom of debate, p. 507. 452. Freedom from arrest, p. 512. 453. Privileges of peerage, p. 516.

CHAPTER XXI.

SOCIAL AND POLITICAL INFLUENCES AT THE CLOSE OF THE MIDDLE AGES.

454. Plan of the chapter, p. 518. 455. Variations of the political balance throughout English History, p. 520. 456. THE KINGS: popular regard for the Plantagenets, p. 525. 457. Growth of loyalty, p. 526. 458. Doctrine of legitimism, p. 528. 459. Material and legal securities, p. 528. 460. Extent of the royal estates, p. 529. 461. Religious duty of obedience, p. 531. 462. Fealty, homage, and allegiance, p. 532. 463. Law of Treason, p. 535. 464. THE CLERGY, p. 539. 465. Weakness of their spiritual position, p. 542. 466. Weakness of their temporal position, p. 543. 467. THE BARONAGE: their wealth and extent of property, p. 543. 468. Their territorial distribution, p. 546. 469. Class distinctions, p. 548. 470. Livery and maintenance, p. 549. 471. Heraldic distinctions, p. 552. 472. Fortified houses and parks, p. 555. 473. Great households, p. 557. 474. Service by indenture, p. 558. 475. Good and evil results of baronial leadership, p. 560. 476. Baronial position of the bishops, p. 561. 477. THE KNIGHTS AND SQUIRES, p. 563. 478. Their relation to the barons, p. 567. 479. Independent attitude of the knights in parliament, p. 568. 480. THE YEOMANRY, p. 570. 481. Expenditure of the squire and tenant farmer, p. 573. 482. The valetti in parliament, p. 574. 483. The yeomen electors, p. 575. 484. THE BOROUGHs, p. 577. 485. The merchant guild and its developments, p. 579. 486. Constitution of London, p. 587. 487. Importance and growth of Companies, p. 591. 488. Other municipalities, p. 597. 489. Politics in the boroughs, and of their representatives, p. 608. 490. Political capabilities of country and town, merchant, tradesman, and artificer, p. 611. 491. The life of the burgher, p. 614. 492. Connexion with the country and with other classes, p. 616. 493. Artisans and labourers, p. 617. 494. The poor, p. 619. 495. The villeins, p. 623. 496. The chance of rising in the world. Education, p. 626. 497. Class antagonisms, p. 629. 498. Concluding reflexions. National character, p. 632. 499. Transition, p. 634. 500. Some lessons of history, p. 636.

CHAPTER XVIII.

LANCASTER AND YORK.

299. Character of the period.—300. Plan of the Chapter.—301. The Revolution of 1399.—302. Formal recognition of the new Dynasty.—303. Parliament of 1399.—304. Conspiracy of the Earls.—305. Beginning of difficulties.—306. Parliament of 1401.—307. Financial and political difficulties.—308. Parliament of 1402.—309. Rebellion of Hotspur.—310. Parliament of 1404.—311. The unlearned Parliament.—312. Rebellion of Northumberland.—313. The long Parliament of 1406.—314. Parties formed at court.—315. Parliament at Gloucester, 1407.—316. Arundel's administration.—317. Parliament of 1410.—318. Administration of Thomas Beaufort.—319. Parliament of 1411.—320. Death of Henry IV.—321. Character of Henry V.—322. Change of ministers.—323. Parliament of 1413.—324. Sir John Oldcastle.—325. Parliaments of 1414.—326. War with France.—327. The remaining Parliaments of the reign.—328. The King's last expedition and death.—329. Bedford and Gloucester.—330. Arrangement for the minority of Henry VI.—331. Impolitic conduct of Gloucester.—332. Quarrel with Bishop Beaufort.—333. Visit of Bedford.—334. Gloucester's attempt to govern.—335. Renewed attack on the Cardinal.—336. Henry's visit to France and change of ministers.—337. Continuation of the quarrel.—338. Bedford's second visit.—339. State of the government after Bedford's death.—340. Approaching end of the war.—341. Character of Henry VI.—342. The king's marriage.—343. Death of Gloucester and Beaufort.—344. Administration of Suffolk.—345. Fall of Suffolk.—346. Cade's rebellion.—347. Struggle of Somerset and York.—348. First rising of the Yorkists.—349. First regency of the Duke of York.—350. Results of the battle of S. Alban's.—351. Second regency of York.—352. Sole rule of Henry and Margaret.—353. The war of Lancaster and York.—354. The claim of York to the crown.—355. Accession of Edward IV.—356. Edward's first Parliaments.—357. The close of the struggle.—358. The struggle of the Nevilles.—359. Edward's supremacy.—360. Reign of Edward V.—361. Richard III.—362. Fall of Richard.—363. The claim of the house of Lancaster to the name of Constitutional Rulers.—364. Parliamentary theory under Lancaster.—365. Fortescue's scheme of government.—366. Practical illustration of constitutional working.—367. The Council.—368. Elections to the House of Commons.—369. Freedom of debate in the House of Commons.—370. Money grants.—371. Interference with the Royal Household.—372. Want of governance.—373. Case for and against the House of York as rulers.

the fifteenth century not period of constitutional development.

299. If the only object of Constitutional History were the investigation of the origin and powers of Parliament, the study of the subject might be suspended at the deposition of Richard II, to be resumed under the Tudors. During a good portion of the intervening period the history of England contains little else than the details of foreign wars and domestic struggles, in which parliamentary institutions play no prominent part; and, upon a superficial view, their continued existence may seem to be a result of their insignificance among the ruder expedients of arms, the more stormy and spontaneous forces of personal, political, and religious passion. Yet the parliament has a history of its own throughout the period of turmoil. It does not indeed develope any new powers, or invent any new mechanism; its special history is either a monotonous detail of formal proceedings, or a record of asserted privilege. Under the monotonous detail there is going on a process of hardening and sharpening, a second almost imperceptible stage of definition, which, when new life is infused into the mechanism, will have no small effect in determining the ways in which that new life will work. In the record of asserted privilege may be traced the flashes of a consciousness that show the forms of national action to be no mere forms, and illustrate the continuity of a sense of earlier greatness and of an instinctive looking towards a greater destiny. And this is nearly all. The parliamentary constitution lives through the epoch, but its machinery and its functions do not much expand; the weapons which are used by the politicians of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries are taken, with little attempt at improvement or adaptation, from the armoury of the fourteenth. The intervening age has rather conserved than multiplied them or extended their usefulness.

Yet the interval witnessed a series of changes in national life, mind, and character, in the relations of classes, and in the balance of political forces, far greater than the English race has gone through since the Norman conquest, greater in some respects than it has experienced since it became a consolidated, Christian nation. Of these changes the Reformation, with its attendant measures, was the greatest; but there were others which led to and resulted from the religious change. Such was that recovered strength of the monarchic principle, which, in England as on the Continent, marked the opening of a new era, and which, although in England it resulted from causes peculiar to England, from the exhaustion of all energies except those of the crown, whilst abroad it resulted from the concentration of great territorial possessions in the hands of a few great kings, seemed almost a necessary antecedent to the new conformation of European politics, and to the share which England was to take in them. Such again was the liberation of internal forces, political as well as religious, which followed the disruption of ecclesiastical unity, and which is perhaps the most important of all the phenomena which distinguish modern from medieval history. Such was the transformation of the baronage of early England into the nobility of later times, a transformation attended by changes in personal and political relations which make it more difficult to trace the identity of the peerage than the continuous life of clergy or commons. The altered position of the church, apart from Reformation influences, is another mark of a new period; the estate of the clergy, deprived of the help of the older baronage, which is now almost extinguished, and set in antagonism to the new nobility that is founded upon the spoils of the church, tends ever more and more to lean upon the royal power, which tends ever more and more to use the church for its own ends, and to weaken the hold of the church upon the commons, whenever the interests of the commons and of the crown are seen to be in opposition. Partly parallel to these, partly resulting from them, partly also arising from a fresh impulse of its own liberated and directed by these causes, is the changed position

Vast historical importance of the period of transition.

Change in the position of the Commons.

of the commons: the third estate now crushed, now flattered; now consolidated, now divided; now encouraged, now repressed; but escaping the internecine enmities that destroy the baronage, learning wisdom by their mistakes and gaining freedom when it is rid of their leadership; rising by its own growing strength from the prostration in which it has lain, with the other two estates, at the feet of the Tudors, all the stronger because it has itself only to rely upon and has springs of independence in itself, which are not in either clergy or baronage;—the estate of the commons is prepared to enter on the inheritance, towards which the two elder estates have led it on. The crisis to which these changes tend is to determine in that struggle between the crown and the commons which the last two centuries have decided.

Workings of modern life in the fifteenth century.

The causes which worked these changes begin from the opening of the sixteenth century to display themselves upon a lighter and broader stage, in more direct and evident connexion with their greater results. But they had been working long and deeply in the fifteenth century; and our task, one object of which is to trace the continuity of national life through this age of obscurity and disturbance, necessarily includes some examination into their action, into the relations of church and state, of the crown and the three estates, the balance of forces in the corporate body, and the growth in the several estates by which that balance was made to vary without breaking up the unity or destroying the identity of the whole. Having traced this working up to the time at which the new struggles of constitutional life begin, the point at which modern and medieval history seem to divide, we shall have accomplished, or done our best to accomplish, the promise of our title, and have told the origin and development of the Constitutional History of England.

Plan of the chapter.

Parliamentary institutions during the fourteenth century are the main if not the sole subject of Constitutional History. From this point, at which parliamentary institutions seem to have, to a great extent, moulded themselves, and parliamentary ideas have ripened, we shall have to recur to our earlier plan, and endeavour to trace more generally the workings of national life that gave substance and reality to those forms, that lay quiet under them when they seemed to be dormant, and that fought in them when the time came for it to arise and go down to the battle.

300. The object of the present chapter will be to trace the history of internal politics in England from the accession of Henry IV to the fall of Richard III : not that the period possesses a distinct political plot corresponding with its drama of dynastic history, but that from its close begins the more prominent action of the new influences that colour later history. A more distinct political plot, a more definite constitutional period, would be found by extending the scope of the chapter to the beginning of the assumed dictatorship of Henry VIII. But to attempt that would be to trench upon the domain of later history, which must be written or read from a new standing-point. The battle of Bosworth field is the last act of a long tragedy or series of tragedies, a trilogy of unequal interest and varied proportions, the unity of which lies in the struggle of the great houses for the crown. The embers of the strife are not indeed extinguished then, but they survive only in the region of personal enmities and political cruelties. The strife of York and Lancaster is then allayed ; the particular forces that have roused the national energies have exhausted themselves. From that point new agencies begin to work, the origin of which we may trace, but the growth and mature action of which must be left to other hands.

The history of the three Lancastrian reigns has a double interest ; it contains not only the foundation, consolidation, and destruction of a fabric of dynastic power, but, parallel with it, the trial and failure of a great constitutional experiment ; a premature testing of the strength of the parliamentary system. The system does not indeed break under the strain, but it bends and warps so as to show itself unequal to the burden ; and, instead of arbitrating between the other forces of the time, the parliamentary constitution finds itself either

Plot of the History.

Importance
of the Lancastrian
period.

superseded altogether, or reduced to the position of a mere engine which those forces can manipulate at will. The sounder and stronger elements of English life seem to be exhausted, and the dangerous forces avail themselves of all weapons with equal disregard to the result. It is strange that the machinery of state suffers after all so little. But it is useless to anticipate now the inferences that will repeat themselves at every stage of the story.

Good auguries for the constitution at the accession of Henry IV.

301. Although, as we have seen, the deposition of Richard II and the accession of Henry IV were not the pure and legitimate result of a series of constitutional workings, there were many reasons for regarding the revolution of which they were a part as only slightly premature; the constitutional forces appeared ripe, although the particular occasion of their exertion was to a certain extent accidental, and to a certain extent the result of private rather than public causes¹. Richard's tyranny deserved deposition had there been no Henry to revenge a private wrong; Henry's qualifications for sovereign power were adequate, even if he had not had a great injury to avenge, and a great cause to defend. The experiment of governing England constitutionally seemed likely to be fairly tried. Henry could not, without discarding all the principles that he had ever professed, even attempt to rule as Richard II and Edward III had ruled. He had great personal advantages; if he was not spontaneously chosen by the nation, he was enthusiastically welcomed by them; he was in the closest alliance with the clergy; and of the greater baronage there

¹ 'kynge Henry was admytte Unto the croune of Englande, that did amounte
Not for desert nor yet for any witte,
Or might of him selfe in otherwyse yet,
But only for the castigation
Of king Richardes wicked perversacion,
Of which the realme then yrked everychone
And full glad were of his deposicion,
And glad to croune kyng Henry so anone,
With all theyr hertes and whole affeccion
For hatred more of kyng Richardes defection
Then for the love of kyng Henry that daye:
So chaunged then the people on hym aye.'—Hardyng, p. 409.

was scarcely one who could not count cousinship with him. He was reputed to be rich, not only on the strength of his great inheritance, but in the possession of the treasure which Richard had amassed to his own ruin. He was a man of high reputation for all the virtues of chivalry and morality, and possessed, in his four young sons, a pledge to assure the nation that it would not soon be troubled with a question of succession, or endangered by a policy that would risk the fortunes of so noble a posterity. Yet the seeds of future difficulties were contained in every one of the advantages of Henry's position; difficulties that would increase with the growth and consolidation of his rule, grow stronger as the dynasty grew older, and in the end prove too great for both the men and the system.

Position of Henry.

The character of Henry IV has been drawn by later historians with a definiteness of outline altogether disproportioned to the details furnished by contemporaries. Like the whole period on which we are entering, the portrait has been affected by controversial views and political analogies. If the struggle between Lancaster and York obscured the lineaments of the man in the view of partisans of the fifteenth century, the questions of legitimacy, usurpation, divine right and indefeasible royalty, obscured them in the minds of later writers. There is scarcely one in the whole line of our kings of whose personality it is so difficult to get a definite idea. The impression produced by his earlier career is so inconsistent with that derived from his later life and from his conduct as king, that they seem scarcely reconcilable as parts of one life. We are tempted to think that, like other men who have taken part in great crises, or in whose life a great crisis has taken place, he underwent some deep change of character at the critical point. As Henry of Derby he is the adventurous, chivalrous crusader; prompt, energetic, laborious; the man of impulse rather than of judgment; led sometimes by his uncle Gloucester, sometimes by his father; yet independent in action, averse to bloodshed, strong in constitutional beliefs. If with Gloucester and Arundel he is an appellant in 1388, it is against the unconstitutional position of the favourites; if, against Gloucester and

Difficulty of reading his character.

His character before his accession.

Arundel in 1397, he takes part with John of Gaunt and Richard, it is because he believes his old allies to have crossed the line which separates legal opposition from treason and conspiracy. On both these critical occasions he shows good faith and honest intent rather than policy or foresight. As king we find him suspicious, cold-blooded, and politic, undecided in action, cautious and jealous in private and public relations, and, if not personally cruel, willing to sanction and profit by the cruelty of others. Throughout his career he is consistently devout, pure in life, temperate and careful to avoid offence, faithful to the church and clergy, unwavering in orthodoxy, keeping always before his eyes the design with which he began his active life, hoping to die as a crusader. Throughout his career too he is consistent in political faith: the house of Lancaster had risen by advocating constitutional principles, and on constitutional principles they governed. Henry IV ruled his kingdom with the aid of a council such as he had tried to force on Richard II, and yielded to his parliaments all the power, place, and privilege that had been claimed for them by the great houses which he represented. It is only after six years of sad experience have proved to him that he can trust none of his old friends, when one by one the men that stood by him at his coronation have fallen victims to their own treasons or to the dire necessity of his policy, that he becomes vindictive¹, suspicious, and irresolute, and tries to justify, on the plea of necessity, the cruelties at which as a younger man he would have shuddered. It may be that the disease which made his later years miserable, and which his enemies declared to be God's judgment upon him, affected both the balance of his mind and the strength of his ruling hand. That love of casuistical argument, which is almost the only marked characteristic that his biographer² notes in him, may have been

His character in later life.

Critical period.

¹ One stage of the transition may be seen in Arundel's speech of 1407, in which he declares that Henry has never exacted the penalties of treason from any who were willing to submit and promise to be faithful; Rot. Parl. iii. 608.

² 'Novi temporibus meis litteratissimos viros, qui colloquio suo fruebantur, dixisse ipsum valde capacis fuisse ingenii et tenacis memoriae ut multum

a sign of the morbid consciousness that he had placed himself in a false position, and conscience may have urged that it was not by honest means that he had availed himself of his great opportunity. We can hardly think that he was so far in advance of his age as to believe fully in the validity of the plea on which, as the chosen of the nation, he claimed the throne. If the formal defiance issued by the Percies contains any germ of truth, he had acted with more than lawful craft when he gained their assent to his supplanting of Richard; if the French chronicle of the time is to be credited, he had not refrained from gross perjury. Neither the one nor the other is trustworthy, but both represent current beliefs. If Henry were guiltless of Richard's death in fact, he was not guiltless of being the direct cause of it, and the person who directly profited by it. Although he was a great king and the founder of a dynasty, the labour and sorrow of his task were ever more present to him than the solid success which his son was to inherit. Always in deep debt, always kept on the alert by the Scots and Welsh; wavering between two opposite lines of policy with regard to France; teased by the parliament, which interfered with his household and grudged him supplies; worried by the clergy and others, to whom he had promised more than he could perform; continually alarmed by attempts on his life, disappointed in his second marriage, bereft by treason of the aid of those whom he had trusted in his youth, and dreading to be supplanted by his own son; ever in danger of becoming the sport of the court factions which he had failed to extinguish or to reconcile, he seems to us a man whose life was embittered by the knowledge that he had taken on himself a task for which he was unequal, whose conscience, ill-informed as it may have been, had soured him, and who felt that the judgments of men, at least, would deal hardly with him when he was dead.

Questions of conscience.

His constant difficulties and disappointments

diei expenderet in quaestionibus solvendis et enodandis . . . Etsi sapiens fuerat, ad cumulum tamen sapientiae qui in Salomone fuerat non pervenit. Sufficiat posteriori saeculo scire quod vir iste in moralibus dubiis enodandis studiosus fuerit scrutator, et quantum regale otium a turbinibus causarum eum permisit liberum in his semper sollicitum fuisse;’ Capgr. III. Henr. pp. 108, 109. He was ‘sage et imaginatif;’ Wavrin, p. 108.

The accession recognised as a new era.

302. The forms observed at Henry's accession show that the greatness of the occasion was recognised by some at least of his advisers. The scene in Westminster Hall, when he claimed the throne, was no unpremeditated pageant; it was the solemn and purposed inauguration of a new dynasty. Archbishop Arundel, the astute ecclesiastic and experienced politician, although his zeal was quickened no doubt by the sense of the wrong done to himself and his brother, saw, more clearly than Henry, the true justification of his proceedings. Sir William Thirning¹, the Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, had had to use argument to prevent Henry from claiming the throne by conquest. The commission of doctors and bishops which had drawn up the articles against Richard, had also sat to inquire what fair claim Henry could make as the rightful heir of the kingdom. They had set aside on the 21st of September the claim based on the descent from Edmund Crouchback, whom its inventors alleged to have been the elder son of Henry III. The claims of the duke of Aumâle, son of Edmund of Langley duke of York, and Richard's favourite cousin, were advanced formally that they might be set aside². No doubt the name of the young Mortimer was pronounced by some under their breath; for it was clear that the kingdom could fall to none but Henry. Popular superstition too was worth courting: the prophecy of Merlin was searched for an omen, and Henry was seen to be the 'boar of commerce'³ who, after days of famine, pestilence, and

¹ 'Proposuerat Henricus de Darby vendicare regnum per conqaestum, sed Guillelmus Thirning justitiarius Angliae dissuasit;' Leland, Coll. i. 188; Ann. Henr. p. 282.

² Creton, an utterly untrustworthy writer, makes the archbishop ask the parliament whether they will have the duke of York, the duke of Aumâle or his brother Richard; Archæol. xx. 200. According to Hardyng the debate in which Henry alleged the false pedigree took place on September 21. If there were any such debate, it must have been there that the bishop of Carlisle protested against Richard's deposition; but it is more probable that the only discussion on Henry's hereditary title took place in the meeting of the commission of doctors, one of whom was Adam of Usk the chronicler, who reports it between the 21st and the 29th. (Chron. ed. Thompson, p. 29.)

³ 'Superveniēt aper commercii, qui dispersos greges ad amissa pascua revocabit;' Geoff. Mon. vii. § 3. Several pretended prophecies of Merlin were in vogue at the time on both sides, in one of which Henry is described as the mole who should reign after the ass; 'post asinum vero talpa ore desolation, 'should recall the dispersed herds to the lost pastures; whose breast should be food for the needy and his tongue should quiet the thirsty, out of whose mouth should proceed streams to moisten the dry jaws of men.' Turning to more hallowed sources of authority, Henry was found to be a new Judas Maccabeus to whom Northumberland was the Matathias¹. The sword which he had drawn on landing was to be preserved as a part of the regalia, the sword of Lancaster by the side of the sceptre of the Confessor. The glories of the line of Lancaster were crowned by the discovery of the golden eagle and cruse of oil which were to give to the new dynasty that miraculous unction that the house of Clovis had received from the holy dove; the Blessed Virgin had confided it to S. Thomas of Canterbury at Sens, and it had lain concealed at Poitiers until under divine directions it had been delivered to duke Henry of Lancaster, the grandfather of the new king². It may be feared that the same hand may be traced here that drew up the claim of legitimate descent through Edmund Crouchback, if such a claim were ever really and formally made. Wiser men were satisfied with the threefold title established by Henry's formal claim, the ready consent of the estates, and the resignation of Richard in his favour³: 'Henry,

The Lancaster sword.

The sacred oil.

Henry's solemn claim, Sept. 30, 1399.

Dei maledicta, superba, misera et turbida,' &c. See Mr. Webb's note on the subject, Archæologia, xx. 258; Hall, Chr. p. 26. Froissart says that when he was at the court of Edward III., he heard an old knight who mentioned a prophecy contained in a book called Brut, that the descendants of the duke of Lancaster would be kings of England. He also heard a prophecy to the same purport on the day of Richard's birth. The stories, if true, tend to prove that John of Gaunt was suspected as early as that date of aspiring to the succession. (Froissart, iv. 121.) Adam of Usk has other prophecies, one by John of Bridlington, in which Henry is represented as a dog; and one taken from Merlin in which he is described as an eaglet; Chron. p. 24.

¹ So the earl calls himself in his letters to Henry; Ordinances of the Privy Council, i. 204, 205.

² The story of the ampulla is given in full in the Annales Henrici Quarti, pp. 297-298; Eulog. iii. 380; Capgr. Chr. p. 273. It is examined by Mr. Webb in the notes on Creton, Archæol. xx. 266.

³ Froissart, iv. c. 116, states the three reasons as conquest, inheritance and Richard's resignation. Cf. Chronique de la Trahison, p. 220. Mr. Wylie, Henry IV., add., quotes from Chaucer 'O Conquerour of Brute's Albyoun, which that by lygne and free eleccioun ben verray kynge;' Compleynte to his Purse, 22. Capgrave (Ill. Henr. p. 107) says 'primo ex pro-duke of Lancaster, stood forth and spoke in English'—here also we may discern a deliberate and solemn formality—"In the name of Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, I Henry of Lancaster challenge this realm of England and the crown with all the members and the appurtenances, as I that am descended by right line of blood, coming from the good lord king Henry Third, and through that right that God of his grace hath sent me with help of my kin and of my friends to recover it, the which realm was in point to be undone for default of governance and undoing of the good laws¹." After which challenge and claim, the lords spiritual and temporal, and all the estates there present, being singly and in common asked what they thought of that pinquitate sanguinis, quam probavit ex antiquis quidem gestis quorum veras copias nec dum vidi; secondly by election, and thirdly by Richard's assignment. It is a curious thing that neither chronicles nor records preserve the exact form of the pedigree which was alleged at the time of Henry's challenge. Hardyng, the chronicler, who was brought up in the household of the earl of Northumberland, says that it was based on a story invented by John of Gaunt, that Edmund of Lancaster, from whom his wife Blanche was descended, was the elder son of Henry III, but was set aside in favour of Edward I, who was his younger brother. The earl had told Hardyng that on the 21st of September this claim had been laid before the lords, tested by the Chronicles of Westminster, and rejected; but notwithstanding was alleged by Henry. (Chron. pp. 352, 353.) Adam of Usk says that about that day the subject was broached in the commission of doctors who were inquiring into the question of succession, and quotes the chronicles by which it was refuted; ed. Thompson, p. 30. This is no doubt the true account of the matter. See Hall, Chron. p. 14. Hardyng's story that John of Gaunt procured the insertion of the forged pedigree in several monastic chronicles is not borne out by any known evidence. If true, it must be referred to the year 1385 or 1394, when it is said that he tried to obtain Henry's recognition as heir, and when the Earl of March was preferred; Eulog. iii. 361, 369. Probably other stories were told. It was said in the controversy on the Yorkist title, that Philippa of Clarence was illegitimate; Fortescue, Works, i. 517; Plummer's Fortescue, pp. 77, 353. But the words of Henry's challenge do not necessarily imply that he meant to assert the forged pedigree; they need imply no more than that succession through females was regarded as strange to the customs of England. It is on the exclusion of females that Fortescue urges the claim of the king's brother as against the grandson by a daughter, in the treatise 'de Natura Legis Naturae;' and, if that were accepted, Henry might fairly call himself the male heir of Henry III. It was, moreover, on this principle probably that he tried to restrict the succession to male heirs in 1406.

¹ Rot. Parl. iii. 422, 423; Mon. Eves. p. 209; Ann. Ric. p. 281; Raine, Northern Registers, p. 429. There are some slight variations in the wording as given by these authorities. See also Otterbourne, p. 219; Eulog. iii. 384; Capgrave, Chron. p. 273.

challenge and claim, the said estates with the whole people, without any difficulty or delay, with one accord agreed that the said duke should reign over them.' Then immediately the king showed to the estates the signet of king Richard which he had delivered to him as a sign of his good-will. Thereupon Arundel took him by the right hand and led him to the throne. Henry kneeled down before it and prayed a little while; then the two archbishops Arundel and Scrope seated him upon it. By a strange and ominous coincidence, the close kinsmen of the two murdered earls joined in the solemn act. Arundel had avenged his brother; Scrope had yet to perish in a hopeless attempt to avenge his old master and the cousin who had laid down his life for Richard. When Henry had taken his seat, Arundel preached a sermon contrasting Henry's manliness with Richard's childishness¹, and, after the king had expressly disavowed any intention of disinheriting any man on the plea that he had won England as a conqueror², he nominated the ministers and officers of justice, received their oaths, and fixed the day for his coronation. The session broke up; the members were to meet again on the 6th of October under the writ of summons already prepared³, and the king was to be crowned on the feast of S. Edward the Confessor, October 13. The proceedings of the deposition were completed on the 1st of October, when Sir William Thirning, in the name of the commissioners appointed to convey to Richard the sentence of the Estates, declared his message to the unhappy king and renounced his homage and fealty. Richard replied 'that he looked not thereafter, but he said

Parliament summoned by writ of Sept. 30, 1399.

¹ The text was 'Vir dominabitur populo;' 1 Sam. ix. 17. Rot. Parl. iii. 422.

² 'It is not my will that no man think that by way of conquest I would disinherit any man of his heritage;' Rot. Parl. iii. 423; Raine, Northern Registers, p. 429; Otterbourne, p. 220. Cf. Adam of Usk, p. 32.

³ Richard's parliament of Sept. 30 is superseded by the new one called for Oct. 6, but the writs for expenses include both; Prynne, iv. 450; that of Richard being described as 'minime tentum.' Although it was impossible for elections to be held in the six days intervening, the writs of summons do not intimate that the same members are to attend; Lords' Report iv. 768; but the king apologizes for the short notice and declares that it is meant to spare labour and expense; Rot. Parl. iii. 423.

Richard's acquiescence in his deposition; Oct.
1, 1399.

that after all this he hoped that his cousin would be good lord to him¹. So the record ends; but it was known at the time that Richard, when he was further pressed to renounce all the honours and dignity pertaining to a king, refused to renounce the spiritual honour of the royal character impressed upon him, or his unction². When the judge read to him the terms in which he had confessed himself unworthy, insufficient, and unfit to govern, and had allowed that he was deposed on account of his demerits, he corrected him, saying 'not so, but because my governance pleased them not³.' Thirning insisting on the form, Richard gave way, and said with a smile that he trusted they would provide him with such means that he would not be destitute of an honourable livelihood. To the last he is a problem; we cannot tell whether they are words of levity or of resignation.

Meeting of
parliament,
Oct. 6, 1399.

The meeting of the parliament on the 6th of October was merely formal⁴. The king took his seat; the lords and commons with a great company of spectators were in attendance. Arundel explained the circumstances which had rendered the new writ of summons necessary, and repeated the substance of his sermon. 'This honourable realm of England, the most abundant angle of riches in the whole world,' had been reduced to destruction by the counsels of children and widows; now God had sent a man knowing and discreet for governance, who by the aid of God would be governed and counselled by the wise and ancient of his realm. Having thus struck the keynote of the Lancastrian policy, he took another text, 'the affairs of the kingdom lie upon us,' from which he deduced the lesson that Henry was willing to be counselled and governed by the honourable, wise, and discreet persons of his kingdom, and by their common counsel and consent to do his best for the governance of himself and his kingdom, not wishing to be discourse.

Arundel's

¹ Rot. Parl. iii. 424.

² 'Respondit quod noluit renunciare spirituali honori characteris sibi impressi et inunctioni quibus renunciare non potuit nec ab hiis cessare;' Ann. Henr. p. 286; Capgr. Ill. Henr. p. 107.

³ Ann. Henr. p. 286.

⁴ Rot. Parl. iii. 415.

governed of his own will nor of his own 'voluntary purpose or singular opinion,' but by common advice, counsel and consent. After praising England as the land which most of all lands might trust to its own resources, and pointing out the requisites of good government, he declared the king's purpose of conserving the liberties of the Church, of the lords spiritual and temporal, and the commons. Then with the consent of the assembly the parliament was adjourned to the day after the coronation. That solemn act was celebrated on the appointed day with all the pomp and significance that befitted the beginning of a new dynasty. The Lancaster sword was borne before the king by the earl of Northumberland as sovereign of the Isle of Man; the golden eagle and cruse were used for the first time, and from the knighting of forty-six candidates for the honours of chivalry, the heralds date the foundation of the order of the Bath¹. The king had already begun to reward his friends; Ralph Neville, the earl of Westmoreland, had been made marshal and received the honour of Richmond; Henry Percy, the father, had been made constable and lord of Man; his son received the isle of Anglesey; his brother, the earl of Worcester, was made admiral²; Arundel had been of course recognised as archbishop without waiting for the pope's reversal of his translation³. John Scarle, the chancellor, and John Northbury, the treasurer, were probably men who had stood aloof from politics and were trusted as officers who knew their own business⁴.

The coronation, Oct. 13, 1399.

Appointment of ministers.

303. On the 14th of October the parliament met for dispatch of business; four dukes, one marquess, ten earls, and thirty-four Composition of parliament; Oct. 14, 1399.

¹ See Froissart, book iv. c. 116; Ann. Henrici, p. 291; Chronique de la Trahison, p. 225 note; Fabyan, Chr. p. 565; Taylor, Glory of Regality, p. 259; Favine, Theatre of Honour, tome ii. p. 65; Selden, Titles of Honour, pp. 819, 820.

² Rymer, viii. 91, 95; Ordinances of Privy Council, i. 178.

³ The temporalities were restored Oct. 21; Rymer, viii. 96; the papal bull for his restoration was dated Oct. 19; Wilk. Conc. iii. 246.

⁴ Northbury had been Richard's minister, but in the discussions on the king's guilt declared that he had resisted his attempts at tyranny; and, when Bagot asked what man in parliament would have ventured to do so, 'Vere, inquit, ego, etsi perdidissem omnia bona mea, una cum vita;' Ann. Henr. p. 305.

barons, with the regular number of prelates, composed the house of lords; the house of commons numbered seventy-four knights, and one hundred and seventy-six representatives of boroughs. The clergy had met under Arundel in their provincial synod on the 6th, and had in preparation the measures for which they reckoned on the grateful co-operation of the king.

Changes
among the earls.

It is in the house of lords of course that the changes and chances of the preceding century have made the deepest mark. Edward I, in 1300, had summoned eleven earls and ninety-eight barons. Of the eleven earldoms, three were now vested in the king, who, besides being earl of Lancaster, Lincoln, and Hereford, was also earl of Derby, Leicester, and Northampton¹. One had become the regular provision for the prince of Wales. The earldoms of Arundel and Surrey were united in the son of the murdered earl, who was a minor, and suffering under his father's sentence. The heir of the Bigods had just died in exile²; the heirs of Umframville were no longer called to the English parliament; the house of Valence was extinct. Gloucester was for the moment held by Thomas le Despenser, the lineal descendant of the famous favourites. Oxford and Warwick survived. Of the ninety-eight baronies twenty³ were represented by the descendants of their former possessors, five were in the hands of minors, fourteen were altogether extinct, twenty-one had fallen into what the lawyers have termed abeyance among coheiresses and their descendants; thirty-three had ceased to be regarded as hereditary peerages from the non-summoning of their holders; one had been sold to the crown; besides extinction and abeyance some had suffered by attain.

Changes in the peerage between 1300 and 1400.

The earl-doms, and baronies.

¹ So he styles himself in a deed dated 1399, printed by Madox, Formulare Angl. p. 327; see also Rymer, viii. 90; and Rot. Parl. iv. 48. The earldom of Northampton was afterwards conceded by Henry V to the Staffords as coheirs of Bohun.

² The duke of Norfolk died at Venice Sept. 22, 1399.

³ These numbers are derived from a collation of the writs for March 6, 1300, with the statements in Nicolas' Historic Peerage, Dugdale's Baronage, and Banks' Dormant Peerage. The barony sold to the king was that of Pinkeni, in 1301. The minors were Latimer, Clifford, Grey of Wilton, l'Estrange, and Mortimer.

Of the new lords, the four dukes and the marquess represented younger branches of the royal house; of the earls three represented the ancient earldoms; three had been created or revived by Edward III, four were creations of Richard II¹. Of the fourteen newer baronies ten date from the early years of the preceding century; three, the two Scropes and Bouchier, from the reign of Edward III; one, that of Lumley, from 1384. The chief political results of this attenuation had been to lodge constitutional power in far fewer hands, to accumulate lands and dignities on men who were strong rather in personal qualifications and interests than in their coherence as an estate of the realm, to make deeper and broader the line between lords and commons, and to concentrate feuds and jealousies in a smaller circle in which they would become more bitter and cruel than they had been before. The quarrels of the last reign had already proved this, and Henry, when he looked round him, must have seen many places empty which he had once seen filled with earnest politicians. Of the appellants of 1388, only himself and Warwick survived; of the counter-appellants of 1397, Nottingham and Wiltshire were dead; the rest were waiting with anxious hearts to know whether Henry would sacrifice them or save them. Could he have looked forward a few months only he would have seen four more noble heads from among them laid low; a few years further, and he would have seen the very men who had placed him on the throne perish as the victims of treason and mistrust.

New peerages.

Diminution of the peerage.

The strong men of the peerage now were the Percies, who shared with the house of Arundel the blood of the Karolings, and had risen by steady accumulations of office and dignity to a primacy in power and wealth; the earl of Northumberland was that Henry Percy who had disappointed the hopes of the Good Parliament, who had stood by John of Gaunt when he defended Wycliffe at S. Paul's, who had been afterwards his bitter enemy,

The Percies.

¹ The dukes were York, Aumâle, Surrey and Exeter; the marquess, Dorset; the three ancient earldoms were Gloucester, Warwick and Oxford. Edward III had created Devon, Salisbury and Stafford; Richard II, Northumberland, Westmoreland and Worcester.

and whose desertion of the cause of Richard had, more than any other single event, insured the success of Henry. His brother Thomas had been steward to Richard II and had received from The Nevilles. him the earldom of Worcester. Ralph Neville, the earl of Westmoreland, was brother-in-law of Henry Percy, and had risen in the same way; he was son of the lord Neville who had been impeached in the Good Parliament, and he had married, as second wife, Johanna Beaufort, a daughter of John of Gaunt. The blood of the house of Lancaster ran also in the veins of the Hollands and the Arundels; and such lords as were not cousins to the king through his parents, were ranked in the affinity of the Bohuns. The vast estates of the house of Lancaster lay chiefly in the north and midland shires; and the great names of the Percies, Nevilles, Scropes, Lumley, Roos, Darcy, Dacre, Greystock and Fitzhugh, show that the balance of political strength in the baronage lay northwards also.

The northern lords.

The king's difficulties at the beginning of the reign.

The first parliament of Henry IV sat from October 6 to November 19. It dispatched a great deal of work. There were, notwithstanding the great popularity of the king, grounds for alarm at home and abroad; how to obtain recognition by the pope and foreign princes, how to equip an army without having recourse to heavy taxation, how to deal with the Wycliffites, how to reconcile the feuds, how to punish the destroyers of Gloucester and Arundel, what was to be done with king Richard. Henry had made great promises to the clergy, and to Arundel he owed scarcely less than he owed to the Percies. At Doncaster, and again at Knaresborough castle, soon after he landed, he had promised not to tax the clergy with tenths or the laity with tallages¹; Arundel was aware that at any moment the knights of the shire in parliament might demand the seizure of the temporalities of the clergy. Sir John Cheyne, the speaker chosen by the commons, was known to be inclined to the Wycliffites; on the plea of ill-health he declined the election, but not until the archbishop had moved the synod of the clergy against him¹. Sir John Doreward was chosen in his place².

¹ The oath at Doncaster is mentioned by Hardyng in the Percy Challenge, Chron. p. 352. That at Knaresborough by Clement Maidstone: 'quod nunquam solveret Ecclesia Anglicana decimam nec populus taxam;' Ang. Sac. ii. 369.

The speaker was admitted on the 15th of October; and the same day all the proceedings of Richard's last parliament, in accordance with a petition of the commons, were annulled, and the acts of that of 1388 reinstated in their validity; the sufferers of 1397 were restored, so far as they could be restored, in blood and estate; the king undertook that the powers of parliament should not be again delegated to a committee such as Richard had manipulated so cleverly; the blank bonds which he had used to tax the counties illegally were cancelled; and the king's eldest son, Henry of Monmouth, was made prince of Wales, duke of Cornwall, and earl of Chester³.

Proceedings of the parliament of October 1399.

The next day, October 16, the knights of the shire demanded the arrest of the evil counsellors of King Richard⁴. Sir William Bagot, the only survivor of the luckless triumvirate who had managed the parliament of 1397, made a distinct charge against the duke of Aumâle as the instigator of the murder of Gloucester. He repeated a conversation in which Richard had spoken of Henry as an enemy of the church, which called forth from the king himself a most distinct asseveration of his faithfulness; and Aumâle, who saw that he was to be represented as Richard's intended successor⁵, challenged the accuser

Challenges and recriminations among the appellants
of 1397.

¹ Ann. Henr. p. 290. Walsingham says that Cheyne was an apostate deacon; ii. 266. He was member for Gloucestershire and had been implicated in the designs of duke Thomas.

² Rot. Parl. iii. 424.

³ Ib. iii. 425, 426, 436; cf. Adam of Usk, p. 35. The blank charters were burned by the king's order of Nov. 30; Rymer, viii. 109.

⁴ 'Die Jovis,' Ann. Henr. p. 303; where a graphic account of the whole proceedings will be found, supplementing the meagre record in the Rolls of Parliament. See also Archaeologia, xx. 275-281.

⁵ The story was that Richard had once expressed a wish to resign the crown to the duke of Aumâle, as the most generous and wisest man in the kingdom. The duke of Norfolk had urged that Henry stood nearer to the succession. Then Richard had said, 'Si ipse teneret regni regimen destrueret vellet totam ecclesiam sanctam Dei;' Ann. Henr. p. 304; Fabyan, p. 566. Henry now allowed that he had wished to see more worthy men promoted than had been in Richard's time; and thus to some extent admitted that the subject had been discussed. According to Hall, Henry had been heard by the abbot of Westminster to say, when he was quite to single combat. The dukes of Surrey and Exeter, alarmed by Bagot's words, followed Aumâle's example; and the king, fearing that the informer would do more harm than good, remanded him to prison. The next day the lords, on the advice of lord Cobham, agreed that the three dukes should be arrested; the unhappy Warwick, who still survived to his own shame, attempted to excuse his confession of treason, and finally denied that he had made it, calling forth from the king a summary command to be silent. Lord Fitzwalter loudly proclaimed the innocence of Gloucester. Henry, remembering the part which he had himself played in the events of the last parliament, must have felt very miserable; he seems however to have determined that matters should not be driven to extremities, and put off the proceedings as well as he could from day to day. Every step in the transaction seemed to make the guilt of Aumâle more probable. On the 18th of October lord Fitzwalter formally impeached him¹; Surrey alone stood by him; the loud challenges of the lords and the shouts of the commons threatened a civil war, and Henry only succeeded by personal exertions in rescuing his cousin from imminent death. During the lull that followed this storm, archbishop Arundel, on the 23rd of October, determined to raise the question what was to be done with Richard². He charged the lords and all who were present to observe strict secrecy; and Northumberland put the question at once³. Twenty-two prelates, eight earls, including the prince of Wales and the duke of York, and twenty-eight barons and counsellors, declared their mind, that the late king should be kept in safe and secret imprisonment; and on the 27th, Henry himself being present, the sentence of perpetual imprisonment was passed on him⁴. The commons, on condemned to imprisonment, Oct.

Richard
27, 1399.

young, 'that princes had too little and religions had too much;' Chron. p. 15.

¹ Otterbourne, p. 222; Ann. Henr. p. 310.

² Rot. Parl. iii. 426.

³ 'Coment leur semble que serroit ordeigne de Richard nadgairs roy, pur luy mettre en saufe garde, sauvant la vie quele le roy voet que luy soit sauvez en toutes maneres?' Rot. Parl. iii. 426.

⁴ Rot. Parl. iii. 427. The version of the sentence given in the Chronique de la Trahison, as pronounced by the recorder of London, must be a fabrithe 3rd of November, protested that they were not judges of parliament, but petitioners¹, thus guarding themselves against the consequences of a possible reaction. In accordance with this sentence Richard was, on the 29th of October, at midnight, removed from the Tower².

Protest
of the commons, Nov. 3, 1399.

As soon as the sentence on Richard was declared, the outcry was again raised against the appellants of 1397; and on the 29th the proceedings were continued more quietly and formally.

Proceedings renewed against the dukes, Oct.
29, 1399.

The six survivors pleaded their own cause severally; and bishop Merks took courage to present himself and disavow all participation in the murder of Gloucester³. The lords admitted different degrees of complicity in the appeal; Aumâle declared that he had acted under constraint; Surrey was a boy at the time and had complied in fear for his life; Exeter had done what the others had done; Dorset had been taken by surprise, and had not dared to disobey the king; Salisbury had acted in fear; le Despenser did not know how his name had got into the bill, but when it was there he dared not withdraw it. Other charges were included in the accusation; the death of Gloucester, the banishment of Henry, the repeal of the patent which secured the Lancaster inheritance, and the other sentences of the parliament. These were distinctly disavowed with various degrees of assurance. On the 3rd of November Sir William Thirning pronounced the judgment of the lords⁴: the excuses of the appellants were to some extent a confession of guilt; but the circumstances of the case were exceptional; the common law did not furnish adequate machinery for deciding the questions at issue, and to attempt to treat the matter as treason was usually treated

Pleas of the accused.

Sentence pronounced, Nov. 3.

cation; John of Bourdeaux, who had been called king Richard, was condemned to be imprisoned in a royal castle, and if any one rose in his favour, he was to be the first who should suffer death for the attempt; Chron. &c. p. 223; cf. Archaeol. xx. 274.

¹ Rot. Parl. iii. 427.

² Ann. Henr. p. 313.

³ Ib. p. 313. The formal proceedings are in the Rot. Parl. iii. 449-453; they are deficient in dates, but it would seem from them that the debate was renewed on Wednesday the 29th; the answers of the accused were discussed on the Thursday; on the Friday the king consulted the prelates. The date of the judgment is given by the annalist.

⁴ Rot. Parl. iii. 451; Ann. Henr. pp. 315-320; Wals. ii. 241.

The dukes degraded.

would be to stir up elements most dangerous and disastrous to the realm; mercy and judgment were to be commingled in the decision; the dukes of Aumâle, Surrey, and Exeter were to be reduced to their former rank as earls of Rutland, Kent, and Huntingdon; the marquess of Dorset was to become earl of Somerset again, and le Despenser to cease to be earl of Gloucester. Salisbury's fate was not decided by the sentence; his confession was somewhat more damaging than those of the others, and he had not been admitted to state his case to the king. He was left to prove his innocence in a trial by battle with the lord Morley his accuser¹. Hall, the person who was regarded as one of the actual murderers of Gloucester, had been sentenced to death on the 17th of October, and executed the same day². The proceedings exhibit Henry as a somewhat temporising politician, but not as a cruel man. The offence against Gloucester and Arundel in which he had participated was mixed up with the offence against himself; and he might have availed himself of the popular outcry to revenge his own wrongs. His conduct was condemned as weak and undecided, and he was threatened in an anonymous letter with an insurrection if the guilty were not more severely punished³. The lords and the knights of the shire denied on oath their knowledge of the writer; but subsequent events gave a sad corroboration to its threat, and popular fury completed the task which the king had mercifully declined.

Henry threatened with insurrection.

Formal protest of the commons.

It was probably as a direct consequence of these proceedings that the commons, on the 3rd of November, made the protest already referred to: 'that as the judgments of the parliament

¹ Froissart (ix. 116) says that Salisbury, who had been imprisoned, was received into favour on Rutland's intercession. Preparation was made for the trial by battle, but Salisbury's fate was decided before it could take place (see Williams' note on the Chronique &c., p. 224; Lingard, Hist. Eng. iii. 200); and lord Morley the challenger recovered costs from the earl's sureties; Adam of Usk, pp. 44, 45.

² Rot. Parl. iii. 452, 453; Adam of Usk, p. 36.

³ 'Quasi illi (the King, Arundel and Percy) caecati muneribus salvassent vitam hominum quos vulgus sceleratissimos et morte dignissimos reputabat;' Ann. Henr. p. 320. Hardyng at a later period recommends to Edward IV the example of Henry in favour of clemency as a piece of sound policy; Chron. p. 409.

belong solely to the king and lords, and not to the commons, except in case that it please the king of his special grace to show to them the said judgments for their ease, no record may be made in parliament against the said commons, that they are or will be parties to any judgments given or to be given hereafter in parliament. Whereunto it was answered by the archbishop of Canterbury at the king's command, how that the same commons are petitioners and demanders, and that the king and the lords have of all time had, and shall of right have, the judgments in parliament, in manner as the same commons have shown; save that in statutes to be made, or in grants and subsidies, or such things to be done for the common profit of the realm, the king wishes to have especially their advice and assent. And that this order of fact be kept and observed in all time to come¹.

The revival of the Acts of 1388 and the repeal of those of 1397 involved some readjustment of personal claims, which formed an important part of the work for the remainder of the session. The earls of Suffolk², Arundel, and Warwick³ required restitution; the three persons⁴ excepted from the pardon of 1388 had to be secured by a royal declaration of their loyalty. The sentence against Haxey, already set aside by Richard, had to be again annulled⁵; and the pardons granted by Richard in 1398 to be confirmed. The king refused however to restore the heirs of the condemned judges, or to replace the heir of Vere as high chamberlain. Archbishop Arundel was allowed to demand reparation from Walden, whom Richard had forced into the primacy; and the prince of Wales was empowered to bear the titles of duke of Aquitaine and Lancaster⁶.

The necessary work of the parliament was soon dispatched; a subsidy on wool was granted for three years, and a fifteenth

Parliament
of 1399.

Reparation for past losses.

Taxation and legislation.

¹ Rot. Parl. iii. 427.

² Ann. Henr. p. 312; Rot. Pat. Cal. p. 238; Rot. Parl. iii. 668.

³ Rot. Parl. iii. 435, 436; Chron. Henr. ed. Giles, p. 5.

⁴ The three were Richard Clifford now Privy Seal, Richard Metford now bishop of Salisbury, and Henry Bowet afterwards bishop of Bath and Wells and archbishop of York; the latter was the king's confidential agent; Rot. Parl. iii. 428.

⁵ Rot. Parl. iii. 430, 434.

⁶ Ib. iii. 427, 441, 442.

and tenth already granted to Richard was confirmed to Henry¹. The king rejected the proposal that, for fear of the plague, he should not go abroad, and obtained the consent of the lords that he should go in person against the Scots². Time was found for the passing of a statute of twenty clauses, and more than sixty important petitions were heard and answered. Of the legislative acts the most significant were those which restricted the definition of treason to the points defined in the statute of Edward III, and forbade appeals of treason to be made in parliament; another prohibited the delegation of the powers of parliament to a committee like that abused to his own destruction by Richard II³. It is in the treatment of petitions that the king shows the most strength of will. There were no doubt about him some counsellors who wished for reconciliation and concord at any cost, and were content to wipe out summarily all the sad history of the late reign. There were others who had private as well as public wrongs to avenge, and some to whom the opening of the new era seemed to give an opportunity for urging at once fundamental changes. Henry found that he must take his own line. He obtained from the commons a declaration that he, like Richard, was entitled to all the royal liberty that his predecessors had enjoyed⁴, undertaking however not to follow the example of Richard in overthrowing the constitution. He freely exercised the right of rejecting petitions even when strongly urged by the commons; in some instances showing more policy than equity. He had already discovered that he would be far from a rich sovereign, and that the relations with France and Scotland were likely to involve him immediately in a great expenditure. Richard had thrown the whole finance of the kingdom into confusion; and were Richard's obligations to be reviewed the confusion would be worse confounded. To the petitions that the sums borrowed by Richard should be repaid,

Petitions in parliament.

Henry obtains an acknowledgment of his prerogative.

¹ Rot. Parl. iii. 425. A half tenth and fifteenth payable at the preceding Michaelmas is not confirmed to Henry.

² Ib. iii. 427, 428, 434. The king himself spoke in full parliament on the expedition to Scotland.

³ Ib. iii. 426, 434, 442.

⁴ Ib. iii. 434.

that the sums due for purveyances should be discharged, and that the acquittances which Richard had granted should be revoked, he returned the same answer, *le roi s'avisera*¹; but he authorised a careful inquiry into the effects of Richard², and in the case of the purveyances promised to take the advice of his council and do what was reasonable. He refused to order the repayment of the money paid as ransoms by the adherents of Gloucester and Arundel. He had to refuse to submit to the judgment of his council the great donations of land by which he had already provided for his servants, or to agree to a general resumption of crown lands³. His last act in the parliament was to except from all the benefits of the national pacification the estates of Scrope, Bussy, and Green, whom he regarded as guilty of all the evil that had come upon the land: yet even here he would try to be just; he would not lay hand on the estates with which those culprits were enfeoffed to the use of others, and he would do nothing that would endanger or disgrace the venerable lord le Scrope of Bolton who had been so faithful to his father and grandfather, and who was in no way answerable for the sins of his unhappy son, the earl of Wiltshire⁴.

Petitions.

Question of a resumption.

The convocation or provincial synod of Canterbury, which sat contemporaneously with this parliament, made no grant of money, but contented itself with drawing up articles directed against the Lollards and the continual encroachments of the royal courts⁵. Henry had dealt carefully with them, and as early as the 7th of October had sent Northumberland to tell them that he wanted no money, but prayers, promising to do his best to suppress heresy. Although this assembly seems to have been summoned by the chapter of Canterbury, as if in a vacancy of the see, and although Boniface IX did on the 19th of October issue letters restoring Arundel to the primacy⁶,

Henry's dealings with convocation in October 1399.

¹ Rot. Par. iii. 437, 438, 440.

² Ib. iii. 439.

³ Ib. iii. 433.

⁴ Ib. iii. 453.

⁵ Ann. Henr. pp. 290, 291; Wilkins, Conc. iii. 238, sq.

⁶ Wilkins, Conc. iii. 246. Adam of Usk thus describes the position of the rival archbishops during the interval: 'Thomas et Rogerus, si fas est dicere, duo archiepiscopi in una ecclesia, quasi duo capita in uno corpore, neither king nor archbishop, parliament nor synod, had thought it necessary to wait for the formal act or to hesitate in removing archbishop Walden from his hazardous exaltation. Archbishop Arundel had taken his place in both the assemblies, had crowned the king and had been restored to his temporalities long before the papal letter could have reached England. This conduct seemed to promise that, however strenuously orthodox Henry might be, his relations to Rome would not be marked by servility, and that the house of Lancaster would act up to the spirit of the constitution in both Church and State.

Short reign of peace.

304. The reign of peace lasted for little more than a month. Henry, perhaps, had done either too much or too little. An eastern potentate would have struck off the heads of the Hollands and extinguished the house of Mortimer, regardless of the infant innocence of the little earl of March. But Henry does not seem to have cast a thought on Mortimer, and the ready acquiescence of the Hollands in his assumption of the crown either deceived him or left him without a plea for crushing them. Yet he had in the two degraded dukes, in Salisbury and in le Despenser, four very determined enemies; and his cousin Rutland was not beyond suspicion. Whether the degraded lords were goaded into desperate action by their own fears, or whether they really miscalculated national opinion so far as to hope for Richard's restoration, cannot be determined. They formed a plot to seize the king on Twelfth Night, and replace Richard on the throne. The conspiracy was discovered, whether betrayed by Rutland or suspected by his father, and foiled. The earls of Kent and Salisbury were seized and murdered by the mob at Cirencester; lord le Despenser fled and fell a victim to the hereditary hatred of the citizens of Bristol; the earl of Huntingdon was taken in Essex, and notwithstanding the intervention of the countess of Hereford, Henry's mother-in-law and Arundel's sister, was

Conspiracy of the earls, January 1400.

Its failure and punishment.

Rogerus scilicet tunc per papam in possessione juris, et dominus Thomas, quia necdum per papam restitutus, per seculi tamen potestatem in possessione facti, quae praevaluit in omnibus, quia sibi soli crucis Cantuariensis, sibi a dicto Rogero remissae, paruit in omnibus delatio; Chron. p. 37.

beheaded at Pleshey¹. Lord Lumley was taken and killed at Cirencester. Of these cruelties Henry was no wise guilty, but he did not punish the murderers, and shortly afterwards increased the number of victims by more legal executions at Oxford and London. Sir Thomas Blount, Sir Benedict Shelley, and twenty-seven or twenty-eight others were executed at Oxford; Richard Magdalene and John Feriby clerks, Thomas Schevele and Bernard Brocas knights, in London². The failure of the attempt sealed the fate of Richard; whether he was murdered at Pomfret, or starved himself to death, or escaped to live in Scotland an idiot and a prisoner, he had already quitted the stage of history³. We may believe that Henry spoke the truth when he declared that he had no hand in his death. A solemn funeral was celebrated for the unhappy victim at Langley on the 14th of February; and although the king rewarded the services of the men and women of Cirencester with an annual present⁴ of venison, he proclaimed on the 24th that accused persons were not again to be beheaded without trial⁵.

Fate of Richard.

305. Meanwhile the political difficulties which overshadowed the whole reign were looming at no great distance. France would not recognise the new king, or accept his proposals for an alliance by marriage, and demanded the restoration of Richard's child-widow. The Scots were stirring at the instigation of the French; the Welsh were preparing to rise under Owen Glendower. Invasion was imminent. Richard's treasures, if they had ever existed, had been spent or stolen. The year 1400 was a very busy year for Henry. In the summer he marched north to insist on the homage of Scotland⁶: he

The year 1400.
Foreign difficulties.

Invasion of Scotland.

¹ Ann. Henr. p. 327. Hardyng says that the countess ordered the execution; p. 356.

² Otterbourne, p. 228; Ann. Henr. pp. 329, 330; Leland, Coll. ii. 484; Adam of Usk, p. 41.

³ On the evidence about Richard's death see Webb, in Archaeol. xx. 282 sq.; Amyot, ibid. pp. 424-442.

⁴ Rymer, viii. 150.

⁵ Ib. viii. 124; Ordinances, i. 107 sq., 113.

⁶ Otterbourne, p. 230; Ann. Henr. p. 333; Eulog. iii. 387; Wals. ii. 246; Chron. Giles, p. 20.

War in Wales.

Supply of money.

reached Leith as a victorious invader, but returned home without gaining his object. In September he heard that Owen Glendower was at war with lord Grey of Ruthyn, and he had to make an expedition to Wales in the autumn. The money for the Scottish expedition was provided by the contributions of the lords, granted in a great council on the 9th of February, the prelates giving a tenth and the lords temporal giving an aid under specified conditions¹; but the king had no success in his attempt to borrow from the Londoners; and at Christmas the emperor of Constantinople², to whom Richard had made large promises, arrived to claim the fulfilment. A truce had been patched up with France, but peace was not to be looked for. New allies must be sought; a project of marriage was started, to secure the alliance of the new king of the Romans, who had supplanted Wenzel as Henry had supplanted Richard; and there could be no marriage without money.

Complaints of the want of money.

Although on the view of the whole year Henry's position had become stronger, the dangers ahead were greater. The clergy, although the king had surrendered the alien monasteries and had not pressed the demand for money, were clamouring against the Wycliffites; the Percies, who were bearing the burden of defence on both the Scottish and the Welsh marches, were discovering that the change of ruler was bringing them more cost than honour. Money was wanted everywhere and for every one. Henry knew that, when once the financial alarm began to spread, constitutional difficulties would arise. He had already too few friends, and ministers of scarcely average experience. The parliament must meet again. It had already been summoned to assemble at York in October 1400; but the day was postponed and the place changed. It

¹ The great council was held on 9th of February by writ under the Privy Seal; Rymer, viii. 125, 153; Ordinances of the Privy Council, i. 102-106. According to the annalist the clergy were asked by letter for a tenth, which it was thought uncivil to refuse; Ann. Henr. p. 332. The commons were not asked; Adam of Usk, p. 43. Mr. Wylie gives the revenue as £109,249 16s. 2½d., and the expenditure, £109,006 11s. 8½d.; p. 61.

² Ann. Henr. p. 334; Adam of Usk, p. 55.

met at Westminster on the 20th of January, 1401¹, and sat until the 10th of March.

New parliament called, January 1401.

Sir William Thirning, the chief justice, who made the opening speech, had no easy task. The financial report, which had been laid before the council showed that, besides the expenses of the royal household, more than £130,000² was required for the defence and administration of the realm. The £350,000, at which Richard's accumulations were estimated, had disappeared, and the king had already incurred a debt of £16,000³. No figures, however, were laid before the commons; the expenses of the coronation, the suppression of the conspiracy, the expeditions to Scotland and Wales, the defence of Calais and Guienne, were dwelt upon, and the commons in particular were urged to give more attention than was usually given to public business, and less to matters of private interest. The result of this exhortation was a long and specially important session.

Statement of finance laid before the parliament.

306. The commons, although they may, in the first instance, have required a spur, now saw their advantage at once. It was not the weakness of the king's title, as has sometimes been said, but their knowledge of his necessities that gave them their vantage-ground. With the utmost apparent loyalty and with no little liberality they began to put in form the claims which they conceived themselves to possess. They chose as speaker Sir Arnold Savage⁴, one of the members for Kent, a

The commons seize their opportunity.

¹ Lords' Report, iv. 770-775; Rot. Parl. iii. 454.

² The estimate is printed in the Ordinances of the Privy Council, i. 154, ii. 56; but the document is mutilated. Among the items are Calais £13,320 6s. 8d.; Ireland £5333 6s. 8d.; Guienne £10,000; Queen Isabella £8242 0s. 10d.; the last loan £16,000; the wardrobe £16,000; annuities and grants £24,000; all together, including lost items, but not including the household, £130,908 14s. 2d. These items agree with the particulars of Thirning's Speech; Rot. Parl. iii. 454. See above, p. 28, n. 1.

³ On the amount of treasure left by Richard see Chronique de la Trahison, p. 263. Fabyan, p. 569, from the Polychronicon, estimates it at £700,000; the Chronique at 900,000 nobles, or £300,000.

⁴ Rot. Parl. iii. 455; Otterbourne, p. 232. 'Qui tam disertè, tam eloquenter, tam gratiosè, declaravit communitalis negotia, præcipue ne de cetero taxis gravarentur aut talliagiis, quod laudem ab universis promeruit ea die;' Ann. Henr. p. 335. Sir Arnold Savage, of Bobbing near Sittingbourne, had been sheriff of Kent in 9 Rich. II, and gone with John of Gaunt to Castille. He was constable of Queenborough castle in 1393 and died in 1410; Hasted's Kent, ii. 635, 636.

Arnold Savage's speeches in the parliament of 1401.

man who showed by the length and ingenuity of his speeches, that he was capable of rivalling the curious orations with which the parliaments were usually opened by chancellor, archbishop, or justice. Thirning had directed that no one should leave the parliament until the business of the session was completed. Savage, after making the usual protest, on being presented to the king, recounted the principal points of the justice's speech, and expressed a hope that the commons might have good advice and deliberation, and not be pressed suddenly with the most important matters at the very close of parliament. The king, through the Earl of Worcester, replied that he imagined no such subtilty. Not satisfied with this, three days after, the commons again presented themselves, and again returned thanks for Thirning's speech, and administered another reproof¹. It might happen, the speaker said, that some of their body, out of complaisance to the king, might report their proceedings before they were completed, a course which might exasperate the king against individuals; he prayed that the king would not listen to any such tales. Henry made the requisite promise. The speaker then proceeded to expatiate in a set speech on the course to be adopted with respect to a number of lords who had been challenged by the French as traitors to King Richard. Henry thanked them for their advice. On the occasion however of a third address on the 31st of January, the king, tired of Savage's eloquence, declined to hear any more petitions by word of mouth, and requested the commons to put all their requests in writing². The object of the whole proceeding was no doubt that which was stated in one of the petitions so delivered, that the king's answer to their requests might be declared before the grant of money was made. This petition was presented on the 26th of February; the king in reply promised to confer with the lords on the point, and on the last day of the session refused the demand as unprecedented³. This petition and its answer involve one of the most

Discussions
of the king and speaker.

Redress to precede supply.

Henry's refusal.

¹ Rot. Parl. iii. 455.

² Ib. iii. 455, 456.

³ Ib. iii. 458.

distinct statements of constitutional theory that had been ever advanced.

Savage no doubt was capable of formulating so much and more; in another of his speeches he compares the estates to a Trinity, that is to say 'the person of the king, the lords spiritual and temporal, and the commons.' But the crowning instance of his ingenuity is found in the closing address, in which he draws an elaborate parallel between the parliamentary session and the Mass; the office of the Archbishop at the opening of the session is compared to the reading of the epistle, gospel, and sermon; the king's declaration of a determination to maintain the faith and the laws is compared with the propitiatory offering; the closing words 'Ite missa est' and 'Deo gratias' are equally appropriate in both cases¹. The 'Deo gratias' of the commons was expressed in their money grant, for which the king thanked them and then dissolved the parliament. The grant made was a fifteenth and tenth, for a year, with tunnage of two shillings and poundage of eightpence for two years².

The claims of the commons were not confined to matters of theory; the king was obliged to comply with their petition that he would revoke the assignment of certain pensions charged on the subsidy of wool which in the last session had been granted for a special time and purpose. They further prayed him to institute a careful examination into the inventory of king Richard's jewels³, a petition which, according to the historian of the time, Henry met with a declaration that he had received none of Richard's property, but was in reality poor and needy. They urged that the record of parliamentary business should be ingrossed before the departure of the justices, whilst the facts were still present in their memory⁴, no indistinct hint that the record was not always trustworthy; the answer was that the clerk of the parliament should do his best with the advice of the justices and subject to the advice of the king and lords.

¹ Rot. Parl. iii. 466.

² Ib. iii. 455; Dep. Keeper's Rep. ii. App. ii. p. 181.

³ Rot. Parl. iii. 457; Ann. Henr. p. 335.

⁴ Rot. Parl. iii. 457, 458.

Another speech of Savage.

The commons force their demands on the king.

Sentences and restorations.

The lords were otherwise employed, partly in the work of pacification, partly in the work of retribution. The conspiracy of the earls had ruined many and endangered more. Sentence of forfeiture was declared against the earls of Kent, Huntingdon, and Salisbury, and the lords Lumley and le Despenser. Rutland and Fitzwalter agreed to refer their quarrel to the king's decision; the earls of Rutland and Somerset were, on the petition of the commons, declared loyal. The king's clemency looked even farther back; the heirs of the judges Holt and Burgh were restored; the bishop of Norwich, the valiant Henry le Despenser, the only man who had ventured in arms to oppose Henry's march in 1399, was reconciled to the king; the proceedings against Sir Simon Burley were reversed. All these were wise and politic measures, although they were too late to heal the evils caused by the exceptional misgovernment of the late reign ¹.

The statute against the Lollards.

The mark however by which the parliament of 1401 is chiefly known in history is the action taken against the Lollards. This was prompted no doubt by archbishop Arundel, who throughout his career was their unflinching enemy. He had a double opportunity. The popular hatred of Richard's court and courtiers was still strong; and among Richard's courtiers the chief protectors of the Lollards had been found. The earl of Salisbury had been a noted and powerful heretic, closely connected with Thomas Latimer, Lewis Clifford, William Neville, the Cheynes, and the Clanvowes, who were the leaders of the party. Advantage might be taken of the unpopularity of the old court to destroy the Lollards. Henry again was fervently orthodox, all the more so perhaps for the dislike that as an honest man he must have felt at his father's intrigues with the Wycliffites; he had made very weighty promises to the clergy, and Arundel might well demand that those promises should be now fulfilled: a calumny had been breathed against Henry himself; this would be the easiest way of repelling it. The clergy had shown a dislike to contribute money, and had made no grant since the reign began ; they might be inclined to be more liberal if they saw themselves secured against their enemies. With this intention Arundel had called together the clergy on January 26th, and told them that the great object of their meeting was to put down the Lollards¹. The royal commissioners, Northumberland, Erpingham, and Northbury, promised the king's aid, and prayed for some decisive measure ; even during the session of parliament there was, we are told, an alarm of a Lollard rising². The result was a long and bitter petition³, and the immediate initiation of proceedings against William Sawtre, a Lollard priest. The petition was granted by the king with the assent of the lords ; and a petition of the commons, conceived in shorter terms but in the same sense, conveyed the assent of the lower house⁴. It was then framed into a clause of the statute of the year, and by it the impenitent heretic, convicted before the spiritual court, was to be delivered over to the officers of the secular law to be burned ; all heretical books were to be destroyed⁵. The exact date of the petition is not given. Sawtre's trial, however, lasted from the 12th to the 24th of February⁶ ; on the 26th the royal writ for his execution was issued⁷. On the 11th of March the convocation granted a tenth and a half-tenth to supplement the contribution of the laity⁸. The whole proceeding, grievous as it is to the reputation of all persons concerned in it, seems to show that there was already in the country, as in the court, a strong reaction against the Wycliffites. Doubtless it was in

¹ Rot. Parl. iii, 456, 459, 460, 461, 464.

Petition of the clergy,
in 1401.

Petition of the commons.

Statute of 1401.

Sawtre burned.

¹ Wilkins, Conc. iii. 254.

² Adam of Usk, p. 4.

³ Rot. Parl. iii. 466, 467 ; Wilkins, Conc. iii. 252.

⁴ Rot. Parl. iii. 473 : ' Item priount les Communes qe qant ascun homme ou femme, de quel estat ou condition qu'il soit, soit pris et emprisonne pur Lollerie, que maintenant soit mesne en respons, et eit tel juggement come il ad desservie, en ensample d'autres de tiel male secte, pur legerement cesser lour malveis predications et lour tenir a foy Cristien.'

⁵ 2 Hen. IV. c. 15 ; Statutes, ii. 123 ; Chr. Giles, p. 22 ; Wilkins, Conc. iii. 328. See below, ch. xix. pp. 370 sq.

⁶ Ann. Henr. pp. 336, 337 ; Eulog. iii. 388 ; Chr. Giles, p. 22 ; Adam of Usk, p. 57 ; Wilkins, Conc. iii. 254.

⁷ Rymer, viii. 178 ; Rot. Parl. iii. 459.

⁸ Wilk. Conc. iii. 262 ; Adam of Usk, p. 59. The clergy of York granted a tenth, July 26 ; Wilk. Conc. iii. 267.

Probable objects of Arundel's policy regarding the Lollards, in 1401.

the House of Commons that the widest divergence of opinion would be looked for ; a year and a half before the commons had chosen a suspected Lollard as their speaker. But the fall of Salisbury, and the desertion of Sir Lewis Clifford¹, who formally renounced Lollardy in 1402, must have weakened them. Sir John Cheyne no longer represented Gloucestershire, and Sir John Oldcastle had not yet been elected for Herefordshire. It must not however be supposed that the revival of doctrinal zeal affected the relations of the national church to Rome in other points. The same parliament that passed the statute of Lollardy urged the exact execution of the statute of provisors², and showed no reluctance to confiscate the property of the alien priories which Henry had restored in the previous year³; it was no time for sparing either the property or the labour of the clergy, as the king had shown by directing them to arm to repel a French invasion. The policy which Arundel dictated seemed still to combine the maintenance of orthodoxy with great zeal for national welfare. Possibly to some of the questions thus raised was owing the change of ministry which occurred at the close of the session. Scarle on the 9th of March resigned the great seal, which was given to bishop Stafford⁴, the very prelate who had been chancellor during the last years of Richard; and on the 31st of May Northbury was removed from the treasury, and Lawrence Allerthorp succeeded him. Allerthorp was an old baron of the Exchequer, who after holding office as treasurer for a year was sent to Ireland with Thomas of Lancaster, the king's son. It seems more probable that both ministers were chosen for their practical qualifications, than that any political change had taken place. It was no doubt acceptable to the clergy that a bishop should again pre-

Change of ministers,
March, 1401.

¹ Ann. Henr. p. 347.

² Rot. Parl. iii. 459, 465, 470. The king had been empowered in the last parliament to dispense with this statute in particular cases; the commons now pray that it may not be dispensed in favour of cardinals or other aliens; another petition alleged that the enactment of the last parliament had been wrongly enrolled, but this on examination was proved untrue; ibid. p. 466. Cf. Statutes, ii. 121, 122.

³ Rymer, viii. 101; Rot. Parl. iii. 456.

⁴ Rymer, viii. 181.

side in the chancery, and the restoration of Stafford may have been part of the plan of reconciliation which four years later placed the deposed archbishop Walden in the see of London.

307. The year thus begun was not less busily employed than that which preceded it. It was a year of increasing labours and increasing difficulties. The king himself spent a month in Wales in the summer, trying in vain to bring Owen Glendower to a decisive engagement. After returning to Westminster for a great council in August¹, he again mustered his forces at Worcester in October to renew his efforts. But the season was by that time too far advanced, and he returned to London without having entered Wales. The younger Percy, Hotspur as he was called, who had been acting as commander on the Welsh march, was, in repeated letters to the council, complaining of the expenses of the war. On the 17th of May he wrote to say that he could not retain his command beyond the end of the month, and on the 4th of June he repeated the warning². The apprehensions of attack from France were again becoming formidable. At a council, held probably in June, a division of opinion manifested itself: should war be declared at all, should it be declared without the consent of parliament, or should parliament be immediately summoned? The lords saw that the financial difficulty would be great; Rutland especially deprecated a new war whilst money was so scarce, and the earls of Northumberland, Westmoreland, and Suffolk thought with him. The lord Grey of Ruthyn thought it well to wait until the negotiations which were still pending had broken down, and then to refer the whole matter to parliament³. The momentary alarm passed over, and the little queen was in July restored to her parents. But money did not become more plentiful. Another great council was held in August⁴, and attended by a

Henry's
difficulties increase.

The Welsh
war in 1401.

Discussion in the council on a war with France in June, 1401.

¹ Henry was at Evesham June 3, at Worcester June 8, and spent four weeks on the border 'parum proficiens;' Mon. Evesh. p. 174. On the 21st he was back at Wallingford; and on the 25th at London. Cf. Ordinances, &c. ii. 56.

² See the letters in the Ordinances and Proceedings of the Privy Council, i. 150, 151, 152.

³ Ordinances, &c. i. 143-145; cf. p. 165.

⁴ Aug. 16; Ordinances, &c. i. 155. Adam of Usk mentions this council and the determination to go to war, p. 67.

Great council on the war, August, 1401.

very large number of knights and esquires severally summoned by letters of privy seal. In this assembly the king is said to have resolved on going to war with France and Scotland. In the winter the king ordered the collection of an aid on the marriage of his daughter Blanche to the count palatine Lewis, son of the king of the Romans¹.

In 1402
Edmund Mortimer joins Owen Glendower.

Henry's popularity was on the wane; he had not been successful in Wales; the exactions of his purveyors were a bitter source of complaint among the people²; an exaction on the sale of cloth produced loud complaints and riots in Somersetshire, where the king was regarded as having broken his promise about taxation³; an attempt was made upon his life. The next year, 1402, was one of still worse omen. In Lent the lord Grey of Ruthyn was captured by Owen Glendower. In June, Edmund Mortimer, the brother of the late earl Roger of March who had been declared heir-presumptive by Richard, fell into the hands of the rebel chief, and after a short imprisonment married his daughter, proclaimed himself his ally, and declared that he was in arms to maintain the right of his nephew to the throne⁴. The king's invasion of Wales, now become an annual event, was more than ever unsuccessful and calamitous; it lasted for three weeks, during which the army was nearly starved and nearly drowned⁵, nothing being done against the foe. As Henry's failures lessened his popularity, a mysterious

¹ The letters for collecting the aid were issued Dec. 1, 1401, and Feb. 16, 1402; Rymer, viii. 232, 242; Dep. Keeper's Rep. ii. App. ii. p. 181; the amount was 20s. on the knight's fee held immediately of the king, and the same on every twenty pounds rental of land held of the king in socage, according to Stat. 25 Edw. III. But the grant of the aid was not yet made; it was to be discussed in a great council in January 1402. See p. 37, note 4, below.

² Ann. Henr. p. 337; Eulog. iii. 387; Rot. Parl. iii. 473.

³ Adam of Usk, p. 61.

⁴ Ord. i. 185; Chron. Henr. ed. Giles, pp. 27, 30. In a letter to his tenants dated Dec. 13, 1402, Mortimer announces that he has joined Glendower in a scheme to restore Richard if he is alive, or if he is dead to place the earl of March on the throne; Ellis, Original Letters, 2nd series, i. 24; Tyler, Henry of Monmouth, i. 135. On the 28th of Feb. 1405 is dated the agreement between Glendower, Mortimer, and Northumberland, for a division of England and Wales between the three; ib. p. 150; Chron. Henr. ed. Giles, pp. 39 sq.; Hall, p. 28.

⁵ Ann. Henr. p. 343.

reaction in favour of Richard began to set in. It was currently reported that he was alive in Scotland. Franciscan friars went up and down the country organising conspiracy. In May Henry had to charge the bishop of Carlisle and the earl of Northumberland to arrest all who were spreading the false news¹; and a number of executions followed², showing that the king's patience was exhausted and his temper embittered. Walter Baldock, an Augustinian canon, and another priest who had engaged in conspiracy, were hanged. Eight Franciscans underwent the same fate, without any show of ecclesiastical remonstrance. Sir Roger Clarendon, a son of the Black Prince, with his esquire and page, perished in the same way and for the same cause. A popular rising was expected in London; Owen Glendower and the Scots were believed to hold the strings of a secret league, and the sorceries of the friars were supposed to be the causes of the ill success of the king³. In one quarter only there was light. The earl of Northumberland and Hotspur defeated the Scots at Homildon in September, and in that victory crowned the series of their services to Henry with a success which seems to have led to a final breach with him. The victory of Homildon was the one piece of good news which could be reported to the next parliament.

Rumour that Richard is alive, 1402.

Executions.

Battle of Homildon Hill, September, 1402.

308. The last instalment of the tenth and fifteenth granted in March 1401 was due in the following November, and, as a renewal of the grant would be immediately required, the parliament was summoned for January 30, 1402; but if such an assembly was ever held it left no traces whatever of its action⁴; there are no statutes, no rolls of proceedings, no

Parliamentary history of 1402.

¹ Rymer, viii. 255; cf. pp. 261, 262, 263.

² Ann. Henr. pp. 309, 340; Wals. ii. 249; Eulog. iii. 389-394; Chr. Giles, p. 28.

³ 'Arte magica,' Otterb. p. 236; 'mala arte fratrum minorum,' Ann. Henr. p. 343; Wals. ii. 251. 'All men trowed witches it were that made that stounde;' Hardyng, p. 360.

⁴ The writs for such a parliament at Westminster were issued on the 2nd of December; Lords' Report, iv. 776; and for convocation to be held the first Monday in Lent; ib. p. 778. The Rolls of Parliament contain a few petitions of the third year of Henry which might be referred to such a parliament if it were really held; but one of them speaks of the parliament as sitting at Coventry, so that probably they belong to 1404. The bishop

Parliament
meets in September 1402.

Conference of lords and commons.

Grants of
money.

writs of expenses, or of prorogation. The working parliament of the year met on the 30th of September¹; Henry Bowet, the king's old chaplain, being treasurer, and bishop Stafford still chancellor. The latter in his opening speech said what could be said for the king, but did not attempt to conceal the distress of the country. True, Henry had been, as the mightiest king in the world, invited by the king of the Romans to attempt to heal the schism in the church, and the victory over the Scots was an almost miraculous proof of divine favour. Still the realm was enduring punishment at God's hand². The commons in reply gave a proof of their earnest desire to work for the public good, that awoke the suspicions of the king; they desired, as they had done in the evil days of King Richard, to have 'advice and communication' with certain of the lords on the matters to be treated. Henry granted the request with a protest that it was done not of right, but of special favour; and four bishops, four earls, and four lords were named³. The most important business dispatched was the grant of supplies. The subsidy on wool was continued for three years, tunnage and poundage for two years and a half; and, protesting that the grant should not be made an example for taxing except by the will of lords and commons, the poor commons by assent of the lords granted a tenth and fifteenth for the defence of the realm⁴. The most important statute of the session is one which confirms the privileges of the clergy; and the majority of Norwich was, on Aug. 24, 1401, directed to attend a council to be held Jan. 27, 1402; Ordinances, i. 167; and we know from the minutes of the council held in November, that both a great council and a parliament were to be held; the aid for the marriage of Blanche was to be discussed at the council on Jan. 27; Ordinances, i. 179. One short minute of such a council is preserved; ib. p. 180.

¹ Rot. Parl. iii. 485; Eulog. iii. 395.

² 'Dieux ad mys punissement en diverse manere sur ceste roialme;' 'le roi de Rome, pur appaiser et ouster cel schisme ad escript a notre dit seigneur le roi come a le pluis puissant roi du monde;' Rot. Parl. iii. 485.

³ Rot. Parl. iii. 486.

⁴ Dep. Keeper's Rep. ii. App. ii. p. 182; Rot. Parl. iii. 493; Ann. Henr. p. 350. Great sums were borrowed in anticipation of the first instalment of the grants; letters asking for loans to the amount of 22,200 marks were issued April 1, 1403; Ordinances, &c., i. 199-203. The clergy of Canterbury met, Oct. 21, and on Nov. 27 granted a tenth and a half; Wilkins, Conc. iii. 271.

of the petitions concern private suits. The commons seem however to be fully aware of the character of the king's difficulties; they pray that the king will abstain from fresh grants, and retain the alien priories in his hands; that Northumberland may be duly thanked, Grey of Ruthyn ransomed, and Somerset restored to his dignity of marquess, an offer which he wisely declined. George of Dunbar, earl of March, whose adhesion to the king had led to the victory over the Scots, entreated Henry to recover for him his lost estates. The increase in the number of petitions, the revival of old complaints, the demand for the enforcement of old statutes, show a great increase of uneasiness. The session ended on the 25th of November¹.

Proceedings of the commons in 1402

In February 1403 Henry married his second wife, Johanna of Navarre, the widowed duchess of Brittany, an alliance which gave him neither strength abroad nor comfort at home². The same month Stafford resigned the great seal, which was intrusted by the king to his brother, Henry Beaufort, bishop of Lincoln. The appointment of Beaufort, coupled with the nomination of the prince of Wales as lieutenant in Wales, and Thomas of Lancaster, the king's second son, as lieutenant in Ireland, perhaps implies that Henry was severing himself from his old friends. Beaufort and Arundel do not seem to have acted well together, and the proud independence of the Percies was becoming, if not intolerable to the king, at least a source of danger to him as well as to themselves.

Henry
Beaufort chancellor, 1403.

309. Northumberland and Hotspur had done great things for Henry. At the outset of his reign their opposition would have been fatal to him; their adhesion insured his victory. He had rewarded them with territory³ and high offices of trust, and they had by faithful service ever since increased their claims to gratitude and consideration. The earl was growing old; he was probably some years over sixty; Hotspur was about the same age as the king. Both father and son were

The Percies.

¹ Rot. Parl. iii. 487, 488, 491, 495.

² 'Utinam fausto pede;' Otterbourne, p. 239; Ann. Henr. p. 350.

³ The earl, as late as March 2, 1403, had a grant of the Scottish lands of Douglas, which however could scarcely be a profitable gift so long as they were in Scottish hands; Rymer, viii. 289.

Growing discontent
of the Percies, 1403.

high-spirited, passionate, suspicious men, who entertained an exalted sense of their own services, and could not endure the shadow of a slight. Up to this time not a doubt had been cast on their fidelity. Northumberland was still the king's chief agent in parliament, his most valued commander in the field, his Mattathias. It has been thought that Hotspur's grudge against the king began with the notion that the release of his brother-in-law, Edmund Mortimer, had been neglected by the king, or was caused by Henry's claim to deal with the prisoners taken at Homildon; the defenders of the Percies alleged that they had been deceived by Henry in the first instance, and only needed to be persuaded that Richard lived in order to desert the king¹. It is more probable that they suspected Henry's friendship, and were exasperated by his compulsory economies. For two or three years Hotspur had been engaged in a service which exhausted his own resources, and he could get no adequate supplies from king or council. A less impatient mind might have been driven to discontent, and, when it was once known that he was discontented, the same crafty heads that were maintaining the strife on the Welsh and Scottish borders would know how to approach him. Yet Henry seems to have conceived no suspicion. In April he was employed in raising money by loan to send to Scotland. Northumberland and Hotspur were writing for increased forces. The castle of Ormes-ton was besieged; a truce made with its defenders was to end on the 1st of August; the king was to collect all the force of the country and to join in the invasion. Henry started on his journey: still the old earl was demanding the payment of arrears, and the king was fencing with him as well as he could; on the 30th of May¹ he wrote for both help and money; on the 26th of June² he told the king that his ministers were deceiving him; it was not true that he had received £60,000 already; whatever he had received £20,000 was still due. On the 10th of July Henry had reached Northamptonshire on his way northwards; on the 17th he had heard that Hotspur and his uncle the earl of Worcester were in arms in Shropshire³. They raised no cry of private wrongs, but proclaimed themselves the vindicators of national right: their object was to correct the evils of the administration, to enforce the employment of wise counsellors, and the proper expenditure of public money⁴. The king declared in letters to his friends that the charges were wholly unfounded, that the Percies had received the money of which the country was drained, and that if they would state their complaints formally they should be heard and answered⁵. But it was too late for argument. The report ran like wildfire through the west that Richard was alive, and at Chester. Hotspur's army rose to 14,000 men, and, not suspecting the strength and promptness of the king, he sat down with his uncle and his prisoner, the earl of Douglas, before Shrewsbury. Henry showed himself equal to the need.

¹ 'Comes Northumbriae rogavit regem ut solveret sibi aurum debitum pro custodia marchiae Scotiae, sicut in carta sua continetur: Egomet et filius meus expendimus nostra in custodia illa: rex respondit: aurum non habeo, aurum non habebis. Comes dixit: Quando regnum intrastis promissistis regere per consilium nostrum; jam multa a regno annuatim accipitis et nihil habetis, nihil solvitis et sic communitatem vestram irritatis. Deus det vobis bonum consilium;' Eulog. iii. 396. Other reasons are given: Henry's demand that Hotspur should surrender his prisoner Douglas (see Wavrin, p. 56; Rymer, viii. 292; Hardyng, p. 360), whilst Hotspur insisted that the king should ransom Mortimer. Hardyng gives the formal challenge made by the three Percies, embodying most of the charges made in 1405; and also makes them fight for the right of the little earl of March (p. 361). The challenge is made by the three Percies as 'procuratores et protectores reipublicae,' and charges Henry with (1) having sworn falsely at Doncaster that he was come only to recover his inheritance, in spite of which he had imprisoned Richard and compelled him to resign; (2) he had also broken his promise to abstain from tallages; (3) contrary to his oath he had caused the death of Richard; (4) he had usurped the kingdom which belonged to the earl of March; (5) he had interfered with the election of knights of the shire; (6) he had hindered the deliverance of Edmund Mortimer and had accused the Percies of treason for negotiating for his release. Hardyng, pp. 352, 353; Hall, Chr. pp. 29, 30. See also Lingard, iii. 212.

Henry suspects nothing.

Northumberland presses for money.

Rebellion of Hotspur.

His professions.

Henry's answer.

Hotspur at Shrewsbury.

¹ Ordinances, &c., i. 203.

² Ib. i. 204; this letter is signed 'Votre Mathathias,' in the old man's own hand.

³ Ib. i. 206, 207.

⁴ 'Ut personae suae possent gaudere indemnitate securitate et corrigere publicas gubernationes, et constituere sapientes consiliarios ad commodum regis et regni. Scripserunt insuper quod census et tallagia concessa regi sive donata pro salva regni custodia non sunt conversa in usus debitos sed devorata nimis inutiliter, atque consumpta;' Annales Henr. pp. 361, 362. Cf. Otterbourne, p. 240; Wals. ii. 255; Capgr. Chr. p. 282.

⁵ Ann. Henr. p. 362; cf. Eulog. iii. 395.

Battle of Shrewsbury,
July 21, 1403.

Northumberland submits.

Reality of the king's difficulties.

Want of money.

From Burton-on-Trent, where on July 17 he summoned the forces of the shires to join him¹, he marched into Shropshire, and offered to parley with the insurgents. The earl of Worcester went between the camps, but he was either an impolitic or a treacherous envoy, and the negotiations ended in mutual exasperation. On the 21st the battle of Shrewsbury was fought; Hotspur was slain; Worcester was taken and beheaded two days after. The old earl, who may or may not have been cognisant of his son's intentions from the first, was now marching to his succour. The earl of Westmoreland, his brother-in-law, met him and drove him back to Warkworth. But all danger was over. On the 11th of August he met the king at York, and submitted to him². Henry promised him his life but not his liberty. He had to surrender his castles³; his staff as constable was taken from him, and given to John of Lancaster; but Henry did not bear malice long; the minor offenders were allowed to sue for pardon⁴, and within six months Northumberland was restored to his liberty and estates.

310. Although Hotspur's demands for reform were a mere artifice, and his connexion with the Welsh proved his insurrection to be altogether treasonable, subsequent events showed that the reform was really wanted, and that the spirit of discontent was becoming dangerous in each of the estates. The cry was everywhere what had become of the money of the nation? The king had none, the Percies had received none, the people had none to give, the clergy were in the utmost poverty. Yet war was everywhere imminent. The Bretons were plundering the coast; hostilities with France were only staved off by ill-kept truces; the Welsh were still in full force. When Henry returned southwards and had gathered his forces at Worcester early in September, it was found that he could not move for want of supplies⁵. To an application which

¹ Rymer, viii. 314.

² Otterbourne, p. 244; Annales Henr. p. 371.

³ Ordinances, i. 211.

⁴ Rymer, viii. 338; Ordinances, i. 212.

⁵ Ann. Henr. p. 373; cf. Eulog. iii. 398. A council was held at Worcester; Rot. Parl. iii. 525. It appears from Sir J. H. Ramsay's was made for a grant from the clergy Arundel replied that they were utterly exhausted; and when, after an insolent demand from the courtiers that the prelates should be stripped of their equipages and sent home on foot, he had succeeded in assembling the synod of his province and obtained a grant of half a tenth, only £500 could be raised immediately on the security of the grant¹. Such a fact proves that all confidence in the stability of the government was at an end. Complaints were becoming louder, suspicions graver and more general. The parliament summoned to Coventry in December, 1403, was afterwards ordered to meet at Westminster in January, 1404²; a great council was held preparatory to the parliament, and, when it met, every accusation of misgovernment, and every proposal for restraint on the executive, which had been heard since the days of Henry III, were repeated.

The clergy threatened, 1403.

Weakness of the government.

In this parliament bishop Beaufort was chancellor, the lord Roos of Hamlake treasurer, and Sir Arnold Savage again speaker of the commons. The election of Savage was in itself a challenge to the king; his long speeches invariably contained unpalatable truths. As was generally the case, the minister spoke chiefly of foreign dangers, the commons thought and said most about domestic mismanagement, the sudden diminution of the revenue, the lavish grants of the king, the abuses of liveries, the impoverishment of the royal estates, the extravagant administration of the household. A demand for a conference of advisers resulted in a formal array of such complaints; if those complaints were satisfied, the commons would show themselves liberal and loyal³. An unexpected amount of favour was shown to the earl of Northumberland; the peers refused to find him guilty of treason; it was not more than trespass; he was Parliament of January, 1404.

Lenity of the parliament.

calculation, Antiquary, vi. 104, that the expenditure of the third year of the reign was £126,000; that of the fourth, ending September 1403, £135,000.

¹ Ann. Henr. p. 374. The clergy of Canterbury met October 7, and granted a half tenth; Wilkins, Conc. iii. 274.

² Lords' Report, iv. 785-790: it met Jan. 14, Rot. Parl. iii. 522; and sat until March 20, Lords' Report, i. 496; the great council was held before Christmas, Rot. Parl. iii. 525.

³ Rot. Parl. iii. 523, 524.

admitted to pardon and took the oath of fealty. The struggle in the north was, it seemed, to be regarded as a case of private war rather than of rebellion. The earls of Westmoreland and Northumberland were prayed to keep the peace; the commons returned thanks to the king for Northumberland's pardon, and showed the extent of the public suspicions by a petition that the archbishop of Canterbury and the duke of York might be declared guiltless of any complicity in Hotspur's rising¹. But the most significant work of the session was the attack on the household. On a petition of the commons four persons were removed from attendance on the king, his confessor, the abbot of Dore, and two gentlemen of the chamber; the king excused his servants but complied with the request, and undertook to remove any one else whom the people hated². The same day, February 8, it was determined that an ordinance should be framed for the household, and the king was asked to appoint his servants in parliament, and those only who were honest, virtuous, and well renowned. Nor did the attack stop here: the old cry against aliens was after so many years revived; the king's second marriage might, like the second marriage of Richard, be a prelude to constitutional change. The commons demanded the removal of all aliens from attendance on either king or queen; a committee of the lords was appointed to draw up the needful articles, and they reported three propositions: all adherents of the antipope were to be at once expelled from the land; all Germans and orthodox foreigners were to be employed in garrisons and not made chargeable to the household; all French, Bretons, Navarrese, Lombards and Italians were to be removed from court, exception being made in favour of the two daughters of the queen, with one woman and two men servants³. Henry yielded so graciously that the commons relaxed their rigour and allowed the queen to retain ten other friends and servants. On the 1st of March a fundamental change was introduced into the administration of the household, and a sum of £12,100 arising from various specified

Attack on the royal household.

Outcry against aliens.

Payment to the charge of the household.

¹ Rot. Parl. iii. 524-526.

² Ib. iii. 525.

³ Ann. Henr. p. 379; Rot. Parl. iii. 527; Eulog. iii. 400.

sources was set apart from the general revenue of the crown to be devoted to this purpose¹. The archbishop of Canterbury declared the king's consent to this, and made in his name a repeated declaration of his purpose to govern justly and to maintain the law. A further condescension to public feeling was made by the publication of the names of the persons whom the king had appointed to act as his great and continual council. The list contains the names of six bishops, Edward of Rutland, who had now succeeded his father as duke of York, the earls of Somerset and Westmoreland, six lords, including the treasurer and privy seal, four knights, and three others². Sir John Cheyne and Sir Arnold Savage are among the knights, and their presence shows that neither the Wycliffite propensions of the one nor the aggressive policy of the other was regarded as a disqualification for the office of councillor. A petition and enactment on the abuse of commissions of array show that the king's poverty was leading to the usual oppressive measures for maintaining the defence of the country³, and the number of private petitions for payment of annuities proves that the plea of poverty was by no means exaggerated. Yet the commons refused to believe that it was true. If we may trust the historians, the argument on the subject led to personal altercations between the king and the commons. It was not the expenses of defence, they told him, that troubled England; if it were so, the king had still all the revenues of the crown and of the duchy of Lancaster, besides the customs, which under king Richard had so largely increased as far to exceed the ordinary revenues⁴. He had too the wardships of the nobles; and all these had been granted that the realm might not be harassed with direct taxation. Henry replied that the inheritance

Declaration of the names of the council.

Petitions of 1404.

Personal discussion between the king and the commons.

¹ Rot. Parl. iii. 528. Of this sum £2000 arose from farms, £1300 from the small custom, £2000 from the hanaper, £500 from escheats, £2000 from alien priories, £300 from the subsidy on wool, and £4000 from the ancient custom. See Chr. Henr. ed. Giles, pp. 36, 37; Ann. Henr. p. 380.

² Rot. Parl. iii. 530.

³ Ib. 526.

⁴ 'Isti non inquietant Angliam multum;' Eulog. iii. 299. Neither the discussion nor the grant of the tax are noticed in the Rolls of the Parliament.

Proposal for a new tax on the land.

Close of the session, March 20, 1404.

Settlement of the succession.

of his fathers should not be lost in his days; and he must have a grant of money. The speaker answered that if he would have a grant he must reduce the customs; the king insisted that he must have both. The customs were indeed safe, having been granted for more than a year to come. The commons held out until March 20, when they broke up after discussing a somewhat novel tax on the land; it was proposed that a shilling should be paid on every pound's worth of land, to be expended, not by the ministers, but by four treasurers of war, three of whom were citizens of London¹. The grant was probably voted in this session², but the final enactment was postponed to the next parliament; possibly that the constituencies might be consulted meanwhile. The settlement of the succession on the prince of Wales and the heirs of his body, and in default on the other sons of the king and the heirs of their bodies, in order³, completed the important business of a session which must have been exceedingly unsatisfactory to the king, especially as another parliament must be called within the year to renew the grant of the customs. The influence of the archbishop, which the details of this session prove to have been still very great, obtained an increased grant from convocation in May⁴; a measure which, viewed in connexion with the later history of the year, seems to have the air of precaution. Possibly the commons were meditating, probably Arundel was anticipating, an attack on the church, to follow the attack on the royal administration.

¹ Eulog. iii. 400; Otterbourne, p. 246; Adam of Usk, p. 83; Ann. Henr. pp. 379, 380.

² 'Carta scripta sed non sigillata;' Eulog. iii. 400. The subject, although circumstantially discussed by the annalists, does not appear in the Rolls until the next session. The persons, however, nominated as treasurers were recognised as such by the Council, and the subsidy is spoken of as granted in this parliament; Ordinances, i. 220. Stow, Chr. p. 330, says that the record was destroyed lest it should make a precedent.

³ Rot. Parl. iii. 525.

⁴ The convocation of Canterbury met April 21, and granted a tenth and a subsidy (Wilk. Conc. iii. 280) on condition that their rights should be respected. Ann. Henr. p. 388; Dep. Keeper's Rep. ii. App. ii. p. 182. The subsidy was a grant of 2s. on every 20s. of every benefice or office ecclesiastical untaxed, over 100s. per annum.

In other respects the year was one of preparation and anticipation. The French were threatening the coast; the fleet, under Somerset was vindicating at great cost the national reputation at sea; the Welsh were gaining strength and forming foreign alliances; the sinister rumours touching Richard were obtaining more and more credit. In the summer Northumberland visited the King at Pomfret, and surrendered the royal castles which had been in his charge. Serle, a confidential servant of Richard, was given up to Henry and executed¹. But little else was done. In October at Coventry the 'Unlearned Parliament' met.

311. This assembly acquired its ominous name from the fact that in the writ of summons the king, acting upon the ordinance issued by Edward III in 1372², directed that no lawyers should be returned as members. He had complained more than once that the members of the House of Commons spent more time on private suits than on public business; and the idea of summoning the estates to Coventry, where they would be at a distance from the courts of law, was perhaps suggested by his wish to expedite the business of the nation³. In the opinion of the clergy the Unlearned Parliament earned its title in another way, for, although the rolls of parliament contain no reference to the fact, a formidable attempt was made to appropriate the temporalities of the clergy to the necessities of the moment. The estates met on the 6th of October; the chancellor reported that the grant of the last parliament was entirely inadequate, and the commons replied with a most liberal provision; two tenths and fifteenths, a subsidy on wool, and tannage and poundage for two years from the following Michaelmas, 1405, when the grants made in 1402, would expire; lords and commons confirmed the land-tax voted in the last

Work of 1404.

The Unlearned Parliament,
Oct. 1404.

Money
grants.

¹ Otterbourne, p. 248; Ann. Henr. p. 390; Rymer, viii. 364.

² Rot. Parl. ii. 310; Statutes, i. 394.

³ Ann. Henr. p. 391; Otterbourne, p. 294: 'nomen parliamenti laicalis.' Cf. Eulog. iii. 402; Wals. ii. 265. The writ runs thus—'nolumus autem quod tu seu aliquis alius vicecomes regni nostri praedicti apprenticius sive aliquis alius homo ad legem aliquid sit electus;' Lords' Report, iv. 792. On Coke's denial of this fact see Prynne, Second Register, pp. 123 sq.

parliament, and lord Furnival and Sir John Pelham were appointed treasurers of the war instead of the persons then nominated¹. The bold proposition that the land of the clergy should for one year be taken into the king's hands for the purpose of the war² was brought forward by certain of the knights of the shires³; but the archbishop in a spirited speech turned the tables on the knights, and pointed out that they had by obtaining grants of the alien priories robbed the king of any increased revenue to be obtained from that source. The bishop of Rochester declared that the proposition subjected its upholders, ipso facto, to excommunication as transgressors of the great charter, and the knights succumbed at once. A formal proposal that the king should be enabled to live of his own by the resumption of all grants and annuities given since 1367 was accepted by Henry but referred to a commission of lords to ascertain how it could be executed⁴. The session passed off quietly; the clergy supplemented the parliamentary grants as good subjects⁵, and the archbishop, feeling himself perhaps all the stronger for his victory, urged the king to more vigorous

Attack on the clergy in 1404.

Proposed resumption of grants.

¹ The grant was made Nov. 12; Dep. Keeper's Rep. ii. App. ii. p. 182; Rot. Parl. iii. 546; Eulog. iii. 402. The grant of the land-tax is made by the lords temporal 'pur eux et les dames temporelles, et toutz autres persones temporelles,' a departure from the now established form; it was 20s. on every £20 of land over 500 marks per annum.

² Ann. Henr. pp. 393, 394; cf. Wals. ii. 265.

³ Walsingham makes Sir John Cheyne speaker of this parliament; but he was not present as a knight of the shire in it. Sir William Esturmy, member for Devon, was speaker. Capgrave translates Walsingham, Chr. p. 287. See also Stow, Chr. p. 330. Only five towns are known to have been represented in this parliament; Return of Members (1879), pp. 266, 267.

⁴ Rot. Parl. iii. 547-549.

⁵ The convocation of Canterbury granted a tenth and a half on the 25th of November; the York clergy granted a tenth, Oct. 5; Wilkins, Conc. iii. 280; Ann. Henr. p. 394; but the king was not satisfied, and asked for a grant from the stipendiary clergy. Archbishop Arundel wrote to tell him that the proctors of the clergy had refused this; that convocation had no such power, and that there was no machinery for obtaining a representative body of chaplains. He advised that the bishops should be asked to press it on the stipendiaries by opportune ways and means; Royal Letters, i. 413; Wilkins, Conc. iii. 280. The matter was referred to the Chancellor, Treasurer, and Privy Seal, who were ordered to issue letters under Privy Seal to the bishops; they replied that the letters had better be sealed with the King's own signet; Ordinances, ii. 100, 101.

measures against the Lollards¹. The death of William of Wykeham in the autumn of 1404 enabled the king to transfer his brother Henry Beaufort from Lincoln to Winchester, a promotion which probably caused him to resign the great seal for a time. He was succeeded on the 28th of February, 1405, by Thomas Longley, who a year afterwards was made bishop of Durham.

Henry Beaufort made bishop of Winchester.

Longley chancellor 1405.

312. The following year, 1405, was perhaps the critical year of Henry's fortunes, and the turning-point of his life. Although in it were accumulated all the sources of distress and disaffection, it seemed as if they were now brought to a head, to be finally overcome. They were overcome, and yet out of his victory Henry emerged a broken-down unhappy man; losing strength mentally and physically, and unable to contend with the new difficulties, more wearisome though less laborious, that arose before him. Henceforth he sat more safely on his throne; his enemies in arms were less dangerous; but his parliament became more aggressive; his council less manageable; his friends and even his children divided into factions which might well alarm him for the future of his house.

Critical year 1405.

The difficulties of the year began with an attempt made in February to carry off the two young Mortimers from Windsor². The boys were speedily retaken, but it was a matter of no small consequence to discover who had planned the enterprise. On the 17th the lady le Despenser, daughter of Edmund of Langley and widow of the degraded earl of Gloucester, a vicious woman who was living in pretended wedlock with the earl of Kent, informed the king's council that her brother, the duke of York, was the guilty person, and that he had planned the murder of the king. Her squire, William Maidstone, undertook to prove her accusation in a duel, and the duke accepted the challenge. He was however arrested on the 6th of March, and kept in prison for several weeks³. As usual, the Attempt to seize the Mortimers.

Accusation against the Duke of York.

¹ Ann. Henr. p. 396.

² Ib. pp. 398, 399.

³ Rymer, viii. 386; he was imprisoned at Pevensey; Eulog. iii. 402; Wals. ii. 274; Otterbourne, p. 260. After seventeen weeks he begged to be released; Rymer, viii. 387: he was in full employment again in June; Ordinances, i. 270.

Great men implicated.

Quarrel of Mowbray.

Great conspiracy.

Archbishop Scrope publishes articles against the king.

first charge gave rise to a large number of informations. Thomas Mowbray, the earl-marshal, was unable to deny that he had some inkling of the plot, and archbishop Arundel had to purge himself from a like suspicion. The king forgave Mowbray and thanked the archbishop for the assurance of his faithfulness, but the sore rankled still; and in two meetings of the council held at London and at S. Alban's the king found himself thwarted by the lords¹. On the 1st of March a dispute about precedence took place in council between the earl of Warwick and the earl-marshal, the son of the king's old adversary Norfolk; it was decided in favour of Warwick, and Mowbray left the court in anger². Whilst this was going on in the south, Northumberland and Westmoreland were preparing for war in the north. Possibly the attitude of Northumberland may have been connected with the Mortimer plot, and Mowbray was certainly cognisant of both. It was said that on the 28th of February Glendower, Mortimer and Northumberland had signed an agreement for a division of England and Wales between the three³. The lord Bardolf, who had opposed the king strongly in the recent councils, had joined Northumberland, and Sir William Clifford had associated himself with them⁴. Unfortunately for himself and all concerned, the archbishop of York, Richard le Scrope, placed himself on the same side. These leaders drew up and circulated a formal indictment against the king, whom they described as Henry of Derby. Ten articles were published by the archbishop⁵; Henry was a usurper and a traitor to king and church; he was a perjurer who on a false plea had raised the nation against Richard; he had promised the abolition of tenths and fifteenths and of the customs on wine and wool; he had made a false claim to the

¹ Ann. Henr. p. 399; Stow, Chr. p. 332.

² Eulog. iii. 405; Chr. ed. Giles, p. 43; Ordinances, ii. 104.

³ Chron. Henr. ed. Giles, pp. 39, 59; Hall, Chr. p. 28. See Tyler, Henry of Monmouth, i. 150. See above, p. 36, note 4.

⁴ Ann. Henr. p. 402; Otterbourne, p. 254.

⁵ Anglia Sacra, ii. 362-368. Another form, drawn up as a vindication of the archbishop after his death, by Clement Maidstone, is given in the same work, p. 369. See also Rogers, Loci e Libro Veritatum T. Gascoigne, pp. 225-231; Foxe, Acts and Monuments, iii. 230 sq.

crown; he had connived at Richard's murder; he had illegally destroyed both clerks and prelates; and without due trial had procured the deaths of the rebel earls, of Clarendon and of Hotspur; he had confirmed statutes directed against the pope and the universities; he had caused the destruction and misery of the country: the tenth article was a protest that these charges were not intended to give offence to the estates of the realm. Another document stated the demands of the insurgents in a less precise form¹. They demanded a free parliament, to be held at London, to which the knights of the shire should be duly elected, without the arbitrary exclusion which the king had attempted in the parliament of Coventry. Before this assembly four chief points were to be laid: the reform of government, including the relief of church and nation from the unjust burdens under which both were groaning; the regulation of proceedings against delinquent lords, which had been a fruitful cause of oppression; the relief of the third estate, gentlemen, merchants, and commons, to be achieved by restricting the prodigality of the crown; and the rigorous prosecution of war against public enemies, especially against the Welsh². These demands, which were circulated in several different forms, certainly touched all the weak points of Henry's administration, and, although it must ever remain a problem whether the rising was not the result of desperation on the part of Northumberland and Mowbray rather than of the hope of reform conceived by Scrope, their proposals took a form which recommended itself to all men who had a grievance. As soon as it was known that the lords were in arms Henry hastened to the north, and having reached Derby on the 28th of May summoned his forces to meet at Pomfret³. The contest was quickly decided. The earl of Westmoreland, John of Lancaster, and Thomas Beaufort, at the head of the king's forces, encountered the rebels on Shipton moor and offered a parley. The archbishop there met the earl of Westmoreland, who promised to lay before the king the

The rebels propose to lay their complaints before parliament.

Military operations, 1405.

¹ Ann. Henr. pp. 403-405; Wals. ii. 422.

² Another form occurs in the Eulogium, iii. 405. See also Capgrave, Chr. p. 289; Chron. Henr. ed. Giles, p. 44.

³ Ordinances, i. 264; Rymer, viii. 400.

Arrest of the lords, 1405.

articles demanded. The friendly attitude of the leaders misled the insurgent forces; they dispersed, leaving Scrope and Mowbray at the mercy of their enemies, and they were immediately arrested. In spite of the earnest pleading of archbishop Arundel¹ and the refusal of the chief-justice, Sir William Gascoigne, to sanction the proceedings, the king allowed his better judgment to be overruled by the violence of his followers². On the advice of Thomas Beaufort and the earl of Arundel, he determined to sacrifice his prisoners: he obtained the assistance of Sir William Fulthorpe, who acted as president of the tribunal of justices assigned³, and on the 8th of June the archbishop and the earl-marshal were beheaded. That done, the king followed the earl of Northumberland and Bardolf to the north. They fled to Scotland, and Henry, having seized the castles of the Percies, returned to the task of defence against the Welsh.

Execution of Scrope and Mowbray,
June 1405.

Effect of Scrope's execution.

It was no wonder that the body of the murdered archbishop began at once to work miracles⁴; he was a most popular prelate, a member of a great Yorkshire house, and he had died in the act of defending his people against oppression. Nor is it wonderful that in popular belief the illness which clouded Henry's later years was regarded as a judgment for his impiety

¹ Ann. Henr. p. 408; Eulog. iii. 407.

² See his account as given to the pope, in Raynaldi, Ann. Eccl. viii. 143.

³ It seems improbable that Fulthorpe should under any circumstances have ventured to try Scrope and Mowbray, and it is far more likely that the annalist is right in saying that they were formally condemned by the earl of Arundel and Beaufort, although Beaufort was not one of their peers; Ann. Henr. p. 409. Mowbray, however, although called earl Marshall, was never summoned to parliament, and may not have been regarded as a peer. Sir William Fulthorpe is mentioned in the Rolls of Parliament as trying the minor offenders; Rot. Parl. iii. 633. The statement that Gascoigne refused to pass sentence on Scrope, and that Fulthorpe did it, is made very circumstantially by Clement Maidstone; Ang. Sac. ii. 369 sq. The Chronicle edited by Dr. Giles, p. 45, adds that Randolph Everis and Fulthorpe passed sentence by special commission. Hardyng says that Sir John Lamplugh and Sir William Plumpton were beheaded near York, and that Sir Ralph Hastings, Sir John Fauconberg, Sir John Colville of the Dale, and Sir John Ruthyn were beheaded at Durham (p. 363). Cf. Stow, Chr. p. 333; Rot. Parl. iii. 604.

⁴ A list of the offerings at his shrine, and letters from archbishop Arundel, bishop Longley, the king, and John of Lancaster, urging the dean and chapter to prevent pilgrimages, are in the York Fabric Rolls, pp. 193, 225, 226.

in laying hands on the archbishop. English history recorded no parallel event; the death of Becket, the work of four unauthorised excited assassins, is thrown into the shade by the judicial murder of Scrope. Looked at apart from the religious and legal question—and the latter in the case of Mowbray is scarcely less significant than the former in the case of Scrope—these executions mark a distinct change in Henry. Much blood had been shed formally and informally since he claimed the throne; but in no one case had he taken part in direct injustice, or allowed personal enmity or jealousy to make him vindictive. Here he had cast away every scruple; he had set aside his remembrance of the man who had placed him on the throne on the day of Richard's deposition; he sinned against his conviction of the iniquity of laying hands on a sacred person; he disregarded the intercessions of archbishop Arundel, his wisest friend; he shut his eyes to the fact that he was giving to his enemies the honour of a martyr; he would not see that the victory which he had won had removed all grounds for fear. He allowed his better nature to be overcome by his more savage instinct. The act, viewed morally, would seem to be the sign of a mind and moral power already decaying, rather than a sin which called down that decay as a consequence or a judgment.

Imprudence of the act.

In August the king went into Wales, where the French were assisting Glendower, and where he was, as in 1402, prevented by the floods from doing any work. On his return, at Worcester, the proposal to plunder the bishops was repeated, as it had been in 1403, and sternly repelled by the archbishop. But continued ill-luck produced its usual effect; from every department of the state, from every minister, from every dependency, from Wales, Ireland, Guienne, and Calais, from army and fleet, came the same cry for money¹; and in answer the

New attack on the prelates, 1405.

Great want of money.

¹ In the parliament of 1404, John of Lancaster is described as being in great dishonour and danger for want of money for his soldiers on the North Marches; Rot. Parl. iii. 552. The prince of Wales is in great distress for the same cause; Ord. i. 229. Thomas had been crying out for supplies for Ireland since 1401; Royal Letters of Henr. IV, pp. 73, 85. The tradesmen of Calais were in despair (Aug. 17, 1404); ib. p. 290. In 1405 lord Grey of Codnor the governor of South Wales could get no king could only say that he had none and knew not where to procure any. The year 1405 was a year of action, the next year was almost entirely occupied with discussions in parliament, the longest hitherto known and, in a constitutional point of view, one of the most eventful.

• Proceedings in parliament, March 1406.

313. It opened on the 1st of March¹: the chancellor in his speech announced that the king wished to govern himself by the advice of his wise men, and Sir John Tibetot was chosen speaker. The cause of the summons was announced to be the defence of the king's subjects against their enemies in Wales, Guienne, Calais, and Ireland; but the deliberations of the parliament almost immediately took a much wider scope. On the 23rd of March the speaker, after a protest and apology, announced that the commons required of the king 'good and abundant governance,' and on the 3rd of April explained the line of policy which they recommended for the national defence; the prince of Wales should command in person on the Welsh Marches; and the protection of the sea should be entrusted to a body of merchants who were ready to undertake the task on condition of receiving the tunnage and poundage and a quarter of the subsidy on wool. After a supplementary demand that the Bretons should be removed from court, and that the king should retain in his hands, at least for a short time, the estates forfeited by the Welsh rebels, the houses adjourned until after Easter². The estates met again on the 30th of April; and it was at once manifest that a brisk discussion of the administration was impending. On the 8th of May the

The merchants undertake the defence at sea.

wages; Ord. i. 277. In the parliament of 1406, when the associated merchants applied to the king for £4000, he replied that 'il n'y ad de quoy;' Rot. Parl. iii. 570. As late as 1414 the duke of Bedford sold his plate to pay the garrison of Berwick, where wages were £13,000 in arrear; ib. ii. 136. The issues of the several years are given by Sir J. H. Ramsay in his article in the Antiquary, vi. 104, where they can be ascertained. It is there shown that there was a great want of economy in all departments.

¹ Rot. Parl. iii. 567.

² Ib. iii. 569-571; Rymer, viii. 437, 438. The merchants nominated Nicolas Blackburn their admiral April 28; Rymer, viii. 439; cf. p. 449. The plan failed and the king stayed the supply of money Oct. 20; Rymer, viii. 455; Rot. Parl. iii. 610.

day was fixed for the departure of the aliens¹; on the 22nd the king was prevailed on to nominate a council of seventeen members, two of whom were Sir John Cheyne and Sir Arnold Savage². Archbishop Arundel having stated that the councillors would not serve unless sufficient means were placed in their hands to carry into effect the 'good governance' that was required, the commons addressed to the king a formal remonstrance on the condition of the coasts and dependencies of England. To this Henry could only reply that he would order the council to do their best³. On the 7th of June the speaker followed up the attack with still plainer language. The king, he said, was defrauded by the collectors of taxes; the garrison of Calais was composed of sailors and boys who could not ride; the defence of Ireland was extravagantly costly, yet ineffective; but above all, the king's household was less honourable and more expensive than it had ever been, and was composed, not of valiant and sufficient persons, but for the most part of a rascally crew; again, he urged, the state of affairs required good and abundant governance⁴. Under this show of remonstrance and acquiescence—for the king agreed to all that the commons proposed—there was going on, as we learn from the annalist, a struggle about supplies. The commons had demanded that the accounts of Pelham and Furnival should be audited; the king declared that kings were not wont to render accounts; the ministers said that they did not know how to do it; the commissioners appointed to collect the taxes imposed in the last parliament did not venture to execute their office from a doubt of their authority⁵. At last, on the 19th of June, when the commons were about to separate⁶, the question of account was conceded, the commons were allowed to choose the auditors, and the speaker announced that they had granted a supply of money for current expenses⁷; the king might have an additional poundage of a shilling for a year and a certain fraction of the produce of the subsidy on wool, but the aliens must be

Expulsion of aliens, May.

Nomination of council.

Complaints against the king's servants.

Complaints against the household,
June 1406.

Struggle for the audit of accounts.

¹ Rot. Parl. iii. 571; Ann. Henr. p. 419.

² Rot. Parl. iii. 572.

³ Ib. iii. 573.

⁵ Eulog. iii. 409.

⁶ Rot. Parl. iii. 577.

⁴ Ib. iii. 577.

⁷ Ib. iii. 578.

Restriction on the king's gifts.

dismissed at once, and the council must before Michaelmas ascertain what economies could be made in the annuities granted by the king and in the administration of the alien priories. They also insisted on the king's abstaining from bestowing any gifts until the debts of the household had been paid and regulations made for putting an end to the outrageous and excessive expenditure. The parliament then adjourned to the 13th of October.

Adjournment, June 19.

Henry's illness,

During the recess, it would appear, Henry's health showed unmistakeable signs of failure. He had been ill ever since his journey into the north in 1405; whether his disease were leprosy, as the chroniclers say, or an injury to the leg aggravated by ague, as we might gather from records, or a complication of diseases ending in epilepsy, as modern writers have inferred¹, he had before the meeting of parliament become far too weak to resist the pertinacious appeals of the commons.

Second session of 1406.

The second session lasted from the 13th of October until the 22nd of December. On the 18th of November the speaker again came before the king with the old complaint and begged that he would charge the lords on their allegiance to take up the work of reform²; but the conclusion of the complicated transactions of the year is recorded on the 22nd of December. On that day the king empowered the auditors to pass the accounts of Pelham and Furnival³; a grant of a fifteenth and tenth, tunnage and poundage, was made by the commons 'for the great confidence which they had in the lords elected and ordained to be of the continual council⁴;' and the other acts of the session were ordered to be ingrossed under the eye of a committee elected by the commons⁵. The same day a body of articles was presented, which the councillors at the king's

Vote of confidence in the council.

¹ See Plummer's Fortescue, p. 7, note 1. On the 28th of April 1406, the King had hurt his leg and was so ill with ague that he could not travel; Ordin. i. 290.

² Rot. Parl. iii. 579.

³ Ib. iii. 584.

⁴ Ib. iii. 568. A list of the council nominated Nov. 27 is in the Ordinances, i. 295; it is somewhat different from the lists of May 15 and Dec. 22; Rot. Parl. iii. 572, 585; but the three commoners, Hugh Waterton, John Cheyne, and Arnold Savage, appear both in May and in November.

⁵ Rot. Parl. iii. 585.

command swore to obey¹. These articles comprise a scheme of reform in government, and enunciate a view of the constitution far more thoroughly matured than could be expected from the events of late years. It had pleased the king to elect and nominate councillors pleasing to God and acceptable to his people, in whom he might have good confidence, to advise him until the next parliament, and some of them to be always in attendance on his person; he would be pleased to govern in all cases by their advice, and to trust it. This preamble is followed by thirty-one articles, which forbid all gifts, provide for the hearing of petitions, prohibit interference with the common law, enforce regularity and secrecy, and set before the members as their chief aim the maintenance of economy, justice, and efficiency in every public department. The records of the privy council contribute some further articles² which were either withdrawn or kept private; a good controller was suggested for the household, Sir Arnold Savage or Sir Thomas Bromflete; ten thousand pounds of the new grant might be devoted to the expenses of that department; but, most significant of all, it was desired that the king should after Christmas betake himself to some convenient place where, by the help of his council and officers, might be ordained a moderate governance of the household, such as might be for the future maintained to the good pleasure of God and the people³. The demands of the commons and the concessions of the king almost amounted to a supersession of the royal authority. This done, the parliament broke up, after a session of 159 days. The expenses of the knights and borough members nearly equalled the sum bestowed on the royal necessities: £6000 were granted to Henry on the last day of the parliament; the wages of the representatives amounted to more than £5000⁴.

Scheme of reform in government

Scheme of reform invoiced in council.

Length and cost of the session of 1406.

¹ Rot. Parl. iii. 585-589.

² Ordinances, i. 283-286.

³ Ordinances, i. 206. Henry V in the first year of his reign was advised by the council to stay in the neighbourhood of London, that he might be within reach of news from all sides; ib. ii. 125.

⁴ The returns from thirty-seven counties and seventy-eight boroughs are known. The wages of the knights (knites-mete, Capgr. Chr. p. 293) amounted to £2595 12s. 0d. Those of the other members calculated on

Acts of succession to the crown in 1406.

Legislation against the Lollards.

Reform in county elections, 1406.

The whole time of the parliament was not, however, occupied in these transactions; one most important legislative act was the resettlement of the succession. On the 7th of June the crown was declared to be heritable by the king's sons and the male heirs of their body in succession; this measure involved a repeal of the act of 1404, by which the crown was guaranteed to the heirs of the body of the sons in succession. It was no doubt intended to preclude a female succession. Such a restriction was, however, found to entail inconvenient consequences; and on the 22nd of December it was repealed and the settlement of 1404 restored¹. A new statute against the Lollards, founded on a petition of the commons and supported by the prince of Wales, was likewise passed, with the royal authorisation, in December². Sentence of forfeiture was passed against Northumberland and Bardolf, but the lords avoided giving a positive opinion as to the guilt of archbishop Scrope³. One most important statute of the year introduced a reform into the county elections, directing that the knights should be chosen henceforth, as before, by the free choice of the county court, notwithstanding any letters or any pressure from without, and that the return should be made on an indenture containing the names and sealed with the seals of all who took part in the election⁴. The liberality of the parliament was, as usual, supplemented by a grant of a tenth from the clergy in convocation and by an exaction from the stipendiary priests of a noble, six and eightpence, a head⁵.

the same principle would make £2854 16s. od.; all together £5450 8s. od. See Prynn, Fourth Register, pp. 477-481.

¹ Rot. Parl. iii. 574-576, 580-583; Statutes, ii. 151; Rymer, viii. 462-464. The act asserts that the reason for the change was 'quod statutum et ordinatio hujusmodi jus successionis eorundem filiorum suorum et liberorum eorum, sexum excludendo femininum, nimium restringebat, quod aliquo modo diminuere non intendebant, sed potius adaugere.'

² Rot Parl. iii. 583, 584. The exact purport of this act will be found discussed in another chapter; below, § 404. It is not enrolled as a statute.

³ Rot. Parl. iii. 593, 604-607.

⁴ Ib. iii. 601; Statutes, ii. 156.

⁵ The convocation, which sat from May 10 till June 16, granted a tenth and a subsidy; Wilk. Conc. iii. 284. The subsidy was the 'priests' noble;' Record Report, ii. App. ii. p. 183. The York clergy followed the example, Aug. 18; Wilk. Conc. iii. 303; cf. Stow, Chr. p. 333.

The parliament of 1406 seems almost to stand for an exponent of the most advanced principles of medieval constitutional life in England.

Importance of the parliament of 1406.

The foreign relations of England during the year were comparatively easy. The civil war which broke out in Scotland on the death of Robert III prevented any regular warfare in the north; and against Owen Glendower, with whom Northumberland and Bardolf sought an asylum, nothing great was attempted. The intestine troubles of France, where the dukes of Burgundy and Orleans were contending for supremacy, made it unnecessary for Henry to do more than watch for his opportunity. Notwithstanding then a certain amount of disaffection at home, and in spite of the somewhat impracticable conduct of the parliament, the political position of the king was probably stronger at this time than it had been since the beginning of the reign.

Foreign
relations.

314. It is, however, from this point that may be traced the growth of those germs of domestic discord which were in process of time to weaken the hold of the house of Lancaster upon England, and ultimately to destroy the dynasty. Henry himself was now a little over forty; and his sons were reaching the age of manhood. The prince of Wales was in his nineteenth year; Thomas, the second son, was seventeen; John, the third, was sixteen; and Humphrey, the youngest, fifteen. Besides these, the family circle included the king's three half-brothers, John Beaufort, who now bore the title of earl of Somerset, and was high chamberlain; Henry, bishop of Winchester; and Sir Thomas Beaufort, knight. The sons were clever, forward, and ambitious boys; the half-brothers accomplished, wary, and not less ambitious men. The act by which Richard II had legitimised the Beauforts placed their family interest in the closest connexion with that of the king; for, although that act did not in terms acknowledge their right of succession to the throne, in case of the extinction of the lawful line of John of Gaunt, it did not in terms forbid it¹; and as heirs of John of Gaunt they sons.

The king's

His half-brothers.

¹ On this subject see Sir Harris Nicolas's article in the Excerpta Historica, pp. 152 sq.

would, even if the crown went off into another line, have claims on the duchy of Lancaster. But such a contingency was improbable; the four strong sons of Henry gave promise of a steady succession, and in the act of 1406, by which the crown was entailed on them successively, it was not thought necessary to provide for the case of the youngest son's death without issue. Still the Beauforts had held together as a minor family interest; they seem to have acted in faithful support of the king under all circumstances, and they possessed great influence with the prince of Wales. Henry Beaufort is said to have been his nephew's tutor, and he certainly was for a long time his confidential friend and adviser. The three brothers were the king's friends, the old court party revived in less unconstitutional guise; maintaining the family interest under all circumstances, opposing the parliament when the parliament was in opposition, and opposing the archbishop when the clergy were supporting the cause of the parliament. The archbishop to a great extent embodied the traditions, dynastic and constitutional, of the elder baronage. The Beauforts were the true successors to the policy of John of Gaunt, and seem to have inherited both his friendships and his jealousies, in contrast, so far, with the king, who throughout his life represented the principles, policy, and alliances of the elder house of Lancaster. If the Beauforts were a tower of strength to the king, their very strength was a source of danger.

Political position of the Beau-forts.

The young lords of Lancaster had been initiated early in public life. Henry had been an eyewitness of the revolution of 1399, and had retained some affection and respect for his father's victim. At a very early age he had been entrusted with command in Wales, and fought at the battle of Shrewsbury; he was popular in parliament, and had now become an important member of the council. Thomas, the second son, high admiral and lord high steward of England, had been employed in Ireland, where he was made lieutenant in 1401, and where he had early learned how utterly impossible it was to carry on government without supplies. John, the third son, was made constable in 1403, and remained for the most part in Employment of the king's sons.

England assisting his father in command of the north¹. He, Family division. like Henry, was a good deal under the influence of the Beauforts, whilst Thomas, who possibly was somewhat jealous of his elder brother, was opposed to them. Between Arundel and the Beauforts, the court, the parliament, the mind of the king himself, were divided.

One result of the parliamentary action of 1406 was the resignation of the chancellor, Longley, who on the 30th of Arundel again chancellor, 1407. January, 1407, was succeeded by archbishop Arundel, now chancellor for the fourth time². Ten days later the king confirmed the act by which Richard legitimised the Beauforts, but Legitimation of the Beauforts confirmed with a limit. in doing so, he introduced the important reservation 'excepta dignitate regali³.' These words were found interlined in Richard's grant on the Patent Rolls, although they did not occur in the document laid before parliament in 1397, which alone could have legal efficacy. Such an important alteration the Beauforts must have regarded as a proof of Arundel's hostility; their father had had no love for either the archbishop or the earl; one at least of the brothers must have felt that he had little gratitude to expect from the Arundels. They drew nearer to the prince of Wales and away from the king. The increasing weakness of Henry gave the prince a still more important position in the council; and the still undetermined question of the loyalty of the duke of York, in whom the prince seems to have reposed a good deal of confidence, probably complicated the existing relations. There was too, no doubt, some germ of that incurable bane of royalty, an incipient jealousy of the father towards the son.

The Beauforts adhere to the prince of Wales.

315. A terrible visitation of the plague desolated England Parliament of 1407. in 1407. The rumours that Richard was alive were renewed. The prince of Wales found employment in both marches, for since the rebellion of Northumberland he had taken work on the Scottish border also. The parliament of the year was held at Gloucester; it sat from October 20th until December

¹ He was made warden of the East March, Oct. 16, 1404; Ordinances, i. 269.

² Rymer, viii. 464.

³ Excerpta Historica, p. 153.

Money
grants.

2nd, and, being under the influence of Arundel, showed itself liberal and forbearing¹. The archbishop preached the opening sermon, on the text 'Honour the king.' Thomas Chaucer was speaker. On the 9th of November Arundel announced that the accounts of the recent grants had been spontaneously submitted by the council to the inspection of the commons; that the council had been obliged to borrow large sums², and wished to be relieved from the oath drawn up in the preceding year. On the 2nd of December a grant was made of a fifteenth and tenth, and a half of the same³; of the subsidy on wool, and tunnage and poundage for two years; the king undertaking not to ask the nation for money for two years from the next March⁴. The statutes and petitions of the session were mostly devoted to the reduction and pacification of Wales. The merchants were relieved from the defence of the sea, and severe measures were taken against extortionate purveyors⁵. It was enacted that foreigners should be compelled to contribute to the fifteenths and tenths⁶. One discussion, and that historically an important one, disturbed the harmony of the session.

The commons claim the right to declare all grants of money by the mouth of their speaker.

The principle that money grants should be initiated in the house of commons, involved the reasonable doctrine that the poorest of the three estates should be left to state the maximum of pecuniary exaction, and that the representatives of the great body of payers should fix the amount of taxation. That principle had grown into practice but had not yet received authoritative recognition. This session saw a long step taken towards that recognition. On the 21st of November the king in consultation with the lords put to them the question what amount of aid was necessary for the public defence; the lords

¹ Rot. Parl. iii. 608.

² A loan of £10,900 was contracted for the payment of the Calais garrison, on the credit of the lords of the council, June 27, 1407; Rymer, viii. 488.

³ Dep. Keeper's Rep. ii. App. ii. p. 184; Rot. Parl. iii. 612 sq. The clergy of York voted a tenth in December 1408; Wilk. Conc. iii. 319.

⁴ On the 1st of February, 1408, the king by letters patent undertook to retain for the expenses of the household all proceeds of the alien priories, vacant sees, wardships, marriages, forfeitures, escapes and fee farms; Rymer, viii. 510.

⁵ Rot. Parl. iii. 609.

⁶ Statutes, ii. 161.

in reply mentioned the sums that were subsequently granted; the king then summoned a number of the commons to hear and report to the house the opinion of the lords. Twelve of the commons attended and reported the message. The house at once took alarm; 'the commons were thereupon greatly disturbed,' saying and affirming that this was in great prejudice and derogation of their liberties. Henry, who had certainly no object in derogating from the rights of the commons, and who had probably acted in mere inadvertence, as soon as he heard of the commotion, yielded the point, and with the assent of the lords gave his decision to the effect that it was lawful for the lords to deliberate in the absence of the king on the state of the realm and the needful remedies; that likewise it was lawful for the commons to do the same; provided always that neither house should make any report to the king on a grant made by the commons and assented to by the lords, or on any negotiations touching such grant, until the two houses had agreed; and that then the report should be made through the speaker of the commons¹. This decision has its important relations to earlier and later history; here it appears as a significant proof of the position which the house of commons had already won under the constitutional rule of Lancaster.

Rule established.

316. For two years Arundel retained the great seal, and the country, as it had desired, remained without a parliament. The great event of 1408 was the final effort of the old earl of Northumberland to unseat the king: an attempt more desperate than the last². In February, in company with lord Bardolf, the abbot of Hales, and the schismatic bishop of Bangor, he advanced into Yorkshire, and on the 19th was defeated by Sir Thomas Rokeby, at the head of the forces of the shire, on Bramham Moor. The old earl fell in the battle; Bardolf died of his wounds; the bishop was taken. In the spring the king went to York and hanged the abbot of Hales. The Welsh war went on without any show of spirit on either side; France had her own troubles to attend to. The king and the archbishop were chiefly employed in negotiations for the healing of the great schism, and for the holding of the Council of Pisa; and in the numerous councils of the clergy, for which this business gave occasion, Arundel saw his opportunity of sharpening the edge of the law against the Lollards. In 1408 councils were held both at London and at Oxford¹, where the Wycliffite party was strong and where another strong party that was not Wycliffite resented the interference of the archbishop. In January, 1409, Arundel published a series of Constitutions²; one of which forbade the translation of the Bible into English until such a translation should be approved by the bishop of the diocese or a provincial synod; whilst another prohibited all disputations upon points determined by the church. Great efforts were made to enforce these orders at Oxford, and Richard Courtenay, who was chancellor of the university in 1406 and 1410, seems to have engaged the good offices of the prince of Wales in defence of the liberties of the university³; thus helping to widen the breach between him and Arundel. As was inevitable in the present state of opinion, Arundel's oppressive measures roused both the Wycliffite and the constitutional opposition, and he did not venture to meet another parliament⁴; he resigned in December, 1409⁵. A month afterwards Henry gave the seals to his brother, Sir Thomas Beaufort, a layman

Rebellion and death of the earl of Northumberland, 1408.

¹ Rot. Parl. iii. 611.

² 'Infausta hora, nempe conceperant tantum de odio vulgari contra regem, et tantum praesumpserunt de favore populi penes se quod omnis plebs illis concurreret et adhaereret relicto rege, ita quod, cum pervenerunt ad Thresk, fecerunt proclamari publice quod ipsi venerunt ad consolationem populi Anglicani et iniquae oppressionis subsidium qua noverant se jam longo tempore oppressum;' Otterbourne, p. 262. From Thirsk they marched to Grimbold bridge near Knaresborough, where they were forbidden to cross the Nidd, and so passed round Hay Park to Wetherby, the sheriff continuing in Knaresborough. The next day, Sunday, the earl went to Tadcaster, and on the Monday the battle took place; ib. pp. 262, 263; cf. Eulog. iii. 411; Wals. ii. 278.

Foreign and ecclesiastical affairs.

Constitutions on Lollardy.

Disputes at Oxford.

Arundel
resigns.

¹ Wilkins, Conc. iii. 306.

² Ib. iii. 314-319. The seventh Constitution forbids the translation.

³ Wilkins, Conc. iii. 323; Chron. Henr. ed. Giles, p. 58; Wood, History and Antiquities of Oxford, p. 205; Anstey, Munimenta Academica, i. 251.

⁴ In a council held Nov. 21, 1409, the king assigned £6899 6s. 8d., from the subsidies, to the expenses of the household; Rymer, viii. 610.

⁵ December 21; Rymer, viii. 616. The Lord le Scrope of Masham was made treasurer at the same time; Otterb. p. 267; Wals. ii. 282.

not perhaps beyond suspicion of an alliance with the anti-clerical party which his father had led thirty years before.

317. The session of 1410¹ was opened on January 27, with a speech by bishop Beaufort, his brother having not yet assumed his office. Thomas Chaucer, of Ewelme, himself a cousin of the Beauforts², was speaker. The Lollards must have been strongly represented, as on the 8th of February the commons prayed for the return of a petition touching Lollardy, which had been presented in their name, requesting that nothing might be enacted thereon³. No such petition accordingly appears on the roll, but we learn from the historian Walsingham that it was intended to obtain a relaxation of the recent enactments against the heretics⁴. If we may believe the same writer, the party was so powerful as to attempt aggressive measures; the knights of the shire sent in to the king and lords a formal recommendation that the lands of the bishops and greater abbots should be confiscated, not for a year only, as had been suggested before, but for the permanent endowment of fifteen earls, fifteen hundred knights, six thousand esquires, and a hundred hospitals, £20,000 being still left for the king⁵. The extravagance and

Parliament
of 1410.

Proceedings about Lollardy.

Petition of the Lollards, 1410.

¹ Eulog. iii. 416; Rot. Parl. iii. 622 sq.

² Thomas Chaucer of Ewelme in Oxfordshire was son of a sister of Katherine Swinford. The king warned him, when he admitted him as speaker, that nothing should be said but what was honourable and likely to produce concord; Rot. Parl. iii. 623.

³ Rot. Parl. iii. 623.

⁴ Wals. ii. 283; they petitioned for an alteration of the statute of heresy, and that clerks convicted might not be committed to the bishops' prisons. The Rolls contain a petition that persons arrested under the statute of 1401 may be bailed in the county where they are arrested, and that such arrests may be made by the sheriffs regularly: but 'le roy se voet ent aviser;' Rot. Parl. iii. 626. The Eulogium (iii. 417) mentions a statute made in this parliament allowing friars to preach against the Lollards without licence from the bishops. In a convocation held Feb. 17, 1409, the statute 'de heretico' of 1401 was rehearsed at length; Wilk. Conc. iii. 328.

⁵ Wals. ii. 282, 283. Fabyan, p. 575, gives a full account of the scheme; the temporalities of the prelates are estimated at 332,000 marks per annum. It is also described in Jack Sharp's petition in 1431. It is added that £110,000 might be secured for the king; £110,000 for a thousand knights and a thousand good priests, and still there would be left to the clergy £143,724 10s. 4½d. And all this without touching the temporalities of colleges, chantries, Premonstratensian canons, cathedrals, monks, nuns, Carthusians, Hospitallers, or Crouched Friars: Amundesham (ed. Riley), i. 453-456.

absurdity of such a demand insured its own rejection: the lords did not wish for a multiplication of their rivals; the commons in a wiser moment would scarcely have desired to give strength to the element which, as represented by the Percies and their opponents, had nearly torn the kingdom to pieces. The prince of Wales stoutly opposed the proposal, and it was rejected. The king asked to be allowed to collect an annual tenth and fifteenth every year when no parliament was sitting¹. This was refused, but he obtained a gift of 20,000 marks and grants of tenths, fifteenths, subsidies, and customs which lasted for two years². Notwithstanding the Lollard movement, two years of steady government had benefited the country. Still the petitions of the commons testify much uneasiness as to the governance, both internal and external, of the realm³, and the economy of the court which they tried to bind with stringent rules. It was remembered that in Richard's time the subsidy on wool had brought up the national income to £160,000; although the subsidy on wool could not now be calculated at more than £30,000, there were hopes that it might rise again⁴. Half the tenth and fifteenth granted in 1410 reached the sum of £18,692, and, although the charges upon it amounted to more than £20,000, still the sum was not much smaller than it had been in the prosperous days of Edward III⁵. A statute of this

Henry asks a revenue for life.

The national income in 1410.

¹ Wals. ii. 238; cf. Otterbourne, p. 268.

² A fifteenth and a half, and a tenth and a half; Dep. Keeper's Rep. ii. App. ii. p. 184; Rot. Parl. iii. 635; Eulog. iii. 417; Wals. ii. 283. The clergy of Canterbury met to grant an aid, Feb. 17, 1410; Wilk. iii. 324. The York clergy granted a tenth, May 23; ib. p. 333. A tenth and a half-tenth is mentioned in the Ordinances, i. 342. Commissions were issued for raising a great loan the same year; ib. p. 343.

³ Rot. Parl. iii. 623-627.

⁴ Rot. Parl. iii. 625. The statement made is that the subsidy on wool in the fourteenth year of Richard brought in £160,000 over and above other sources of revenue. It was estimated at £30,000 in 1411; Ordinances, ii. 7. It was £53,800 in 1400; Ramsay, p. 102: and the whole customs in 1411 amounted to £40,600; ibid.

⁵ The half-tenth and fifteenth is £18,692 19s. 8½d.; Ordinances, i. 344, 345. The charges, £20,639 15s. 2d.; ib. p. 347: these include the sea-guard, the East March, the West March, Wales, Guienne, and Roxburgh. The estimate for Calais in time of peace was £18,000, in time of war £21,000 a year; that of Ireland about £4,500; ib. p. 352. The Issues of the year ending at Michaelmas, 1410, amount to £91,004 19s. 1d.; Ramsay, Antiquary, vi. 104.

session directed a penalty to be exacted from the sheriffs who did not hold the elections in legal form, and made the conduct of the elections an article of inquiry before the justices of assize¹. On the 2nd of May the king's counsellors were named, and all except the prince took the oath required².

318. The administration of Thomas Beaufort, like that of his predecessor, lasted only two years; and during this time it is very probable that the prince of Wales governed in his father's name. From the month of February, 1410, he appears as the chief member of the council³, which frequently met in the absence of the king, whose malady was increasing and threatening to disable him altogether. The chief point of foreign policy was the maintenance of Calais, which was threatened by Burgundy, and had thus early begun to be a constant drain on the resources of England. At home the religious questions involved in the suppression of the Lollards and the reconciliation of the schism were complicated by a renewed attack of archbishop Arundel on the university of Oxford⁴. In an attempt to exercise his right of visitation, he was repulsed by the chancellor Courtenay and the proctors. The archbishop, availing himself of his personal influence with the king, compelled these officers to resign; but, as soon as the university could assert its liberty, they were re-elected, and it was only after a formal mediation proffered by the prince that the conflicting authorities were reconciled. It is more than probable that Arundel's conduct led to a personal quarrel with the prince, who was his great-nephew; he does not seem to have attended any meeting of the privy council during this period,

The prince of Wales takes the lead in council, 1410.

Arundel again in Oxford in 1411.

¹ Statutes, ii. 162; Rot. Parl. iii. 641.

² Rot. Parl. iii. 632.

³ The prince's name appears as first in the council from December 1406; Ordinances, i. 295; cf. p. 313. A petition is addressed by Thomas of Lancaster to the prince and other lords of the king's council, June 1410; ib. 339. A parliamentary petition, granted by the king, 'respectuatur per dominum principem et consilium;' Rot. Parl. iii. 643. A council was held at the Coldharbour Feb. 8, 1410; ib. i. 329. The Coldharbour was given to the prince, Mar. 18, 1410, and he was made captain of Calais the same day; Rymer, viii. 628. He had the wardship of the heirs of Mortimer; ib. pp. 591, 608, 639.

⁴ Wals. ii. 285.

Jealousies in the royal family.

or to have lent any aid to the ministers in their attempts to raise money by loan. Long afterwards, in the reign of Henry VI, it was remembered how there had been a great quarrel between the prince and the primate, and how the etiquette observed in consequence constituted a precedent for time to come¹. A new cause of offence appears in the conduct of the king's second son. John Beaufort, the quondam marquess of Dorset, died in April 1410, and, notwithstanding their relationship, Thomas of Lancaster obtained a dispensation for a marriage with his uncle's widow. The bishop of Winchester refused to divide with him a sum of 30,000 marks which he had received as his brother's executor, and a quarrel ensued between Thomas and the Beauforts, in which the prince of Wales took the side of his uncle².

The expedition of 1411
to France.

It was at this juncture that the duke of Burgundy, finding himself hard pressed by the Orleanists, requested the aid of England. The prince of Wales³ supported his application; a matrimonial alliance between him and the duke's daughter was set on foot; and the king furnished the duke with a considerable force, which, under the command of the earl of Arundel, Sir John Oldcastle, and Gilbert Umfraville, called the earl of Kyne⁴, defeated the Orleanists at S. Cloud in November 1411, and having received their pay returned home. On the 3rd of November the parliament met again⁵.

Parliament
of 1411.

319. This assembly no doubt witnessed scenes which it was not thought prudent to record; but on the evidence of the extant rolls it is clear that it was not a pleasant session; and it is probable that the king, under the influence of Arundel or of his second son, made a vigorous effort to shake off the Beauforts. On the third day of the parliament, when Thomas Chaucer, the speaker, made the usual protestation and claimed

¹ Ordinances, iii. 186.

² Chron. Henr. ed. Giles, p. 62; Rot. Pat. Cal. p. 259.

³ Hardyng, p. 367; Rymer, viii. 698 sq.; Ordinances, ii. 19 sq.

⁴ Wals. ii. 286; Chron. Henr. ed. Giles, p. 61.

⁵ Rot. Parl. iii. 647. The council had been busy with the estimates as early as April; there was a deficit of £3,924 6s. 5d. The household expenses are £16,000; Ordinances, ii. 11, 12, 14. On the whole financial history of the reign, see Sir J. H. Ramsay's article in the Antiquary, vi. 100-106.

the usual tolerance accorded to open speaking, the king bluntly told him that he might speak as other speakers had spoken, but that he would have no novelties in this parliament¹. Chaucer asked a day's respite, and made a very humble apology. The estates showed themselves liberal, granting the subsidy on wool, tunnage and poundage, and a new impost of six and eightpence on every twenty pounds' worth of income from land². Yet, notwithstanding their complaisance, they were obliged to petition the king for a declaration that he esteemed them loyal: so great was the murmuring among the people that he had grounds of enmity against certain members of this and the last parliament. Henry declared the estates to be loyal³: but, in reference apparently to some restrictive measure adopted in the last parliament, he announced that he intended to maintain all the privileges and prerogatives of his predecessors. The parliament broke up on the 19th of December; on the 22nd a general pardon was issued⁴; and on the 5th of January, 1412, Beaufort resigned the seals⁵. The annalists of the period supply an imperfect clue to guide us through these obscurities. We are told that the Beauforts had advised the prince to obtain his father's consent to resign the crown, and to allow him to be

The speaker has to apologise.

The estates declared loyal.

At the end of the session the ministry is changed; January 1412.

¹ Rot. Parl. iii. 648.

² Dep. K. Rep. ii. App. ii. p. 184; Rot. Parl. iii. 648, 671; Eulog. iii. 419. On the 20th of November, 1410, the king ordered all persons holding forty librates of land to receive knighthood before Feb. 2; Rymer, viii. 656. The order to collect the fines thus accruing was issued May 20, 1411; ib. p. 685. The Canterbury clergy on the 21st of December granted a half-tenth; Wilk. iii. 337. The York convocation followed, Ap. 29, 1412; ib. p. 338.

³ Rot. Parl. iii. 658. The language of the roll is mysterious. The king sent the chancellor to show the commons an article passed in the last parliament. The speaker asked the king to say what he wanted to do with it. Henry replied that he wished to enjoy the liberties and prerogatives of his predecessors. The commons agreed and the king cancelled the article. The same day he declared the estates loyal. The article was possibly one of the two (Rot. Parl. iii. 624, 625) which compelled the king to devote all his windfalls to the payment of his debts, and forbade gifts. A letter of the earl of Arundel to the archbishop, complaining of having been misrepresented, probably belongs to the same business; Ord. ii. 117.

⁴ Rymer, viii. 711. Owen Glendower, and Thomas Ward of Trumpington, who personated Richard II, were excepted.

⁵ Rot. Parl. iii. 658.

The prince retires.

The Beau-forts support him.

Disagreements in the royal family, 1412.

crowned in his stead¹; that the king indignantly refused; and that in consequence the prince retired from court and council, his brother Thomas taking his place. It is to be observed that many years later, when bishop Beaufort was charged by Humfrey of Gloucester with having conspired against the life of Henry V, and having stirred him up to assume the crown during his father's lifetime, he solemnly denied the former charge, but was much more reticent as to the latter². It can scarcely be doubted that the matter had been broached, and possibly had been proposed in parliament on the first day of the session, which seems to have been opened whilst the king was absent through illness, although on the third day he was able to receive and rebuke the speaker. But whatever were the circumstances, the result is clear; Beaufort resigned the seals, Arundel returned to power; very soon afterwards the prince ceased to attend the council¹, and his brother Thomas took the foremost place; almost immediately the king transferred his friendship from the duke of Burgundy to the duke of Orleans, and sent an army to his assistance under Thomas, who in preparation for his command was made duke of Clarence. The dates of these transactions are tolerably clear. On the 5th of January Arundel took the seals; on the 18th of February the prince received payment of his salary for the time that he had served on the council: negotiations were still pending with Burgundy. On the 18th of May the king concluded his league with Orleans, the prince withholding his consent for two days longer. On the 9th of July Thomas was made duke of Clarence. Money for the expedition was raised by loan²; the archbishop lent 1000 marks, bishop Beaufort's name does not appear in the list of contributors. The result of Clarence's enterprise was neither honourable nor fortunate; finding that the contending parties had united against him, he ravaged Normandy and Guienne, and was bought off at last by Orleans. It would appear that the enemies of the prince of Wales were not content with dislodging him from power; they brought against him a slanderous charge of receiving large sums for the wages of the Calais garrison, and not paying them. The matter came before the council, and the charge was disproved³.

¹ 'In quo parlamento Henricus princeps desideravit a patre suo regni et coronae resignationem, eo quod pater ratione aegritudinis non poterat circa honorem et utilitatem regni ulterius laborare. Sed sibi in hoc noluit penitus assentire, immo regnum cum corona et pertinentiis dummodo haberet spiritus vitales voluit gubernare. Unde princeps quodammodo cum suis consiliariis aggravatus recessit et posterius quasi pro majori parte Angliae omnes procures suo dominio in homagio et stipendio copulavit;' Chron. ed. Giles, p. 63. 'Interea dominus Henricus princeps offensus regis familiaribus, qui ut fertur seminaverunt discordiam inter patrem et filium, scripsit ad omnes regni partes, nitens repellere cunctas detractorum machinationes. Et ut fidem manifestiorem faceret praemissorum, circa festum Petri et Pauli venit ad regem patrem cum amicorum maxima frequentia et obsequentium turba qualis non antea visa fuerit his diebus. Post parvissimi temporis spatium gratulabunde susceptus est a rege patre, a quo hoc unum petiit ut delatores sui si convinci possent punirentur, non quidem juxta meritum sed post compertum mendacium citra condignum. Rex vero postulanti videbatur annuere, sed tempus asseruit expectari debere parlamenti, videlicet, ut hii tales parium suorum judicio punirentur;' Otterbourne, p. 271. According to the Chronicle of London the prince came to London with a great retinue in July 1412 and attended council on Sept. 23, 'with a huge people;' Chron. Lond. p. 94; Stow, Chr. p. 339. 'Eodem autem anno facta fuit conventio inter principem Henricum primogenitum regis, Henricum episcopum Wintoniensem et alios quasi omnes dominos Angliae, uter ipsorum alloqueretur regem ut redderet coronam Angliae, et permetteret primogenitum suum coronari, pro eo quod erat ita horribiliter aspersus lepra. Quo allocuto ad consilium quorundam dominorum cedere noluit, sed statim equitavit per magnam partem Angliae non obstante lepra supradicta;' Eulog. iii. 421. Some other authorities are given in Mr. Williams' Preface to the Gesta Henrici V. Cf. English Chronicle, ed. Davies, p. 37; Elmham, ed. Hearne, p. 11.

² Rot. Parl. iv. 298; Hall, Chr. p. 133. Cf. Plummer's Fortescue, p. 7.

Arundel returns to power, and the foreign policy is changed.

Second expedition to France in 1412.

Attack on the prince of Wales.

320. In the autumn of 1412 the king became so ill that his death was expected; he had periods of insensibility, and was much troubled in mind as well as in body. It is even possible that the action of an ill-informed conscience, working upon a diseased frame, made him look back with something like remorse on the great act of his life. He had intended too to go once more on crusade⁴, and as late as November 20 held a council

Illness of the king.

¹ 'Then the king discharged the prince of his counsaile, and set my lord syr Thomas in his stede;' Hardyng, p. 369.

On the 18th of Feb. 1412 Henry received 1000 marks as his wages 'tempore quo fuit de consilio ipsius domini regis;' Pell Rolls; Tyler, Henry of Monmouth, i. 291. For the story of Henry carrying off his father's crown, see Wavrin, p. 159; Monstrelet, liv. i. c. 101.

² July 12; Rymer, viii. 757, 760; Ordin. ii. 32.

³ Ordinances, ii. 34, 35; Elmham, ed. Hearne, p. 11.

⁴ Fabyan, p. 576; Hall, Chron. p. 45; Rastall, p. 244; Leland, Coll. ii.

at Whitefriars in furtherance of the design; he had made great preparations, hoarding perhaps for the purpose even when money was most scarce. If his illness were to result in death, it would be a sign that his great atonement was not accepted. It was said that he professed that he would have resigned the crown to the right heirs but for fear of his sons, who would not part with their inheritance¹: anyhow he must have shuddered when he thought of the bloodshed with which his throne had been secured. After a very dangerous attack, however, at Christmas, 1412, he rallied, and even called his parliament to meet on the 3rd of February². The parliament met on that day, but it is not certain that it was formally opened; no record of its action is preserved; and on the 20th of March the king died. He was buried in the cathedral church of Canterbury, the great sanctuary of the English nation, near his uncle the Black Prince.

He calls a parliament and dies, March 20, 1413.

Causes of the difficulties of the reign.

This summary survey of the reign opens some important questions for which it furnishes no adequate answer. There are two hostile and most dangerous influences at work during the first half of it; the extraordinary poverty of the country, and, partly resulting from it, the singular amount of treason and insubordination which reached its highest point in the rebellion of the Percies. Of the first of these it is now impossible to say how far it was real or how far fictitious: it is possible that the country was now beginning to realise fully the result of the long-continued drain caused by the wars of Edward III and the extravagance of Richard II: it is possible that the ¹ John Tille the king's confessor moved him to do penance for the murder of Richard, the death of Scrope, and the pretended title to the crown; he replied that on the first two points he had satisfied the pope and been absolved; 'as for the third point it is hard to set remedy, for my children will not suffer that the regalie go out of our lineage;' Capgr. Chr. p. 303. The author, however, who tells this story to Edward IV, in an earlier work puts in the dying king's mouth some very pious advice to his son, and says nothing about penance; Capgr. Ill. Henr. p. 111. Hardyng (p. 369) gives a dying speech, but says that the king said nothing about either repentance or restitution. Stow, p. 340, on the other hand, has a speech full of penitence, especially warning Henry against the ambition of Clarence.

² Lords' Report, iv. 813.

public feeling of insecurity had led men to hoard their silver and gold, instead of contributing to the support of a government which they did not believe to be stable. Whichever be the true hypothesis, the king's poverty and the national distress served to augment disaffection: the hostile action of the Percies was unquestionably caused by financial as well as political disputes. The second evil influence was in great measure the result of Henry's ill-luck, his inability to close the Welsh war, and the tardiness of his preparations against France and Scotland. The moment his personal popularity waned, the popular hatred of Richard began to diminish also; the mystery of his death gave opening for a semi-legendary belief that he was still alive; and that faith, whether false or genuine, became a rallying-point for the disaffected, the last cry of desperate men like Northumberland and Bardolf. Welcome as Henry's coming had been, violence had been done to the conscience of the nation, and it needed only misfortune to stimulate it into remorse for the past and misgiving for the future. And there were physical evils to boot, famines and plague. There was the religious division to complicate matters still more; for Richard's court had been inclined to Lollardy, while Henry, under whatever temporary influence he acted, was hostile to the heretics. Yet on the whole Henry left behind him a strongly founded throne, and a national power vastly greater than that which he had received at his coronation. And some portion of the credit is due to him personally: he was not fortunate in war; he outlived his early popularity; he was for years a miserable invalid; yet he reigned as a constitutional king; he governed by the help of his parliament, with the executive aid of a council over which parliament both claimed and exercised control. Never before and never again for more than two hundred years were the commons so strong as they were under Henry IV; and, in spite of the dynastic question, the nation itself was strong in the determined action of the parliament. The reign, with all its mishaps, exhibits to us a new dynasty making good its position, although based on a title in the validity of which few believed and which still fewer under-

Poverty of the country.

Disaffection and treason.

Work of Henry IV.

Strength of the commons.

stood ; notwithstanding extreme distress for money, and in spite of much treachery and disaffection. All the intelligent knowledge of the needs of the nation, all the real belief in the king's title, is centered in the knights of the shire ; there is much treason outside, but none within the walls of the house of commons. The highest intelligence, on the whole, however, is plainly seen to be Arundel's, and next to his, although in opposition for the time, that of the prince of Wales. The archbishop knows how to rule the commons and how to guide the king ; he believes in the right of the dynasty, and, apart from his treatment of the heretics, realises the true relation of king and people. If his views of the relation of Church and State, as seen in his leading of the convocation, are open to exception, he cannot be charged with truckling to the court of Rome.

Power of archbishop Arundel.

Character of the reign of Henry IV,

in relation to that of Henry V.

321. The reign of Henry IV had exemplified the truth that a king acting in constitutional relations with his parliament may withstand and overcome any amount of domestic difficulty. He had known when to yield and when to insist, and thus, in spite of the questionable character of his title, much ill-success, harassing poverty, unwearied and unsuspected treasons, bad seasons, and bad health, he had laid the foundations of a strong national dynasty. His parliamentary action was one long struggle, but it was a struggle fairly conducted, and he, as well as the parliament, stood by the constitutional compromise, maintained the constitutional balance. The history of Henry V exhibits to us a king acting throughout his reign in the closest harmony with his parliament, putting himself forward as the first man of a nation fairly at one with itself on all political questions, a leader in heart and soul worthy of England, and crowning his leadership with ample signal successes. Henry IV, striving lawfully, had made his own house strong ; Henry V, leading the forces with which his father had striven, made England the first power in Europe. There were deep and fatal sources of weakness in his great designs, but that weakness was not in his position at home ; it was not constitutional weakness, although the result which it precipitated went a long way towards destroying the constitution itself.

It is one of the penalties which great men must pay for their greatness, that they have to be judged by posterity according to a standard which they themselves could not have recognised, because it was by their greatness that the standard itself was created. Henry V may be judged and condemned on moral principles which have emerged from the age in which he was a great actor, but which that age neither knew nor practised. He renewed a great war, which according to modern ideas was without justification in its origin and continuance, and which resulted in an exhaustion from which the nation did not recover for a century. To modern minds war seems a terrible evil, to be incurred only on dire necessity where honour or existence is at stake; to be justified only by the clearest demonstration of right; to be continued not a moment longer than the moral necessity continues. Perhaps no war ancient or modern has been so waged, justified, or concluded; men both spoke and thought otherwise in earlier times, and in times not so very far distant from our own. For medieval warfare it might be pleaded, that its legal justifications were as a rule far more complete than were the excuses with which Louis XIV and Frederick II defended their aggressive designs; for the kings of the middle ages went to war for rights, not for interests, much less for ideas. But it must be further remembered, that until comparatively late times, although the shedding of Christian blood was constantly deplored, war was regarded as the highest and noblest work of kings; and that in England, the history of which must have been Henry's guide, the only three unwarlike kings who had reigned since the Conquest had been despised and set aside by their subjects. The war with France was not to him a new war; it had lasted far beyond the memory of any living man, and the nation had been educated into the belief that the struggle was one condition of its normal existence. The royal house, we may be sure, had been thoroughly instructed in all the minutiae of their claims; the parliament insists as strongly on the royal rights as on its own privileges; and the fall of Henry VI shows how fatal to any dynasty must have been the renunciation of those rights. The a warrior.

Henry V as

Changes in the estimate of war.

War with France an hereditary doctrine.

blame of continuing the war when success was hopeless, if such blame be just, does not fall on Henry V, who died at the culminating point of his successes, and whose life, if it had been prolonged, might have consolidated what he had won. Judged by the standard of his time, judged by the standard according to which later ages have acted, even whilst they recognised its imperfection, Henry V cannot be condemned for the iniquity or for the final and fatal results of his military policy. He believed war to be right, he believed in his own cause, he devoted himself to his work and he accomplished it.

Henry V as a religious persecutor.

A similar equitable consideration would relieve him from the imputation of being a religious persecutor. He lived in an age in which religious persecution was rife; in which it was inculcated on kings as a duty, and in which it was to some extent justified by the tenets of the persecuted; for one of the miseries of authoritative persecution is that it arrays the rebel against both spiritual and temporal authority. There were indeed germs of social and political destructiveness inherent in the Lollard movement, but the government, in the policy of persecution, regarded the Lollards as active traitors, and not only regarded them as such but made them so, leagued them with the Welsh and Scots, and implicated them in every conspiracy against the reigning house. This may be lamentable, but it is a consideration which equity cannot disregard. Posterity may well condemn all persecutors who have loved persecution; it cannot without reservation condemn those who have persecuted merely as a religious or as a legal duty. Henry V persecuted, as his father had done, but, even when he persecuted on religious and not on political grounds, he did it with a singular reluctance to undertake the vindictive part of the work¹. To his mind it was a correction for the soul of the sinner, and a precaution against evils to come, not a mere exercise of justice. There is proof enough of this in the way in which he personally attempted to convert the heretic Badby¹, and in the impolitic delay which encouraged Oldcastle.

¹ Henry was reproved by Thomas Walden for his great negligence in regard to the duty of punishing heretics; Tyler, ii. 9. 57, quoting Von der Hardt, i. 501, and L'Estrange, ii. 283; Goodwin, App. p. 361.

If we set aside the charges of sacrificing the welfare of his country to an unjustifiable war of aggression, and of being a religious persecutor, Henry V stands before us as one of the greatest and purest characters in English history, a figure not unworthy to be placed by the side of Edward I. No sovereign who ever reigned has won from contemporary writers such a singular unison of praises². He was religious, pure in life, temperate, liberal, careful and yet splendid, merciful, truthful, and honourable; 'discreet in word, provident in counsel, prudent in judgment, modest in look, magnanimous in act;' a brilliant soldier, a sound diplomatist, an able organiser and consolidator of all forces at his command; the restorer of the English navy, the founder of our military, international and maritime law³. A true Englishman, with all the greatnesses and none of the glaring faults of his Plantagenet ancestors, he stands forth as the typical medieval hero. At the same time he is a laborious man of business, a self-denying and hardy warrior, a cultivated scholar, and a most devout and charitable Christian. Fortunately perhaps for himself, unfortunately for his country, he was cut off before the test of time and experience was applied to try the fixedness of his character and the possible permanence of his plans. In his English policy he appears most distinctly as a reconciling and uniting force. He had the advantage over his father in two great points: he was not even in a secondary degree answerable for the difficulties in which Henry IV had been involved by the very circumstances of his

Greatness of Henry's character.

¹ Wals. ii. 282.

² For Henry's character see Walsingham, ii. 344: 'le plus vertueux et prudent de tous les princes Christiens reynans en son temps;' Wavrin, p. 167. He was severe, 'et bien entretenoit la discipline de chevallerie comme jadis fasoient les Rommains;' ib. p. 429. See Aeneas Sylvius, De Viris Illustribus; Pauli, v. 175. Elmham and Titus Livius are professed panegyrists.

³ Henry's Ordinances for his armies may be found in Excerpta Historica, p. 28; Nicolas' Agincourt, Appendix, pp. 31 sq.; his dealings with the navy in the Proceedings of the Privy Council, vol. v. pref. cxxviii. sq.; and in Sir H. Nicolas' History of the Navy; Black Book of the Admiralty, vol. i. pp. 282, 459, &c. See also Bernard's Essay on International Law, in the Oxford Essays.

Advantages of his position compared with that of Henry IV.

elevation ; and he had, what Henry IV perhaps had not, an unshaken confidence in his own position as a rightful king. He could afford to be merciful ; he loved to be generous ; he saw it was his policy to forgive and restore those whom his father had been obliged to repress and punish. The nobility and the wisdom of this policy not only made him supreme as long as he lived, but insured for his unfortunate son thirty years of undisputed sovereignty, a period of domestic peace which ended only when the principles on which that policy was based were, by misfortune, impolicy, and injustice, themselves subverted.

He immediately dis-places Arundel,
March 1413.

322. Henry IV died on the 20th of March, and on the 21st Henry V removed archbishop Arundel from the chancery and put bishop Beaufort in his place ; on the same day he made the earl of Arundel treasurer in the place of lord le Scrope ; on the 29th he removed Sir William Gascoigne the chief justice of the bench¹. In the two former appointments nothing more was done than was reasonably to be expected. Beaufort was Henry V's minister as distinctly as Arundel was Henry IV's ; the earl of Arundel had supported him as prince contrary to the wishes of his uncle the archbishop, and it was important to the new king not to offend the Arundel interest, although he could not act cordially with its most prominent representative. The dismissal of Sir William Gascoigne can by itself be easily accounted for ; Gascoigne was an old man, who had been long in office, and a great country gentleman, who might fairly claim to rest in his later years. But tradition has attached to the name of Gascoigne a famous story, which, were it true, would have its bearing on the character of Henry V. Gascoigne had probably, for the evidence is not very clear, refused to join in the judicial murder of archbishop Scrope : popular tradition, more than a hundred years later, made him the hero of a scene in which Henry, when prince of Wales, was represented as striking the judge upon the bench in defence of an accused servant, and as obeying the mandate of the same judge when he committed him to prison for the violence done to the Dismissal of justice Gascoigne.

Legend of Gascoigne.

¹ Foss, Tabulae Curiales, p. 32 ; Dugdale, Origines, ad ann.

majesty of the law¹. It is not only highly improbable, but almost impossible that such an event could have taken place: the story was one of a series of traditions which represented Henry V as a wild dissolute boy at the very times when either at the head of his father's forces he was repressing the incursions of the Scots and Welsh, or at the head of his father's council was leading high deliberations on peace and war and national economies. The story of Gascoigne must be taken at its true value. The legends of the wildness of Henry's youth are so far countenanced by contemporary authority that the period of his accession is described as a point of time at which his character underwent some sort of change; 'he was changed into another man,' says Walsingham, 'studying to be honest, grave, and modest².' If the words imply all that has been inferred from them, Henry may at least plead that his wild acts were done in public; his follies and indiscretions, for vice is not laid to his charge, were the frolics of a high-spirited young man indulged in the open vulgar air of town and camp; not the deliberate pursuit of vicious excitement in the fetid atmosphere of a court. The question however concerns us here only as connected with the change of ministers. If there had been any real change in Henry's character, manifested on the occasion of his father's death, it would have been more likely to make him retain than remove his father's servants. One difficulty immediately resulted from the measure: the removal of Arundel from the chancery at once enabled him to renew his attack on the Lollards, and emboldened the Lollards to more hopeful resistance.

Traditional reformation of Henry V at his accession.

323. The parliament which had met before the death of Henry IV continued to sit as the first parliament of his

Henry's first
parliament,
April 1413.

¹ On this and the points of chronology connected with it, see Foss, Biographia Juridica, pp. 290 sq. Recent investigation has thrown no new light upon the story, which first turns up in Elyot's Governour, Book II. c. 6, written in 1534; cf. Pauli, Gesch. v. Engl. v. 71.

² Wals. ii. 290; Capgr. Chr. p. 303. Hardyng's words (p. 372) read like a translation of Walsingham. Fabyan, p. 577, charges Henry before his father's death with all vice and insolency; after it 'sodaynly he became a newe man.' Cf. Hall, Chr. p. 46; Elmham (ed. Hearne), p. 12; and Pauli, Gesch. v. Engl. v. 70 sq.

Taxes and statutes of 1413.

successor; but it was not called on for dispatch of business until after the coronation, which took place on the 9th of April, 1413. On the 15th of May the session opened with a speech from Beaufort, and the assembly sat until the 9th of June¹. Ample provision was made for the maintenance of the government; the subsidy on wool was granted for four years for the defence of the realm, tunnage and poundage for a year, and a fifteenth and a tenth for the keeping of the sea: and the king was allowed a 'preferential' claim on the public revenue, to the amount of £10,000, for the expenses of his household, chamber, and wardrobe². The commons spoke their minds plainly as to the weakness of the late reign and the incompleteness of national defence, the want of good governance and the lack of due obedience to the laws, which prevailed within the realm³. The law of 1406 on elections of knights was confirmed and amended with a clause ordering that residents only should be chosen⁴; the measures taken against the aliens were enforced, the king granted a general pardon, and the usual anti-papal petitions were presented and accorded. Another significant event of the year was the translation of the body of Richard II from Langley to Westminster; an act by which Henry no doubt intended to symbolise the burial of all the old causes of enmity⁵.

Arundel attacks the Lollards.

324. Archbishop Arundel had lost no time in proceeding against the Lollards. The convocation which had met on March 6 had sat by prorogation until the end of June, and ¹ Rot. Parl. iv. 3-14. The members had their wages from Feb. 3 to June 9; ib. p. 9.

² Rot. Parl. iv. 5, 6; Dep. K. Rep. ii. App. ii. p. 185.

³ 'Reherçant qu'en temps nostre seigneur le roy son pier, qui Dieux assoile, y feust pluseurs foitz requis par les ditz Communes de bon governance et lour requeste grauntee. Mes coment y feust tenuz et perfourne en apres mesme nostre seigneur le roy en ad bone conisance;' Rot. Parl. iv. 4. 'Bon governance' is defined as 'due obeissance a les lois deins le roialme;' ib.

⁴ Rot. Parl. iv. 8; Statutes, ii. 170.

⁵ December; Chr. Lond. p. 96: 'Non sine maximis expensis regis nunc, qui fatebatur se sibi tantum venerationis debere quantum patri suo carnali;' Wals. ii. 297; Otterbourne, p. 274. He had been knighted by Richard. Hardyng says also that he gave licence for offerings to be made at the tomb of archbishop Scrope; p. 372.

had voted a tenth to the king. Before this body Arundel had laid a proposition to attack Lollardy in the high places of the court. It was resolved that there was no chance of preventing the schism imminent in the English church unless those magnates who protected the heretics were recalled to due obedience¹. Of these the chief was Sir John Oldcastle, Sir John Oldcastle, lord Cobham. a Herefordshire knight, who had sat in the house of commons in 1404, and who by a subsequent marriage with the heiress of the barony of Cobham had, in 1409, obtained summons to the house of lords. Oldcastle was a personal friend of the king, and had been joined with the earls of Arundel and Kyme in command of the force sent at Henry's instigation to France in 1411. He was an intelligent and earnest Lollard, and had taken pains to spread the influence of the sect, by the preaching of unlicensed itinerants, in his Herefordshire and Kentish estates. Against him a formal presentment was made His trial and persecution. by the convocation, and after consultation with the king, who tried by personal argument to bring him over, he was summoned to appear before the archbishop and the bishops of London, Winchester, and Bangor². Having refused to receive the first citation he received a second summons to appear at Leeds on the 11th of September; not presenting himself there, he was called once more by name and declared contumacious. In consequence of this he was arrested by the king's order, and appeared before the archbishop in custody of the keeper of the Tower on the 23rd of September. A long discussion ensued, during which Oldcastle proffered an orthodox confession; but, being pressed by the archbishop with distinct questions on the main points of Lollard doctrine, he refused to renounce them. He was therefore condemned as a heretic on the 25th, and His condemnation and escape. returned to the Tower, a respite of forty days being allowed him in hopes of a recantation. Almost immediately, however, he effected his escape, and the country, which had been already alarmed by the declaration that a hundred thousand Lollards

¹ Wilkins, Conc. iii. 353.

² On Oldcastle's trial see Walsingham, ii. 291-297; Otterb. p. 274; Fascic. Zizan., pp. 433-450; Capgr. III. Henr. p. 113; Wilkins, Conc. iii. 351-357; Rymer, ix. 61-66, 89, 90; Hall, Chr. pp. 48 sq.; Foxe, iii. 320 sq.

Alarm of a Lollard rising, 1414.

Henry prevents it.

Later history of Old-castle.

were prepared to rise, was thrown into a panic. The sentence of excommunication and the rewards offered for his capture were alike ineffectual, and it was found that at Christmas an attempt was to be made to seize the king at Eltham. Henry defeated this by coming up to London, but the conspirators were not discouraged, and a very large concourse was called to meet in St. Giles's fields on the 12th of January, 1414. Henry, by closing the gates of London, prevented the disaffected citizens from joining in the proceedings, and with a strong force took up his position on the ground. Some unfortunate people were arrested and punished as heretics, but Oldcastle himself escaped for the time. He was then summoned before the justices and declared an outlaw. His later history may be briefly told. As an excommunicated man and an outlaw he was credited, rightly or wrongly, with participation in all the religious and political intrigues of the time. He failed in an attempt to excite a rebellion in 1415 in connexion, it was said, with the Southampton plot. His proceedings, overt and secret, added to Henry's difficulties in the opening of the second French campaign. When Thomas Payn, Oldcastle's secretary, was captured, Henry V declared that the taking pleased him more 'than I had gotten or given him £10,000, for the great inconveniences that were like to fall in his long absence out of his realm¹.' The writings of the Lollards were spread by Oldcastle's contrivance through the country; Oldcastle either was, or was said to be, in league with the Scots and with the Mortimer party of Wales, and to have relations with the pseudo-Richard even at the last². It is said that he ventured to propose to the king a bill for confiscating the temporalities of the church, which was presented by Henry Greyndore³, a member of a family closely connected with the Mortimers. In the year 1417, when Henry was in

¹ Ordinances, v. 105; Exc. Hist. p. 146.

² Elmham (ed. Cole), p. 151; Wals. ii. 307.

³ Capgrave, Ill. Henr. p. 121; Ellis, Orig. Letters, 2nd Series, i. 26. See also Elmham, p. 148. John Greyndore, who represented Herefordshire in the parliaments of 1401 and 1404, was a tenant of the Mortimers. Robert Greyndore was member for Gloucestershire in 1417.

France, he was captured on the Welsh marches, brought up to London, and cruelly put to death¹.

With this abortive attempt the politico-religious schemes of the Lollards disappear for many years, although the effects of the alarm were very considerable. Archbishop Arundel died in February, 1414, and his successors were more moderate, and more politic in the ways they took to repress the evil. It may be questioned whether the movement which is thus connected with the name of Oldcastle has any very definite analogy with the popular commotions of 1381 and 1450: but it is obvious that, if the prompt and resolute policy adopted by Henry V had been employed in those years, the tumults then raised might have been effectually prevented; if Richard II or Henry VI had had to deal with Oldcastle, the meeting at St. Giles's fields might have assumed the dimensions of a revolution. The character of Oldcastle as a traitor or a martyr has long been a disputed question between different schools; perhaps we shall most safely conclude from the tenour of history that his doctrinal creed was far sounder than the principles which guided either his moral or his political conduct.

Death of Arundel.

Strong policy of Henry V.

325. The alarm had scarcely subsided when the parliament met, April 30, at Leicester²; and the chancellor in his opening speech declared that one of the causes of the summons was to provide for the defence of the nation against the Lollards; the king did not ask for tenths or fifteenths, but for advice and aid in good governance. A new statute was accordingly passed against the heretics, in which the secular power, no longer content to aid in the execution of the ecclesiastical sentences, undertook, where it was needed, the initiative against the Lollards³. Judged by the extant records the session was a

Parliament at Leicester
in 1414.

New law against Lollardy.

¹ Oldcastle was captured towards the end of 1417; brought to London on a warrant of the council dated Dec. 1; and taken before the parliament as an outlaw for treason and as excommunicated for heresy. On the 14th the commons petitioned for his execution; the sentences of the justices and of the archbishop were read the same day; the lords, with the consent of the duke of Bedford the guardian of the kingdom, sentenced him to execution; and he was drawn, hanged and burned, Dec. 14; Rot. Parl. iv. 107-110; see below, p. 92.

² Rot. Parl. iv. 15-33.

³ Ib. iv. 24; Statutes, ii. 181; Wilkins, Conc. iii. 358; see below, § 404.

Statutes to be made without altering the words of the petitions on which they are based.

Promotion of the king's brothers and other kinsmen, 1414.

Confiscation of the alien priories.

Negotiations with France.

quiet one; the estates granted tunnage and poundage for three years, and obtained one great constitutional boon, for which the parliaments of Edward III and Richard II had striven in vain; the commons prayed, that 'as it hath been ever their liberty and freedom that there should no statute or law be made unless they gave thereto their assent,' 'there never be no law made' on their petition 'and ingrossed as statute and law, neither by addition nor by diminution, by no manner of term or terms the which should change the sentence and the intent asked.' The king, in reply, granted that 'from henceforth nothing be enacted to the petitions of his commons that be contrary to their asking, whereby they should be bound without their assent; saving alway to our liege lord his prerogative to grant and deny what him list of their petitions and askings aforesaid'.¹ In this session the king created his brothers John and Humfrey dukes of Bedford and Gloucester, and his cousin Richard of York, earl of Cambridge. The duke of York was declared loyal and relieved from the risks which had been impending since 1400; and Thomas Beaufort was confirmed in the possession of the earldom of Dorset². The possessions of the alien priories, which had, since the beginning of the war under Edward III, retained a precarious hold on their English estates, were, on the petition of the commons, taken for perpetuity into the king's hands³.

Although the rolls of parliament are completely silent on the subject, it may be fairly presumed that the question of war with France was mooted at the Leicester parliament; for, on the 31st of May, a few days after the close of the session which ended May 19, the bishop of Durham and lord Grey were accredited as ambassadors to Charles VI with instructions to negotiate an alliance, and to debate on the restoration of Henry's rights—rights which were summed up in his hereditary assumption of the title of King of France⁴. It is not improbable that the design of a great war was now generally

¹ Rot. Parl. iv., 22.

² Ib. iv. 17.

³ Ib. iv. 22; Mon. Angl. vi. 1642; Rymer, ix. 280, 281.

⁴ Rymer, ix. 131.

acceptable to the nation. The magnates were heartily tired of internal struggles, and the lull of war with Scots and Welsh gave them the opportunity of turning their arms against the ancient foe. The king himself was ambitious of military glory and inherited the long-deferred designs of his father, his alliances, and his preparations. The clergy were willing to further the promotion of a national design which at the same time would save the church from the attacks of the Lollards¹. The people also were ready, as in prosperous times they always were, to regard the dynastic aims of the king as the lawful and indispensable safeguards of the nation. The historians who in the later part of the century looked back through the obscurity of the civil war and the humiliation of the house of Lancaster, and still more the writers of the next century, who visited the sins of the clergy upon their predecessors, asserted that the war was precipitated by the line of defence taken up by the bishops against the Lollards; and according to the chronicler Hall the parliament of Leicester saw the first measures taken². The story runs that the petition of 1410 was introduced again by the Wycliffite knights, and that in reply archbishop Chichele suggested and argued for a French war, the old earl of Westmoreland answering him and recommending instead a war with Scotland. These exact particulars cannot be true; Chichele did not sit as archbishop in the Leicester parliament, and the speeches bear manifest tokens of later composition³. But it is by no means improbable that, the project

Prospect of war.

Share of the clergy in promoting the war.

¹ See Fabyan, p. 578; Leland, Coll. ii. 490. 'It was concluded by the said council, and in especial by the spirituality, that he should go and get Normandy, and they should help him to their power. It is said that the spirituality feared sore, that if he had not had to do without the land, that he would have laboured for to have take fro the church the temporal possessions, and therefore they concluded among themself that they should stir him for to go and make war over sea in France, for to conquer his rightful inheritance;' Cont. Polychr. (ed. 1527), f. 329.

² Hall, Chr. p. 49.

³ The parliament sat from April 30 to May 19; Lords' Report, i. 497. Chichele had the royal assent to his election March 23; but he was not provided by the pope until April 27, and received the temporalities only on May 30. His name does not occur either as archbishop or as bishop of S. David's in the parliamentary roll. Hall (Chr. p. 49) says that he was newly made archbishop, having before been a Carthusian (!). But the

of war once broached, the bishops promoted it and promised their assistance: nor does it follow that in so doing they, any more than the king or the barons, should be deemed guilty of all the misery that ensued. It is possible too that the resumption of the alien priories may have been the result of some larger proposition of confiscation. However broached, the design was not immediately prosecuted. The king asked and received sound advice from his council: the lords know well that the king will attempt nothing that is not to the glory of God, and will eschew the shedding of Christian blood; if he goes to war the cause will be the refusal of his rights, not his own wilfulness. They recommend him to send ambassadors first; if that is done, and the peace of the realm provided for, they are ready to serve him to the utmost of their power¹. In pursuance of this advice negotiations for peace with France continued. In the meanwhile the council of Constance occupied the minds of men a good deal, and the king employed himself chiefly in the foundation of his new monasteries of Sheen and Sion. But in November, when, on the failure of the negotiations, the parliament was called together², bishop Beaufort opened the session with a sermon on the text 'Strive for the truth unto the death,' supplementing the exhortation with the suggestion 'while we have time let us do good unto all men.' It was clearly the king's duty to strive for the truth; and now the time was come. The estates saw the matter with the king's eyes, and, having recommended him to exhaust the power of negotiation first, granted two tenths and fifteenths for the defence of the realm³: the clergy had already the war.

Delay of

Second parliament of 1414.

speeches abundantly supply the refutation of the story in this form; the earl of Westmoreland quotes John Major the Scottish historian who was born in 1469. Whether Hall or some contemporary writer composed them, we cannot decide; there is an outline or abridgment of them in Redmayne's Life of Henry V., composed about 1540. Hall died in 1547.

¹ Ordinances, ii. 140. The council in which this was done is not dated. Cf. Tyler, Henry of Monmouth, ii. 72.

² Nov. 19; Rot. Parl. iv. 34. A great council was held Sept. 22; in which probably the advice to go to war was given; Chron. Lond. p. 98.

³ Ordinances, ii. 150; Dep. Keeper's Rep. ii. App ii. p. 185; Rot. Parl. iv. 35.

granted their two tenths¹. Henry saw that the initiation of a great national effort should be marked by a great act of reconciliation. Measures were taken for the restoration of the heir of Hotspur, now a prisoner in Scotland, to the earldom of Northumberland²; the young earl of March was received into the king's closest confidence; the heir of the house of Holland was encouraged to hope for restoration to the family honours³. Military preparations and diplomatic negotiations were pressed on all sides. A great national council determined that war should begin. In April 1415 Henry laid formal claim to the crown of France⁴; on the 16th the chancellor announced to the council his resolve to proclaim war⁵; the duke of Bedford was to act as lieutenant of the kingdom in his absence; in June he went down to the coast to watch the equipment of the fleet; on the 24th of July he made his will; on the 10th of August he embarked⁶. But before this he had to deal with a signal, short, but most dangerous and ominous crisis. The young earl of March, the legitimate heir of Edward III, had, by his reception into the king's good graces, become again a public man. The earl of Cambridge, a weak and ungrateful man, was the godson of Richard II and brother-in-law of the earl of March: he, together with Henry lord le Scrope of Masham and Sir Thomas Grey of Heton⁷, concocted

Measures of conciliation at home.

War resolved on.

Henry's preparations, 1415.

The Southampton plot.

¹ The convocation of Canterbury was opened Oct. 1; Wilkins Conc. iii. 358: it broke up Oct. 20, after granting two tenths; Wake, p. 351.

² Wals. ii. 300; Hardyng, pp. 372, 373. Henry Percy was restored to the earldom Nov. 11, 1414. See Rot. Parl. iv. 35; Rymer, ix. 242, 244, 324; Ordinances, ii. 160 sq., 188. He was exchanged and liberated early in 1416.

³ John Holland was restored to the lands of the earldom of Huntingdon in 1416; Rot. Parl. iv. 100. He came of age March 29, 1417, or would have been restored earlier. He is called earl of Huntingdon in April 1415; Rymer, ix. 223; and was made admiral of England in 1416; Ordinances, ii. 155, 198, 199; Rymer, ix. 344.

⁴ Rymer, ix. 222.

⁵ Ib.; Ordinances, ii. 155.

⁶ On all the details of the expedition see Sir Harris Nicolas's History of the Battle of Agincourt and the notes to Mr. Williams's edition of the Gesta Henrici V. There is a statement of the revenue, June 24, 1415—June 24, 1416, in the Ordinances, ii. 172. It amounts, exclusive of the tenths and fifteenths, to £56,966 13s. 4d.

⁷ 'Francorum munere corrupti;' Otterb. p. 276; cf. Wals. ii. 305, 306. 'Prece conducti Gallorum;' Capgr. Ill. Henr. p. 114; Elmham (ed. Cole), p. 105.

a design of carrying off the earl of March to Wales as soon as Henry sailed, and there proclaiming him heir of Richard II. Henry, it was said on the information of the young earl himself¹, was made acquainted with the plot; the traitors were arrested, a commission of special justices was appointed to try them, and the verdict of a local jury presented against them. Cambridge and Grey confessed themselves guilty. Grey suffered on the 2nd of August. Scrope denied his guilt and demanded trial by his peers. A court was formed under Clarence, which passed sentence of death on Scrope and Cambridge; they were executed on the 5th of August². This was the only blood shed by Henry V to save the rights of the line of Lancaster; and for the time his prompt and stern action had its effect. His anger went no further; March was not disgraced, the duke of York retained his confidence, the heir of the unhappy Cambridge was brought up in his household. But the evil tradition of bloodshed was continued, and the heir of Cambridge and Mortimer was nourished for the time of vengeance which forty years later was to destroy the dynasty.

Execution of the conspirators, August 1415.

Tradition of bloodshed.

Henry's first French war, August to November, 1415.

Parliament
after Agin-court.

326. The wars of Henry V do not enter much into our general view of the internal history of England, except as a cause for results which are scarcely to be traced during his life. The expedition sailed on the 11th of August: Harfleur was taken on the 22nd of September; the battle of Agincourt was won on the 25th of October; on the 23rd of November the king entered London in triumph. The parliament, which met on the 4th of November³ under Bedford, signalised its gratitude by granting the custom on wool, tunnage and poundage for life, by anticipating the payment of the money

¹ Wavrin, p. 178. The earl received a general pardon Aug. 7; Rymer, ix. 303.

² Wals. ii. 305, 306; Gesta Henrici, p. 11; Rot. Parl. iv. 64 sq.; Rymer, ix. 300. The confession of the earl of Cambridge exonerates Scrope but implicates the earl of March, or rather his confessors who had refused to absolve him unless he claimed his right, and proves the guilt of Grey. Rymer, ix. 301; Nicolas, Battle of Agincourt, App. pp. 19, 20; Ellis, Original Letters, 2nd Series, i. 45; Dep. Keeper's Report, xliii. pp. 579-594.

³ Rot. Parl. iv. 62.

grant of 1414, and by a gift of another tenth and fifteenth¹. The proceedings against Cambridge, Scrope and Grey were recorded, confirmed, and completed by a decree of forfeiture².

327. From Nov. 17, 1415, to July 23, 1417, Henry devoted himself to the task of preparing the means of continuing the war. He remained, except for a few days, in England, building ships, training men, reconciling enmities at home, and strengthening alliances abroad. The victory at Agincourt had made him, as it were in an instant, the arbiter of European politics. Sigismund of Luxemburg, king of the Romans, a man whose better qualities placed him in general sympathy with Henry³, arrived at Dover in April 1416, purposing to close the schism in the church and to make peace between England and France; on the 15th of August he departed, after a vain attempt to procure a truce for three years, having concluded an offensive and defensive alliance with Henry against France. In October the king, during a short visit to Calais⁴, made a league with the duke of Burgundy, whom he had convinced of his right to the crown of France. With the minor powers of the continent, the Hanse towns, Cologne, Holland, and Bavaria, with the northern courts and Spain, negotiations for alliance were set on foot with general success. The relations with France were of course hostile in fact, although truces and armistices were concluded so as to make any general attack or defence unnecessary, whilst both powers were preparing for a decisive struggle. At home the reconciliation of Percy was accomplished; the earl of March was attached still more closely to the king; the heir of the Hollands was restored to his father's earldom; envoys were accredited for negotiating the release of James of Scotland,

Henry's stay in England,

Visit of Sigismund,

League with continental powers, 1416.

Peace at home.

¹ Rot. Parl. iv. 63, 71; Dep. Keeper's Rep. ii. App. ii. p. 186. The clergy of Canterbury granted two tenths in a convocation held Nov. 18-Dec. 3; ib.; Wake, p. 352.

² Nov. 4-12; Rot. Parl. iv. 64 sq.

³ Wals. ii. 316; Gesta Henrici, pp. 76 sq.; Ordinances, ii. 193. The history of the transactions between Sigismund and Henry, with their various results, is worked out by Dr. Max Lenz, in his 'König Sigismund und Heinrich V' (Berlin 1874).

⁴ He went to Calais Sept. 4, 1416, completed his negotiations with Burgundy Oct. 8, and returned Oct. 16. See Rymer, ix. 385; Gesta Henr. pp. 94, 95, 100-104; Lenz, König Sigismund, &c., pp. 123 sq.

and powers were bestowed on Gilbert Talbot to receive the remains of Owen Glendower's party to pardon¹.

Henry's success in obtaining money, men, and ships, seems after the story of the late reign little less than miraculous. The expedition of 1415 had involved the raising of 11,000 men and 1300 vessels large and small; the money required had been raised largely by loans secured on the grants of the parliament. The expedition of 1417 was to be on a much larger scale: an army of 25,000 men and a fleet of 1500 vessels, of which a much greater proportion were to be vessels of war, worthy of an English navy². Two parliaments sat during the season of preparation. In March 1416 the commons accelerated the grant of a tenth and a fifteenth due at Martinmas³; in October they granted two similar aids, payable in the February and November following; and empowered the king to raise a loan on the security thus created⁴. The bishop of Winchester lent the king 21,000 marks on the security of the customs; the city of London lent 10,000 on the crown jewels. The clergy of the two provinces granted their tenths in proportion to the liberality of the commons. To the building of ships Henry devoted himself with special ardour; although a great part of the naval service was still conducted by pressed ships, the royal navy was so much increased as to be henceforth a real national armament. In February 1417 the king possessed six great

Expedition
of 1417.

Supplies granted.

Bishop Beaufort's
loans, 1417.

Ships built.

¹ Rymer, ix. 283, 330, 417; Ordinances, ii. 221; Gesta Henr. p. 81.

² Sir Harris Nicolas estimates the total number of Henry's army in 1415, when it started, at 30,000; Battle of Agincourt, p. 48. 11,500 men-at-arms, each with his servant, and the persons of higher rank with two or three servants, might make up this number. A Muster Roll of 1417 is printed in Williams's notes to the Gesta Henrici V., pp. 265 sq.; this contains 8000 men-at-arms and archers; but forms only one third of the entire list. The Gesta (p. 109) give 16,400 as the number of men-at-arms; the total, calculated on the basis given above, must thus have reached nearly 50,000.

³ Mar. 16–Apr. 8; Rot. Parl. iv. 71; Gesta Henrici, pp. 69, 73.

⁴ Dep. Keeper's Rep. ii. App. ii. p. 187; Rot. Parl. iv. 95. The parliament sat Oct. 19 to Nov. 20; Gesta Henr. pp. 105, 107. The convocation of Canterbury granted two tenths, York one; Wake, p. 352; Wilkins, Conc. iii. 377, 380. The commissions for loans were issued July 23, 1417; Rymer, ix. 499. The commission for Hertfordshire reported that they could get no money, Oct. 6; ib. p. 500.

ships, eight barges, and ten balingers¹; the ships were built under his personal superintendence at Southampton and in the Thames. Following the example of Richard I, he issued ordinances for the fleets and armies, which may, far more safely than earlier fragments of legislation, be regarded as the basis of the English law of the admiralty, and as no unimportant contribution to international jurisprudence². Surgeons were appointed for the fleet and army³. The minutest details of victualling went on under the king's eye. The parliaments forgot to grumble, the earls felt themselves too weak or too safe to make it wise to quarrel; the duke of York, whose name, rightly or wrongly, had been mixed up with every conspiracy of the last reign, had fallen at Agincourt; Thomas Beaufort was made duke of Exeter in the parliament of October, 1416. Even Lollardy was on the wane. No untoward omen like the plot at Southampton threw a shadow over the second epoch of the war. Coincidentally with the king's departure bishop Beaufort resigned the great seal⁴, and set out by way of Constance to Palestine. The duke of Bedford stayed at home as the king's lieutenant, with bishop Longley as chancellor.

Cessation of domestic dangers.

Bedford lieutenant of the realm.

The successes of the king in his second expedition, although less startling than those of 1415, were amply sufficient to keep up the national ardour; the earl of Huntingdon was victorious at sea, Henry himself secured Normandy by a series of tedious sieges in 1417 and 1418, gaining however even more from the miserable discord of his adversaries. Early in 1419 Rouen was taken, and in July Pontoise surrendered, opening the way to Paris. In August the murder of John of Burgundy by the dauphin threw the weight of that important but vacillating power decisively on the side of Henry; duke Philip determined to avenge his father and to make common cause with England. The crime of the dauphin placed France at Henry's feet. The unhappy king was brought to terms, and in May 1420, by the Henry's conquest of France, 1417-1420.

¹ Nicolas, Agincourt, App. p. 21; Ell's, Original Letters, 3rd Series, i. 72; 2nd Series, i. 68; cf. Ordinances, ii. 202.

² Nicolas, Agincourt, App. p. 31.

³ Rymer, ix. 363.

⁴ Ib. ix. 472.

Peace of Troyes,
May, 1420.

peace of Troyes, he accepted Henry as his son-in-law, regent and heir of France. On the 24th of June the peace was proclaimed in London, and on the 1st of February, 1421, the king returned to England¹.

Bedford's government, 1417-1419.

In the meanwhile Bedford was learning how to rule a free people; a lesson which, if he had been allowed to practise it in after years, might have even now saved the house of Lancaster from utter destruction. He presided in the parliament of 1417, which granted two fifteenths and tenths², and sealed the fate of Oldcastle, who was executed on the 14th of December³. With the funds so provided the government was carried on without

Parliaments of 1419 and 1420.

a parliament until October, 1419⁴, when another fifteenth and tenth, with a supplementary grant of a third of the same sum, was voted, and authority given for a new loan secured on the grant of this third and the tenth of the clergy⁵. The queen dowager was accused in this session of an attempt to destroy the king by sorcery, and was deprived of the power of conspiring in other ways by being relieved from the task of administering her income⁶. In the parliament of December, 1420, the king was represented by the duke of Gloucester, who had been made lieutenant December 30, 1419, when Bedford joined the king in Normandy⁷. This parliament was held

Gloucester
lieutenant.

¹ Rymer, ix. 895 sq. The king reported the conclusion of the treaty to the regent, May 22; ib. p. 906; it was approved by the three estates of France Dec. 6; ib. vol. x. p. 33; and by those of England May 2, 1421; ib. p. 110.

² The parliament met November 16; Roger Flower was speaker; the grant was made Dec. 17; Dep. Keeper's Rep. ii. App. ii. p. 187; Rot. Parl. iv. 107. The convocation of Canterbury (Nov. 26-Dec. 20) granted two tenths, that of York one (Jan. 20, 1418); Wilkins, Conc. iii. 381, 389. A loan by bishop Beaufort of 21,000 marks, made July 18, 1417, was now secured by act of Parliament; Rot. Parl. iv. 111.

³ Wals. ii. 327, 328; Rot. Parl. iv. 107. See above, p. 83, note 1.

⁴ The parliament of 1419 met Oct. 16; Roger Flower was again speaker; the grant was made Nov. 13; Dep. Keeper's Rep. ii. App. ii. p. 188; Rot. Parl. iv. 117. On Oct. 30, 1419, the convocation granted a half-tenth and a noble from stipendiary priests; Wake, p. 354; Wilkins, Conc. iii. 396.

⁵ Rot. Parl. iv. 117. Commissions for collecting the loan were issued Nov. 26; Rymer, ix. 815.

⁶ Wals. ii. 331; Rot. Parl. iv. 118. She was arrested and sent to Leeds castle; Leland, Coll. ii. 489.

⁷ Rymer, ix. 830.

in daily expectation of Henry's return¹; Gloucester did not ask for money. Matters were not looking so prosperous as they had been; money was scarce; the peace was badly kept in the north. True, the Lollards, as the chancellor said, were decreasing, but it was time the king came home². Petitions were not to be ingrossed until they had been sent over sea for the royal assent³; the statute of Edward III, which secured that the English liberties should not be diminished by the king's assumption of a new title, was re-enacted⁴. A pressing invitation was sent for the king and his bride to visit England⁵. Henry was glad enough to return. He landed in February, 1421, and, after having the queen crowned and making a grand progress through the country, on the 2nd of May opened parliament in person⁶. A new expedition was already necessary; the duke of Clarence had fallen in battle against the dauphin in March.

Parliament of Dec. 1420.

Return of the king,
Feb. 1421.

The joy felt at the king's return seems to have prevented the asking of any inconvenient questions; the treaty of Troyes was laid before the three estates and solemnly confirmed. No gloom was thrown over the session by a dispute about money. So great indeed was the confidence of the nation in its leader that the parliament empowered the council to give security for the payment of all debts contracted by the king for the present expedition⁷; and a proof of private confidence even more signal than any which the parliament could give was seen in the conduct of bishop Beaufort, who, although he had as yet recovered only a third of his former loan, was ready to lend

Parliament of May, 1421.
Treaty of Troyes confirmed.

Security for the king's

¹ The parliament opened Dec. 2; Roger Hunt was speaker; Rot. Parl. iv. 123.

² Rot. Parl. iv. 123.

³ Ib. iv. 127.

⁴ Ib. iv. 128.

⁵ Ib. iv. 125.

⁶ The parliament of 1421 opened May 2; Thomas Chaucer was speaker; Rot. Parl. iv. 129. On the 6th a statement of the revenue was made: it amounted to £55,743; the charges on which reached the sum of £52,235; leaving only £3,507 for extraordinary expenditure; Ordinances, ii. 312; Rymer, x. 113. The convocations granted a tenth; Wake, p. 358.

⁷ Rot. Parl. iv. 130. The king had issued commissions for raising a loan, at York, April 7; Rymer, x. 96: and at Westminster April 21; ib. p. 97.

New loans
by Beaufort,

the king £14,000 more¹. In these monetary transactions the bishop probably acted as a contractor on a large scale, and deserved the thanks of the country far more than the odium which has been heaped upon him as a money-lender. It can scarcely be supposed that the very large sums which he lent were his own, for, although he held a rich see, he had not inherited any great estate, and he kept up a very splendid household. It was probably his credit, which was unimpeachable, more than any enormous personal wealth, that enabled him to pour ready money, when ready money was very scarce, into the king's coffers. In this session the Bohun inheritance was divided between the king and the countess of Stafford, his cousin, as co-heirs of the earldoms of Essex, Hereford, and Northampton².

Henry's last expedition,
June 1421.

328. Thus provided with money, Henry on the 10th of June left England, never to return. He spent the rest of his life in attempts to secure the remaining strongholds of the unhappy country which he desired to reform and govern. The need of further supplies brought together the parliament in December³ under the duke of Bedford. A fifteenth and tenth was granted, but little else was done⁴; the scarcity of money was already alarming, and received some slight attention in the way of legislation. On the 6th of December, 1421, the unhappy Henry of Windsor was born. In May, 1422, the queen joined her husband, and on the 31st of August he died. His last wishes were that Bedford should be the guardian of both realm and heir, and that the earl of Warwick should be the boy's preceptor. A strong command was laid on his brothers not to make peace with the dauphin and never to quarrel with Burgundy or to allow the duke of Orleans to go free. In a sad foreboding he warned his youngest brother not to be selfish or granted, Dec. 1421.

Supplies

Death of Henry V,
August 1422.

¹ Rot. Parl. iv. 132; Ordinances, ii. 298.

² Rot. Parl. iv. 135.

³ This parliament met December 1; Richard Baynard was speaker; the grant was made apparently on the day of the meeting; the speaker however was elected on the 3rd; Rot. Parl. iv. 151; Wals. ii. 332.

⁴ Dep. Keeper's Rep. ii. App. ii. p. 189; Rot. Parl. iv. 151. The clergy granted two half-tenths.

to prefer his own personal interests to those of the country which he would have in part to govern. The duke of Exeter was also charged with the care of the kingdom of England¹. With his last breath Henry professed himself a crusader. His last words were, 'Good Lord, thou knowest that my mind was to re-edify the walls of Jerusalem².' His death is recorded in the book of the acts of his son's council thus: 'Departed this life the most Christian champion of the church, the beam of prudence and example of righteousness, the invincible king, the flower and glory of all knighthood³, Henry, the fifth since the Conquest, king of England, heir and regent of the realm of France, and lord of Ireland, at the castle of Bois de Vincennes near Paris on the last day of August in the year of our Lord 1422 and of his reign the tenth: whom succeeded his illustrious son Henry VI, on the 1st day of September, in the first year of his age and reign.' The unhappy Henry of Windsor was destined to lose all and more than all that Henry of Monmouth had won.

His last arrangements and wishes.

Record of his death.

Henry V was by far the greatest king in Christendom, and he deserved the estimation in which he was held, both for the grandeur and sincerity of his character and for the greatness of the position which, not without many favouring circumstances

¹ See Wavrin, p. 423; Monstrelet, liv. i. c. 264. According to the account in the Gesta, p. 159, Bedford was to rule France, Gloucester England; and Exeter, Warwick, and bishop Beaufort to be governors of the young prince. Elmham joins Sir Walter Hungerford and Sir Henry Fitz Hugh to the duke of Exeter (ed. Hearne, p. 333). Hardyng likewise says that the duke of Exeter was to be guardian to the young Henry:—

'Thomas Beauforde his uncle dere and trewe
Duke of Excester, full of all worthyhode,
To tyme his soone to perfect age grewe,
He to kepe hym, chaungyng for no newe,
With helpe of his other eme then full wise
The bishop of Winchester of good advise.'—p. 387.

He adds that it was on the duke of Exeter's death that the earl of Warwick became tutor; p. 394. See also Hall, Chr. p. 115; Tit. Liv. For. p. 95.

² Leland, Coll. ii. 489; cf. Wavrin, p. 424; Hardyng, p. 388. The report of Gilbert de Lannoy on the ports of Egypt, and Syria, ordered by Henry V in contemplation of his expedition to the East, is in the Archæologia, xxi. 312–348.

³ 'The good and nobyllle Kyng Harry the V aftyr the Conqueste of Inglonde, floure of chevalrye of crysten men;' Gregory, p. 148; cf. Chron. London, p. 110.

Great possibilities of Henry's career.

on which he could not have counted, he had won. It was very much owing to his influence that the great schism was closed at Constance; it was the representative of the English church who nominated pope Martin V¹, the creator of the modern papacy: and although the result was one which ran counter to the immemorial policy of kings and parliaments, of Church and State, the mischief of the consequences cannot be held to derogate from the greatness of the achievement. It is not too much to suppose that Henry, striking when the opportunity came and continuing the task which he had undertaken without interruption, might have accomplished the subjugation and pacification of France, and realised the ambition of his life, the dream of his father and of his Lancastrian ancestors, by staying the progress of the Ottomans and recovering the sepulchre of Christ. This was not to be; and he had already done more than on ordinary calculations could have been imagined, compassed more than it was in England's power alone to hold fast or to complete. England was nearly exhausted; it could only have been at the head of consolidated France and united Europe that Henry could have led the Crusade. In him then the dying energies of medieval life kindle for a short moment into flame; England rejoices in the light all the more because of the gloom that precedes and follows: and the efforts made by England, parliament, church, and nation, during the period, are not less remarkable than those made by the king. They show that the system of government was capable of keeping pace with the great mind that inspired it, although the mass of the nation was, as it soon proved to be, not sufficiently advanced to maintain the system when the guiding hand was taken away.

John duke of Bedford and Humfrey duke of Gloucester.

329. The two men into whose hands the administration of Henry's dominions now fell were in singular contrast with one another. The two brothers were but a year apart in age. John was thirty-three, Humfrey thirty-two. There was perhaps as little personal jealousy between them as could exist between two brothers so situated. Bedford was never jealous of Gloucester; Gloucester, if during his brother's absence he acted with little regard to his wishes, and aimed at power for himself irrespective of the national interest, was always amenable to Bedford's advice when he was present, and never ventured to withstand him to his face. In character however, and in the great aim and object of life, there was scarcely anything in common between them. They seem, as it were, to have developed the different sides of their father's idiosyncrasy, or to have run back to a previous generation. Humfrey has all the adventurous spirit, the popular manners, the self-seeking and ambition that marked Henry IV; he is still more like the great-uncle whose title he bore, and to whose fate his own death was so closely parallel, Thomas of Woodstock. John has all the seriousness, the statesmanship, the steady purpose, the high sense of public duty, that in a lower degree belonged to his father. He, although with a far higher type of character, in some points resembled the Black Prince. Bedford again has all the great qualities of Henry V without his brilliance; Gloucester has all his popular characteristics without any of his greatness. The former was thoroughly trusted by Henry V, the latter was trusted only so far as it was necessary. The Beauforts were no doubt intended by Henry to keep the balance steady. He knew that while to the actual wielders of sovereign power their personal interests are apt to be the first consideration, to a house in the position of the Beauforts the first object is the preservation of the dynasty. He had confided in them and had found them faithful; Bedford trusted them and also found them faithful. Gloucester, as Clarence had been, was opposed to them, and the jealousy which he missed no opportunity of showing was one cause of the destruction of his house. Gloucester was the evil genius of his family; his selfish ambition abroad broke up the Burgundian alliance, his selfish ambition at home broke up the unity of the Lancastrian power; he lived long enough to ruin his nephew, not long enough to show whether he had the will or the power to save him. Yet the reaction provoked by Contrast between the two brothers.

¹ The bishop of London nominated him; Wals. ii. 320. See Lenz, König Sigismund, p. 184. Whoever was the nominator, the election was the result of the league between Henry and Sigismund.

Their relations with the Beau-forts.

Mischievous
character of Gloucester.

his competitors for power invested him with some popularity whilst he lived, and won for him the posthumous reputation of being the pillar of the state and the friend of the commons¹. Clever, popular, amiable, and cultivated², he was without strong principle, and, what was more fatal than the want of principle, was devoid of that insight into the real position of his house and nation which Henry IV, Henry V, and Bedford undoubtedly had; he would not or could not see that the house of Lancaster was on its trial, and that England had risked her all on that issue.

Question about the late king's intentions.

The uncertainty that still rests on the exact form in which Henry's last wishes were expressed compels us to content ourselves with supposing that they were duly carried into execution, and that he intended Bedford to govern France, Gloucester to act as his vicegerent in England. But the arrangement was not adopted at home without misgivings. The lords, the council, the parliament, all had something to say before the final adjustment was made, and Gloucester himself was never satisfied with the position allotted him. The lords were jealous of their own rights; the influence of Bedford and the Beauforts, and the constitutional power already wielded by the council, were sufficient to limit the power of the Protector in that body; and the parliament contained men who were watchful of any attempt to diminish the liberties or jealousies.

Mutual

¹ According to Hall he had abroad the reputation of being 'the very father of his country and the shield and defence of the poor commonalty;' Chron. p. 212. Hall however knew better.

² Capgrave (Ill. Henr. p. 109) calls him 'inter omnes mundi proceres litteratissimus.' He took special pains to stand well with learned men, whereby his reputation has no doubt largely benefited. Duke Humfrey's benefactions to the Oxford Library are detailed in Munimenta Academica, i. 326; ii. 758-772. See also Macray, Annals of the Bodleian, pp. 6-12. Among the scholars promoted by him the best known are bishops Beckington and Pecock, and Titus Livius Forojuliensis. Peter de Monte dedicated to him a work 'De Virtutibus et Vitiis;' Beckington, i. 34. Aeneas Sylvius (p. 64) speaks of him as 'clarissimo et doctissimo, qui . . . poetas mirifice colit et oratores magnopere veneratur.' 'Iste dux Humfredus inter omnes mundi principes excelebat in scientia et speciositatis ac formae decentia; tamen vecors cordis et effaeminatus vir ac voluptati deditus;' Chr. Giles, p. 7; cf. Tit. Liv. For. p. 2. His constitution was weakened by his excesses as early as 1424. See the advice of his physician Gilbert Kymer in Hearne, Lib. Nig. Scaccarii, vol. ii. pp. 552 sq.

control the powers to which the last two kings had allowed free exercise.

330. Gloucester, who was in England at the time of Henry's death, at once took the place which belonged to him, and on the 28th of September in the name of his nephew received the great seal from Bishop Longley¹. But the council acted as administrators of the executive power, and with this he did not venture to interfere. It was by the advice of the council that he was on the 6th of November appointed to open the ensuing parliament². The words of the commission were sufficient to tell him that he would have no unrestricted power; he was authorised to begin, carry on, and dissolve the parliament, by the assent of the council. Gloucester objected to the last clause³; and the lords replied that, considering the tender age of the king, they neither could, ought, nor would consent to the omission of the words, which were as necessary for the security of the duke as they were for that of the council. Thus pressed he gave a reluctant consent, and on the 9th of November opened the parliament simply as the king's uncle acting by virtue of that commission⁴. Archbishop Chichele announced the causes of summons,—the good governance of the king's person, the maintenance of peace and law, and the defence of the realm; for all which purposes it was necessary to have provision of honourable and discreet personages of each estate of the realm. Before determining the form of regency, the parliament examined the list of the ministers; the commons asked to know their names, and on the 16th letters patent were produced in which the king by advice of his council in

The council undertakes the work of government.

Attitude of duke Humfrey.

Parliament of 1422.

Question of regency considered in parliament, Nov. 1422.

¹ Rymer, x. 253; Rot. Parl. iv. 170.

² Ordinances, iii. 6, 7; Rot. Parl. iv. 169.

³ 'Ad parlamentum illud finiendum et dissolvendum de assensu consilii nostri plenam commisimus potestatem;' Ord. iii. 7. It certainly seems probable that 'de assensu consilii nostri' should be read with the words that follow rather than with the preceding words, that Gloucester misconstrued the sentence, and that the council took advantage of his misconstruction to force that interpretation upon him. The words do not occur in the commission given by Edward III to Lionel in 1351; Rot. Parl. ii. 225; nor in that to Richard in 1377; ib. p. 360.

⁴ Rot. Parl. iv. 169; Rymer, x. 257; Wals. ii. 345. Roger Flower was speaker. * The session closed Dec. 18.

Gloucester's claim to the regency.

the present parliament re-nominated his father's chancellor and treasurer¹. It was not until the twenty-seventh day of the session that Gloucester's position was definitely settled. He claimed the regency as next of kin to the young king and under the will of Henry V²; the lords, having searched for precedents, found that he had no such claim on the ground of relationship, and that the late king could not without the assent of the estates dispose of the government after his death; they disliked too the names of regent, tutor, governor, and lieutenant. He had to submit, and on the 5th of December the king³, by assent and advice of the lords spiritual and temporal and by assent of the commons, constituted the duke of Bedford protector and defender of the realm and of the church of England and principal counsellor to the king, whenever and as soon as he should be present in England, the duke of Gloucester in that event being the chief counsellor after him; he further ordained that the duke of Gloucester should occupy the same position so long as Bedford was absent, should be the protector and defender of the kingdom and church, and chief counsellor to the king. This act of parliament, in which the influence of bishop Beaufort may be confidently traced⁴, was followed by letters patent containing the formal appointment; and Gloucester at once accepted the responsibility. By a further act⁵ the protector was empowered to exercise the royal patronage in the administration of the forests, and the gift of smaller ecclesiastical benefices; the greater prizes being reserved for him to bestow only by advice of the council. The members of the council were then named: Gloucester as chief; five prelates, the primate, the bishops of London, Winchester, Norwich, and Worcester; the duke of Exeter; the earls of March, Warwick, Marshall, Northumberland, and Westmore-

Gloucester
made Protector in the absence of Bedford.

The names of the council chosen,
Dec. 1422.

¹ Rot. Parl. iv. 171, 172.

² Ib. iv. 326.

³ Ib. iv. 174, 175; Rymer, x. 261; Wals. ii. 346.

⁴ According to Hardyng, Beaufort led the opposition, p. 391, 'for cause he was so noyous with to dele;' 'the bishop of Winchester by perlyament was chaunceller and hiest governour of the kynghis persone and his greате socour; his godfather and his father's eme, and supportour was moost of all this realme;' p. 392.

⁵ Rot. Parl. iv. 175; Ordinances, iii. 14.

land; the lords Fitz Hugh, Cromwell, Hungerford, Tiptoft, and Beauchamp¹. This body, in which every interest was represented and every honoured name appears, accepted office under five conditions, which still further limited the powers of the protector; they were to appoint all officers of justice and revenue; they were to have the disposal of the wardships, marriages, fairs, and other incidental profits of the crown; nothing at all was to be done without a quorum of six or four at least, nothing great without the presence of the majority; whilst for business on which it was usual to ask the king's opinion the advice of the protector was required: the fourth article secured secrecy as to the contents of the treasury, and the fifth provided that a list of attendances should be kept. The commons added an article to prevent the council from encroaching on the patronage belonging to existing officers of state². On the 18th of December the grant of the subsidy on wool and of tannage and poundage was made³. It was agreed that all Lollards imprisoned in London should be handed over to the ordinaries to be tried⁴: no important legislation was attempted, and neither parliament nor convocation was troubled by anything like direct taxation. The arrangements for the regency were completed by the council in the following February; the protector was to receive an annual salary of 8000 marks⁵.

Powers of the council.

Supplies
granted.

331. From the very first months of the new reign appeared symptoms of divided counsels. Bedford was hard at work on the fabric of alliances which Henry had founded; Gloucester was intriguing and aspiring to make a principality for himself. In April, 1423, Bedford at Amiens⁶ concluded an offensive and defensive alliance with the dukes of Burgundy and Brittany, cementing the league by a double marriage, and himself espousing a sister of duke Philip. In March⁷ Gloucester had celebrated his marriage with Jacqueline of Hainault, the

Gloucester's foreign intrigues.

¹ Rot. Parl. iv. 175; Ordinances, iii. 16.

² Rot. Parl. iv. 176.

³ Ib. iv. 173.

⁴ Ordinances, iii. 26, 27; Rymer, i. 268.

⁵ April 17; Rymer, x. 280, 281.

⁷ Stevenson, Wars in France, i. p. lii.

He marries Jacqueline of Hainault, and alienates Burgundy, 1423.

half-divorced wife of the duke of Brabant, and an heiress whose claims were irreconcilable with the interests of the house of Burgundy. All that was to have been gained by the one marriage was thrown to the winds by the other; the strongest injunction of Henry V was disregarded by Humfrey, and the alienation of the duke of Burgundy began at the moment when his friendship might have been secured for ever. With the same insolent impolicy Gloucester undertook to recover in arms the estates to which Jacqueline was entitled. The year 1423 saw Burgundy delivered from the French by the aid of an English force at Crevant; and in August, 1424, Charles VII was reduced to the lowest point of degradation by the great victory won by Bedford at Verneuil. In October, 1424, Gloucester invaded Hainault, drawing off the duke of Burgundy from France and putting an end to the cordiality of the national alliance¹. In this attempt he failed even to show the military skill and perseverance that became an English prince: he challenged the duke of Burgundy to single combat; he assumed the title of count of Hainault and Zealand; he persisted in spite of the reproaches of Bedford, who was obliged to purchase the continuance of the alliance by great sacrifices of territory in France. Then he returned to England and left his young wife behind him. When he was once in England Bedford did his best to keep him there, but he soon began to do worse harm still.

He invades Hainault, 1424.

His return to England, 1425.

Parliament
of 1423-4.

The government of England whilst Gloucester was thus employed had rested in the hands of the council. A parliament which sat from October, 1423, to February, 1424², continued the grants of the year 1422³; the members of the council were most of them continued in office, and additional rules framed for council business⁴. Sir John Mortimer, who

¹ Chron. Angl. ed. Giles, p. 7; Monstrelet, liv. ii. c. 22.

² Rot. Parl. iv. 197. It opened Oct. 20; John Russell was speaker. The little king was brought into parliament on Nov. 18. The chronicler tells how 'he schriked and cryed and sprang' before he would leave his lodging at Staines; Chron. Lond. p. 112.

³ The grants were made Feb. 28, the last day of the session; Rot. Parl. iv. 200.

⁴ Rot. Parl. iv. 201, 202; Rymer, x. 310.

was charged with a treasonable design in favour of the earl of March, was declared guilty by both lords and commons, and sentenced to death¹. Peace was made with Scotland and the long-imprisoned king released in January 1424². In the following July bishop Beaufort was again made chancellor³, either as a check put by Bedford on the vagaries of his brother or as a compromise with Gloucester himself before he started on his expedition. The government remained in his hands during the protector's absence, and he received an additional salary of £2000 for his services⁴. The parliament of 1425⁵ was opened by the little king in person; the chancellor in his opening speech inferred the good qualities of a counsellor from the wonderful physical fact that the elephant has no gall, is of inflexible purpose, and of great memory. The work of this session was chiefly financial⁶: Beaufort received security for his loans⁷; Gloucester, who had returned from his inglorious expedition, was allowed to borrow 20,000 marks on security given by the council⁸; the subsidies were continued for three years⁹. The three estates condescended further to inhibit the duke from continuing his quarrel with Burgundy, and referred it for arbitration to the queens of England and France and the duke of Bedford¹⁰. A dispute for precedence between the earl

Sir John Mortimer.

Beaufort chancellor during Gloucester's absence, July 1424.

His speech at the opening of parliament in 1425.

Parliament forbids war with Burgundy.

¹ Hall, p. 128; Rot. Parl. iv. 202; Amundesham, i. 6, 7. The earl of March attended this parliament with so large a retinue that the council in alarm sent him to Ireland, where he died soon after; Chron. Giles, p. 6.

² Rymer, x. 302-308. On the 13th of February, 1424, King James was released from the payment of 10,000 marks, out of the £40,000 due for his ransom, in consideration of his marriage with Johanna Beaufort, the bishop's niece; ib. p. 322.

³ July 16; Rymer, x. 340.

⁴ Ordinances, iii. 165.

⁵ Rot. Parl. iv. 261. It began April 30; Sir Thomas Wauton was speaker; the grant was made on the last day of the session, July 14; ib. p. 75. The convocation granted a half tenth in July; Wilk. Conc. iii. 438.

⁶ 'In that parlyment was moche altercacyon bytwyne the lordys and the comyns for tonage and poundage. And at that parlyment was grauntyd that alle maner of alyentys shuld be put to hoste as Englysche men benne in othyr londys, and ovyr that condyscyon was the tonage grauntyd; the whyche condyscyon was brokyn in the same yere by the Byschoppe of Wynchester, as the moste pepylle sayde, he beyng chaunseler the same tyme, and therefore there was moche hevynesse and trowbylle in thys londe;' Gregory, p. 157.

⁷ Rot. Parl. iv. 275, 277.

⁸ Ib. iv. 289.

⁹ Ib. iv. 275.

¹⁰ Ib. iv. 277.

of Warwick and the earl Marshall was settled by the promotion of the latter to be duke of Norfolk¹. Although duke Humfrey seems to have escaped animadversion in parliament, he was severely taken to task in council². Beaufort, it may be safely assumed, was unsparing in his strictures; Gloucester seems to have retaliated by an attack on the bishop's administration during his absence: and the result was an open quarrel between uncle and nephew, which peremptorily recalled Bedford to England.

Gloucester quarrels with Beaufort in 1425.

Gloucester's
expenses.

332. Duke Humfrey had come home deep in debt, as was to be expected, and the council had treated him with unwise liberality; in May they had given him the wardship of the Mortimer estates during the minority of the duke of York³, and in July had allowed him to borrow the large loan just mentioned. But he was not satisfied. The Tower of London had during the absence of the duke been garrisoned by Beaufort with men drawn from the estates of the duchy of Lancaster, which were largely under his control⁴. Gloucester, on the 29th of October, ordered the Lord Mayor of London to prevent his uncle from entering the city⁵. A riot followed on the 30th, in which the Archbishop of Canterbury and the duke of Coimbra, himself a grandson of John of Gaunt, had to mediate between the conflicting parties. It was finally resolved that Bedford should arbitrate, and on the 31st the chancellor wrote to him imploring him to return if he would save the state⁶. On the 5th of November, at Guildford, the council, acting on the order of the last parliament, allowed the protector to borrow £5000 of the king, to be repaid when Henry should reach the age of fifteen. This was charged on the tenth last granted by the clergy, although the government was at the very time being carried on by the voluntary loans of the lords of the council⁷.

Riot in London.

Beaufort sends for Bedford.

Loans by the council to Gloucester.

¹ Rot. Parl. iv. 262-274.

² Ordinances, iii. 174; Monstrelet, liv. ii. c. 32.

³ Ordinances, iii. 169. The duke was allowed further to borrow 9000 marks of the king on July 9, 1427; Rymer, x. 374.

⁴ Beaufort's force was from Cheshire and Lancashire. Cf. Monstrelet, liv. ii. c. 36.

⁵ Chron. London, p. 114.

⁶ The letter, dated Oct. 31, is given by Hall, p. 130.

⁷ Ordinances, iii. 179. The loan of July 1427 was assigned on the Probably this was done in Beaufort's absence. It was time that Bedford should return; he left France on receipt of his uncle's letter, landed at Sandwich on the 20th of December¹, and came up to London on the 10th of January.

Bedford returns,
Dec. 1425.

333. The two brothers had not met since the death of Henry V, and Gloucester was not able to resist the personal influence of Bedford. It is probably to this period that we should refer an interesting document, preserved among the letters of bishop Beekington, duke Humfrey's chancellor². In this treaty of alliance, as it professes to be, the duty of fraternal unity is solemnly laid down, and a contract published which is to disarm for the future the tongues of meddlers and detractors. Seven articles follow, by which the dukes undertake to bear true allegiance to the king; next to the king to honour and serve each other, to abstain from aiding each other's enemies, to reveal to each other all designs that are directed against either, to refuse belief to calumnious accusations, to form no alliances without common consent or in prejudice of their common alliances. These latter articles were no doubt called for by Gloucester's treatment of the duke of Burgundy. Queen Katharine also appears to have joined in the contract.

Treaty of alliance between the two brothers.

On the 7th of January, 1426, was issued³ a summons for parliament to meet on the 18th of February at Leicester: the intervening weeks were spent in an attempt to reconcile duke Humfrey with the chancellor. On the 29th of January, archbishop Chichele, the earl of Stafford, lords Talbot and Cromwell, and Sir John Cornwall, were sent to the duke, with elaborate instructions from Bedford and the council, which had met at S. Alban's⁴. It was proposed that the council should reassemble at Northampton on the 13th of February to prepare business for the parliament. At this council Gloucester was first invited and then urged to attend, as he valued the unity of the lords and the common good of the subjects; the enmity between the duke and his uncle must of necessity come before

Parliament
summoned to Leicester, Feb. 1426.

Gloucester invited to attend the council.

customs, the duchy of Lancaster, and the proceeds of wardships; Rymer, x. 375; Ordinances, iii. 271.

¹ Gregory, p. 160.

² Beekington's Letters, ed. Williams, i. 139-145.

³ Lords' Report, iv. 863.

⁴ Ordinances, iii. 181-187.

Arguments addressed to him.

The parliament of Bats, Feb.-
June 1426.

Bedford and the lords mediate.

parliament, it were well that it should be ended before the day of meeting: the duke had refused to come to Northampton if he should there meet the chancellor; he was implored to set that feeling aside; there would be no fear of a riot; the bishop had undertaken to keep his men in order, and the peace would be duly kept: it was unreasonable in Gloucester, and even if he were king it would be unreasonable in him, to refuse to meet a peer; the king and council were determined that Gloucester should have his rights; he could not insist on Beaufort's removal from office, but, if anything were proved against Beaufort, he would of course be dismissed. If Gloucester refused to attend the council, he must come to the parliament, and in that assembly the king would execute justice without respect of persons. Whether the duke complied with the request does not appear; but the matter was not settled when the parliament, which is called by the annalists the parliament of bats or bludgeons, met¹. The chancellor opened the proceedings with a speech, in which he made no reference to the quarrel²; for ten days the two parties stood face to face, nothing being done in consequence of their hostile attitude. On the 28th of February the commons sent in an urgent prayer that the divisions among the lords should be reconciled³, and Bedford and the peers solemnly undertook the arbitration; on the 7th of March Gloucester and Beaufort consented to abide by that arbitration, and to make peace on the terms which should be prescribed. The charges of Gloucester against his uncle were stated; he had shut the Tower of London against him, had purposed to seize the king's person, had plotted to destroy Gloucester when visiting the king, had attempted the murder of Henry V when prince of Wales, and had urged him to usurp his father's crown. The bishop explained his conduct as impugned in the first and third charges, and denied the truth of the rest. The arbitrators determined that Beaufort

¹ Gregory, p. 160.

² Rot. Parl. iv. 295. The speaker was Sir Richard Vernon; the grant was made June 1. Cf. Amundesham, i. 9, 10; Chron. Giles, pp. 8, 9. The clergy, April 27, granted a half tenth and a farthing in the pound; Wilk. Conc. iii. 461, 462.

³ Rot. Parl. iv. 296; Ordinances, iii. 187.

should solemnly deny the truth of the charges of treason against Henry IV, Henry V, and Henry VI, whereupon Bedford should declare him loyal: he should then disavow all designs against Gloucester, who should accept the disavowal; and they should then take each other by the hand¹. This was done and recorded on the 12th of March²; on the 14th, Beaufort resigned the great seal, and the treasurer, bishop Stafford, prayed to be discharged of the treasurership. John Kemp, bishop of London, became chancellor, and Walter, lord Hungerford, treasurer³. On the 20th the parliament was prorogued, to meet again on the 29th of April. In the second meeting, grants of tunnage, poundage, and the subsidy on wool were granted⁴, extending to November, 1431; the council had been already empowered to give security for loans amounting to £40,000. On the 1st of June the parliament separated. The king had during the latter days of the session received from his uncle Bedford the honour of knighthood.

Pacification and resignation of Beaufort,
March 1426.

Money
grants.

Bedford stayed sixteen months in England. Beaufort, before the duke left, appeared from time to time at the council board⁵; at the end of the year he lost his brother the duke of Exeter; the representation of the family devolved on John, Edmund and Thomas, sons of the eldest brother, John Beaufort; of these John, the earl of Somerset, was a prisoner in France. The bishop probably thought that he might bide his time. He had undergone a personal discomfiture, but the council might be trusted not to allow duke Humfrey to have his own way. The Chancellor Kemp too, now archbishop of York, was a resolute defender of constitutional right. In contemplation of his return to France, Bedford held a council in the Star Chamber on the 8th of January, 1427⁶. The chancellor, as spokesman

Beaufort trusts in the council.

¹ The articles are given by Hall, Chr. pp. 130, 131; and Beaufort's answers, pp. 131-134; then the arbitrament, pp. 135-138; they are not stated in the rolls of parliament. See also Arnold, Chr. pp. 287, 300.

² Rot. Parl. iv. 297.

³ Ib. iv. 299; Amundesham, i. 9; Rymer, x. 353.

⁴ Rot. Parl. iv. 302.

⁵ Beaufort was a member of the council, Nov. 24, and Dec. 8, 1426, and March 8 and 10, 1427; Ordinances, iii. 213, 221, 226, 255.

⁶ Ordinances, iii. 231-242.

Address to Bedford by archbishop Kemp,
Jan. 1427.

The authority of the council defined.

Bedford undertakes to respect it.

Gloucester asked to make the same promise.

of the council, addressed him in a speech probably pre-arranged in order to produce some effect on Gloucester. He reminded him of the great responsibility which lay on that body during the king's minority. The king, child as he was, centered in his person all the authority that could belong to a grown-up king, but the execution of that authority stood 'in his lords, assembled either by authority of his parliament, or in his council, and in especial in the lords of his council,' who might be called to account for their administration; 'not in one singular person, but in all my lords together,' except where the parliament had given definite powers to the protector; the council therefore asked for the duke's opinion on the present state of affairs, and the feasibility of the present system of government¹. Bedford replied that it was his wish to act in all things under advice and governance of the council, and then, with tears in his eyes, swore on the gospels that he would be counselled and ruled by them. On the following day the chancellor and council, thus fortified with a precedent, visited Gloucester who was lying ill at his lodgings, and administered a formal remonstrance; it was impossible for them to carry on the government if he continued to claim the position which on several occasions he had claimed. He had said more than once that 'if he had done anything that touched the king in his sovereign estate, he would not answer for it to any person alive save only to the king when he came to his age;' he had also said, 'Let my brother govern as him list whilst he is in this land, for after his going over into France I will govern as me seemeth good.' The council hoped that he would give them the same answer that they had had from Bedford; and in fact Gloucester, after some words of apology, repeated his brother's declaration.

¹ There are two copies of the minute, in which this statement is worded somewhat differently; the words occur as in the text in Ord. iii. 238; at p. 233 the sentence stands thus: 'the execution of the king's said authority, as toward that that belongeth unto the politique rule and governaille of his land, and to the observance and keeping of his laws, belongeth unto the lords spiritual and temporal of this land at such time as they be assembled in parliament or in great council, and else, them nought being so assembled, unto the lords chosen and named to be of his continual council.'

Bedford now prepared to return to France; on the 25th of February¹ the council resolved that it had been the late king's intention that he should devote himself to the maintenance of the English hold on Normandy; and the little king, now five years old, was made to understand that his uncle must leave him. On the 26th, the crown, which had been kept by bishop Beaufort as a pledge, was placed in the custody of the treasurer²; on the 8th of March, the king, with Bedford, Beaufort, and the council, were at Canterbury. Immediately afterwards Bedford left. Beaufort accompanied him. On the 14th of May, 1426, he had applied for leave to go on pilgrimage³. He did not return until September, 1428, having in the meanwhile been made a cardinal, legate of the apostolic see, and commander of a crusade against the Hussites⁴.

Bedford takes leave; Feb. 1427.

Departure of Bedford and Beaufort, March 1427.

334. The conduct of Gloucester, when thus relieved from the pressure of his brother and uncle, was what might have been expected. He resumed his designs against Burgundy, and attempted to sow discord in his brother's council. A very summary threat from Bedford was required before he would desist⁵. In July he obtained the consent of the council to raise men and money to garrison Jacqueline's castles and towns in Holland; no further conquests were however to be attempted without the consent of parliament⁶. Parliament was summoned for the 13th of October⁷, but Gloucester was not allowed to open it; the little king presided in person. Little was done in the first session, and on the 8th of December it was prorogued. In the second session, which began on the 20th of January, 1428, Gloucester began to show his hand again. On the 3rd of March he demanded of the lords a

Gloucester resumes his designs against Burgundy.

Parliament
of 1427-8.

¹ Ordinances, iii. 247.

² Ib. iii. 250.

³ Ellis, Original Letters, 2nd Series, i. 101; Ordinances, iii. 195; Rymer, x. 358.

⁴ On Beaufort's expedition to Bohemia, where he was in the autumn of 1427, see Æneas Sylvius, Hist. Bohem. c. 48; opp. p. 116; Raynald, A.D. 1427, § 5; Palacky, Gesch. v. Böhmen, iii. 438-467.

⁵ Monstrelet, liv. ii. c. 38.

⁶ Ordinances, iii. 271.

⁷ Rot. Parl. iv. 316. John Tyrell was speaker. In this parliament a number of women presented themselves with a letter complaining of duke Humfrey's behaviour to his wife; Amund. i. 20.

The lords, at Gloucester's request, define the powers of the protector. Argument of the lords in parliament.

definition of his powers as 'protector and defender of the realm of England and chief counsellor of the king.' He quitted the assembly that the lords might consider the question at their ease. They returned a written answer, in which they reminded him that at the beginning of the reign he had claimed the governance of the land in right of his blood and of the late king's will; that thereupon the records of the kingdom had been searched for precedents, and the claim refused as grounded neither on history nor on law, the late king having no power to dispose of the government of England after his death without the consent of the estates. Notwithstanding this, in order to maintain the peace of the land, he had been declared chief of the council in his brother's absence; but to avoid the use of the title of Tutor, Lieutenant, Governor, or Regent, the name of Protector and Defender was given him; 'the which importeth a personal duty of intendance to the actual defence of the land,' with certain powers specified and contained in the act. If the estates had intended him to have further powers, they would have given them in that act. On those terms he had accepted the office. The parliament however knew him only as duke of Gloucester, and saw no reason why they should recognise in him more authority than had been formally given him. They therefore prayed, exhorted, and required him to be content, and not desire, will, or use any larger power. By this reply they were determined to stand, and they subscribed it with their own hands, eleven bishops, four abbots, the duke of Norfolk, three earls, and eight barons¹. The consent of the commons was not asked, but they showed their confidence in the council by making liberal grants²; they were empowered to give security for a loan of £24,000; tunnage and poundage were granted for a year, and a new and complicated form of subsidy was voted³. Such a very decided Grants of money in parliament.

¹ Rot. Parl. iv. 326, 327.

² Ib. iv. 317, 318: the grants were made on March 25, the last day of the parliament; Amund. i. 20.

³ The subsidy was very curious; all parishes, the churches of which were taxed above ten marks, were to pay 13s. 4*d.*; below that sum 6s. 8*d.*; parishes containing ten inhabited houses, with the parish church assessed

rebuff would have quelled the spirit of a braver man than Gloucester; but the council did not stop there. Henry V had directed that the earl of Warwick should be the preceptor of his son. On the 1st of June Warwick was summoned by the chancellor to perform his office. Special instructions are given him¹: he is to do his devoir and diligence to exhort, stir, and learn the king to love, worship, and dread God, and generally nourish him and draw him to virtue by lessons of history; he is further to teach him 'nurture, literature, language, and other manner of cunning as his age shall suffer him to comprehend, such as it fitteth so great a prince to be learned of.' He shall have power to chastise him if he does amiss, to dismiss improper servants, and to remove the king's person in case of any unforeseen danger. Warwick, who lived to attend on Henry until he was eighteen, discharged his duties faithfully, and made his pupil a good scholar and an accomplished gentleman. He could not make him a strong or a happy man.

Warwick acts as tutor to the king, 1428.

Beaufort had made the great mistake of his life in 1426, in accepting the cardinalate². He may well be excused for grasping at what was the natural object of clerical ambition in his time, an object which ten years before he had foregone at the urgent entreaty of Henry V, and which now seemed all the more desirable when he saw himself ousted for a time from his commanding position in the English council. But it was up to 20s., paid 2s.; every knight's fee paid 6s. 8d. The tax was to be paid by the parishioners; Amund. i. 21; Rot. Parl. iv. 318; Dep. Keeper's Rep. iii. 9. The clergy in convocation also granted a half tenth and a graduated tax on stipendiaries; ib. p. 11. See below, p. 112.

Beaufort's error in accepting the cardinal's hat, 1426.

¹ Ordinances, iii. 296; Rymer, x. 399: further instructions were given in 1432; Ordinances, iv. 132.

² He was nominated to the cardinalate as early as Dec. 28, 1417 (Wharton, Ang. Sac. i. 800), by Martin V at the council of Constance. Chichele addressed a strong protest on the matter to Henry V; this is printed by Duck in his life of Chichele (ed. 1699, pp. 125-131). According to Gloucester's letter of accusation written in 1440 (Stevenson, Wars in France, ii. 441) Henry refused him leave to accept the dignity, saying that 'he had as leef sette his coroune beside hym as to se him were a cardinal's hatte, he being a cardinal.' The second nomination was made on the 24th of May, 1426 (Panvinus, Epitome Pontificum, p. 291), the title being that of S. Eusebius; on the 25th of the next March he received the cardinal's hat at Rouen. See Gregory, Chron. p. 161; Chron. Lond. p. 115; Hall, p. 139; Amund. i. 11.

Beaufort's
legation.

not the less a blunder; it involved him immediately in the great quarrel which was going on at the time between the church and state of England and the papacy; it to some extent alienated the national goodwill, for the legation of a cardinal was inextricably bound up in the popular mind with heavy fees and procurations; and it gave Gloucester an opportunity for attack which he had sought for in vain before. His share in the ecclesiastical struggle forms part of a very intricate episode in our church history which cannot be touched upon here. The bearings of his promotion on popular opinion and on his relations to Gloucester were immediately apparent. He returned to England in 1428, and was solemnly received at London by the lord mayor and citizens on the 1st of September. Gloucester in the king's name refused to recognise his legatine authority, and published a solemn protest against it as contrary to the immemorial and constitutional custom of the realm¹. The cardinal had already forwarded to Chichele the papal bull under which he was commissioned to raise money for the Hussite crusade. On the 23rd of November two papal envoys informed the convocation of Canterbury² that the pope had imposed the payment of an entire tenth for the Bohemian war. Some similar proposition had been made to the council in the preceding May, but little notice was taken of the subject until the cardinal returned. The alarm of a new impost, on a nation already bearing its burdens somewhat impatiently, gave Gloucester his opportunity. The cardinal was treated with great respect, and allowed to go on his mission to Scotland³, but on the 17th of April, 1429, a question was raised in council which involved his right to retain the bishopric of Winchester; ought he, being a cardinal, to be allowed to officiate as bishop of Winchester and prelate of the Order of the Garter at the approaching feast of S. George.

Alarm at his proceedings in connexion with the Hussite crusade.

Gloucester attacks him.

¹ Gregory, p. 162; Amund. i. 26; Foxe, Acts and Monuments, iii. 719; Brown, Fascic. Rer. Expetend. ii. 618 sq.

² The convocation opened July 5, and closed about Nov. 30, after granting a half tenth to the king, and making some ordinances against the Lollards; Amund. i. 24, 32; Wilkins, Conc. iii. 493 sq. 496 sq., 503.

³ Amund. i. 33, 34; he passed through S. Alban's on his way Feb. 12, and on his return about April 11; ib.; Ordinances, iii. 318.

The lords being severally consulted refused to determine the point, but begged the bishop to waive his right¹. Notwithstanding this indication of his weakness, Beaufort, on the 18th of June, obtained leave from the king and council to retain 500 lances and 2500 archers for his expedition². On the same day was fought the battle of Patay, in which Talbot the English general was taken³; and this, coupled with the relief of Orleans by the Maid of Orleans in the preceding month, had a marked effect on the council. On the 1st of July, at Rochester, the council agreed with the cardinal that his forces should be allowed to serve in France under Bedford for half a year⁴. He yielded the point graciously; the approaching parliament would have to decide whether he had bettered his position.

He is allowed to enlist forces.

Beaufort's forces lent to Bedford, 1429.

335. The parliament met on the 22nd of September⁵. The condition of France was such that the council of that kingdom had strongly urged the coronation of the young king⁶. Before he could be crowned king of France he must be crowned king of England; preparations were accordingly made somewhat hurriedly, and the ceremony was performed at Westminster on the 6th of November⁷. As soon as England had a crowned king the office and duty of the protector terminated, and the lords spiritual and temporal voted that it should cease; on the 15th of November Gloucester was obliged to renounce it, retaining only the title of chief counsellor, but leaving it open to Bedford to retain or surrender it as he pleased⁸. This Parliament of 1429.

Henry's coronation, Nov. 1429.

End of the protectorate.

¹ Ordinances, iii. 323; Rymer, x. 414.

² Ordinances, iii. 330-332; Rymer, x. 419-422.

³ Monstrelet, liv. ii. c. 61.

⁴ Ordinances, iii. 339. On June 22 the cardinal had set out for Bohemia, but remained in France with the regent, and returned for the coronation; Gregory, p. 164; Hall, p. 152; Amund. i. 38, 39, 42; Rymer, x. 424, 427; Chron. Giles, p. 10. He lost his legation on the death of Martin V in 1431, and the whole project came to an end.

⁵ Rot. Parl. iv. 335; Amund. i. 42. William Alyngton was speaker.

⁶ Rymer, x. 413, 414: letters to this effect were laid before a great council on April 15, 1429; Ordinances, iii. 322; and the king announced his intention of going to France, Dec. 20; ib. iv. 10.

⁷ The ceremonies are detailed in Gregory's Chronicle, pp. 165 sq. The ampulla was used; Ordinances, iv. 7.

⁸ Rot. Parl. iv. 336; Rymer, x. 436.

Failure of the attempt to exclude Beaufort from council.

Financial measures.

Second session,
Jan. 1430.

Law of county elections.

stroke told in favour of the cardinal, who seems to have retained more power in parliament than in the council. The question of his position had been raised in a new form; was it lawful for him, a cardinal, to take his place in the king's council; the lords voted not only that it was lawful, but that the bishop should be required to attend the councils on all occasions on which the relations of the king with the court of Rome were not in question. He graciously accepted the position on the 18th of December¹, and used his influence with the commons to such purpose that on the 20th they voted a fifteenth and tenth to the king in addition to a like sum granted on the 12th, with tunnage and poundage until the next parliament². The same day parliament was prorogued to the 14th of January; in the second session the subsidy on wool was continued to November, 1433; the council had already been empowered to give security for loans to the amount of £50,000³, and the payment of the second fifteenth was hastened⁴. The nation was awaking to the necessity of a great effort to save the conquests in France. The most important statute of this parliament was one which further regulated the elections of knights of the shire, and fixed the forty shilling freehold as the qualification for voting⁵. The county elections had been a subject of intermittent legislation since the beginning of the century, but it is difficult to connect the successive changes which were introduced with any political or personal influences prevailing at the time: the matter must be considered in another chapter, and it may be sufficient to say here that, as the changes in the law scarcely at all affected the composition of the House of Commons, the particular steps of the change were most probably taken as they were in consequence of local instances of undue influence and violence. It must not, however, be forgotten that the historians under

¹ Rot. Parl. iv. 338.

² Ib. iv. 336, 337; Amund. i. 44. The clergy, in October 1429, granted a tenth and a half; Wilk. Conc. iii. 515; and in March 1430, another tenth; Wilk. Conc. iii. 517.

³ Rot. Parl. iv. 339, 341, 342. Commissions for raising a loan on this security were issued May 19, 1430; Rymer, x. 461.

⁴ Rot. Parl. iv. 342; Amund. i. 46, 48.

⁵ Rot. Parl. iv. 350.

Richard II had complained of the exercise of crown influence, and that the cry was repeated by the malcontents under Henry IV.

It is a wearisome task to trace the continuance of the fatal quarrel between Beaufort and Gloucester, but it is the main string of English political history for the time. Lollardy was smouldering in secret; the heavy burdens of the nation were wearily borne: Bedford was wearing out life and hope in a struggle that was now seen to be desperate. The Maid of Orleans was captured on the 26th of May, 1430, and burned as a witch on the 31st of May, 1431; Bedford might perhaps have interfered to save her, but such an exercise of magnanimity would have been unparalleled in such an age, and the peculiarly stern religiousness of his character was no more likely to relax in her favour than it had in Oldcastle's. On the 17th of December, 1431, Henry was crowned king of France at Paris by Beaufort.

336. Henry's absence in France gave Gloucester a chance in his turn. Long deliberations in council were needed before the expedition could be arranged; on the 16th of April, 1430, the cardinal agreed to accompany his grand-nephew¹; on the 21st Gloucester was appointed lieutenant and custos of the kingdom². On the 23rd Henry sailed with a large retinue, and remained abroad for nearly two years. During this time the duty of maintaining the authority of the council devolved on archbishop Kemp, who, although he managed to act with Gloucester in his new capacity as custos, had on more than one occasion to oppose him, and, as soon as the court returned, was made to pay the penalty of his temerity. The year 1431 witnessed a bold attempt at rebellion made by the political Lollards under a leader named Jack Sharp, who was captured and put to death at Oxford in May³. The parliament of 1431⁴

The Maid of Orleans.

Beaufort goes to France with the king.

Gloucester remains as lieutenant of the kingdom, 1430.

Jack Sharp's plot, 1431.

¹ Ord. iv. 35-38; Rymer, x. 456. ² Ord. iv. 40 sq.; Rymer, x. 458.

³ Jack Sharp's petition for the confiscation and appropriation of the temporalities of the church, being the same proposition as that put forth in 1410 (above, p. 65), is printed from the MS. Harl. 3775 in Amundesham (ed. Riley), i. 453; cf. Hall, Chr. p. 166; Amund. i. 63; Gregory, p. 172; Chron. Lond. p. 119; Ellis, Orig. Lett. 2nd Series, i. 103; Ordinances, iv. 89, 99, 107; Chron. Giles, p. 18.

⁴ The parliament, called in pursuance of a resolution of the great council

Parliament
of 1431.

Grants of money.

Discussions in council on Beau-fort's position ;

was chiefly occupied with the financial difficulties. The country was becoming more convinced of its own exhaustion, and debt was annually increasing¹. New methods of taxation were tried and failed. This year, besides fifteenths and tenths, tunnage and poundage, and the continued subsidy, a grant was made of twenty shillings on the knight's fee or twenty pounds rental²; and security authorised for a loan of £50,000³. The payments for Beaufort's services were a large item in the national account; Gloucester was still more rapacious, and he did not, like his uncle, hold his stores at the disposal of the state.

On the 6th of November the duke again mooted in council the removal of the cardinal⁴, this time directly. The king's serjeant and attorney laid before the lords in general council a series of precedents by which it was shown that every English bishop who had accepted a cardinal's hat had vacated his see; the duke of Gloucester asked the bishop of Worcester whether it was not true that the cardinal had bought for himself an exemption from the jurisdiction of his metropolitan; and the bishop, when pressed to speak, allowed that he had heard this stated by the bishop of Lichfield who had acted as Beaufort's proctor. The bishops and other lords present professed that their first object was the good of the kingdom, and said that, considering the cardinal's great services and near relationship to the king, they wished justice to be done on a fair trial, and ancient records to be searched. The bishop of Carlisle voted that nothing should be done until the cardinal's return⁵. Notwithstanding this, on the 28th of November the council ordered letters of praemunire and attachment upon the statute to be drawn up, the execution of them being deferred until the king's return. The same day there was a brisk debate on the held Oct. 6, 1430, opened Jan. 12, 1431; Rot. Parl. iv. 367; Amund. i. 57; Ordinances, iv. 67. John Tyrell was again speaker. The grants were made on the 20th of March.

¹ In a great council, Oct. 9, 1430, the bishops and abbots lent large sums, and soon after a fifteenth was levied; Amund. i. 55. On the 12th of July, 1430, orders were issued for constraint of knighthood; Ord. iv. 54.

² Rot. Parl. iv. 368, 369; Amund. i. 58.

³ Rot. Parl. iv. 374.

⁴ Ordinances, iv. 100.

⁵ Ib. iv. 103; Rymer, x. 497.

question of the protector's salary, in which the chancellor and treasurer, supported by the bishop of Carlisle, lords Harington, De la Warr, Lovell, and Botreaux, were outvoted by Gloucester's friends¹ led by the lord le Scrope. Before the king's return additional offence was given by the seizure of the cardinal's plate and jewels when they were landed at Dover. Beaufort himself was still abroad², and Gloucester took the opportunity which his absence offered, and which perhaps an increasing personal influence over the king helped him to seize, to remove the ministers and make a great alteration in his nephew's surroundings. The king landed on the 9th of February, 1432; on the 26th Hungerford had to resign the treasurership to John lord le Scrope of Masham; on the 1st of March lord Cromwell the chamberlain was dismissed, and lord Tiptoft was relieved from the stewardship of the household³; on the 4th of March, the great seal, which the archbishop of York had resigned on February 25, was confided to John Stafford, bishop of Bath⁴; other minor changes followed. As might be expected, the cardinal speedily returned home and the next parliament was a stormy one.

and on the protector's salary,

Beaufort's jewels seized.

Change of ministers on the king's return, 1432.

337. It met on the 12th of May at Westminster before the king in person⁵, and was opened by the new chancellor with a speech on the text 'Fear God, honour the King;' the three points of application being the defence of religion, the maintenance of law, and the relief of the national poverty; the last a new feature in such addresses, but probably introduced now in consequence of a real pressure. On the second day Gloucester spoke, in the idea, he said, of assuring the commons that the Parliament of 1432.

¹ Ordinances, iv. 103.

² Beaufort had returned to England Dec. 21, 1430, and attended the parliament of 1431, but went back to France after Easter; Amund. i. 56, 58, 62; Rymer, x. 491.

³ Rymer, x. 402; Ordinances, iv. 109. Hardyng speaks highly of lord Cromwell's wisdom, perhaps referring to his money-getting craft, p. 395.

⁴ Rymer, x. 500, 501.

⁵ Rot. Parl. iv. 388. John Russell was speaker; the grants were reported July 17. The council had on the 7th addressed writs to the duke of Norfolk, the earls of Suffolk, Huntingdon, Stafford, Northumberland, and lord Cromwell, forbidding them to bring up more than their ordinary retinues; Ordinances, iv. 112.

Gloucester professes his desire of concord.

Formal complaint of the cardinal.

The king declares the cardinal loyal.

A compromise.

Lord Cromwell asks to be told the reason of his dismissal.

lords were agreed among themselves¹: he was, it was true, the king's nearest kinsman, and had been constituted by act of parliament his chief counsellor, but it was not his wish therefore to act without the advice and consent of the other lords; he accordingly asked their assistance and promised to act on their advice; the lords signified their agreement, and this pleasing fiction of concord was announced by the chancellor to the commons. The duke had by this assertion of his intentions thrown down the gauntlet. Beaufort took it up and made a successful appeal to the estates. He declared that, having with due licence from the king set out for Rome, he had, when in Flanders, been recalled to England by the report that he was accused of treason. He had returned to meet the charge: let the accuser stand forth and he would answer it. The demand was debated before the king and Gloucester, and the answer was that no such charge had been made against him, and that the king accounted him loyal. Beaufort asked that this proceeding might be recorded, and it was done². In the matter of the jewels he was easily satisfied: they were restored to him, and he agreed to lend Henry £6000, to be repaid in case the king within six years should be convinced that the jewels had been illegally seized, and £6000 more as an ordinary loan. At the same time he respite the payment of 13,000 marks which were already due to him³. The victory, for it was a victory, was thus dearly purchased; but Beaufort probably saw that the choice of alternatives was very limited, and that it was better to lend than to lose. His sacrifice was appreciated by the commons. On their petition a statute was passed which secured him against all risks of *praemunire*⁴. Encouraged by the cardinal's success, lord Cromwell, on the 16th of June, laid his complaint before the lords; he had, contrary to the sworn articles by which the council was regulated, been removed from his office of chamberlain: he

¹ Rot. Parl. iv. 389.

² Ib. iv. 390; 391; Rymer, x. 517.

³ Rot. Parl. iv. 391; Rymer, x. 518. In 1434 Henry promised that the £6000 should be repaid, and then Beaufort lent £10,000 more; Ordinances, iv. 236-239.

⁴ Rot. Parl. iv. 392; Rymer, x. 516.

recounted his services, producing Bedford's testimony to his character, and demanded to be told whether he had been removed for some fault or offence. Gloucester refused to bring forward any charge against him. He was told that his removal was not owing to his fault, but was the pleasure of the duke and the council; and this formal acquittal was enrolled at his request among the records of parliament¹. On the 15th of July the supplies were granted: half a tenth and fifteenth was voted, with tunnage and poundage for two years; and the subsidy on wool was continued until November 1435². Of the minor transactions of the parliament some were important; Sir John Cornwall, who had married the duchess of Exeter, daughter of John of Gaunt, was created baron of Fanhope in parliament³; the duke of York was declared of age; and the statute of 1430 was amended by the enactment that the freehold qualification of the county electors must lie within the shire⁴. The complicated grant of land and income tax of 1431, which it was found impossible to collect, was annulled⁵. Two petitions of the commons, one praying that men might not be called before parliament or council in cases touching freehold⁶, the other affecting the privileges of members molested on their way to parliament⁷, were negatived. The result of the proceedings was on the whole advantageous to Gloucester; he had failed to crush the cardinal, but he retained his pre-dominance in the council. He was not to retain it long.

He is answered.

Grant of supplies.

Minor transactions in parliament, 1432.

338. The hopes of the English in France were rapidly waning. The duke of Burgundy was growing tired of the

¹ Rot. Parl. iv. 392.

² Ib. iv. 389. The Canterbury clergy granted a half tenth, the York clergy a quarter of a tenth; Wilk. Conc. iii. 521.

³ Rot. Parl. iv. 400: '17^{mo} die Julii ultimo die praesentis parliamenti, in trium statuum ejusdem parliamenti praesentia de avisamento . . . dominorum spiritualium et temporalium in parlamento praedicto existentium, praefatum Johannem in baronem indigenam regni sui Angliae erexit praefecit et creavit.' Cf. Rymer, x. 524. The Chronicle published by Dr. Giles, p. 9, states that Cornwall was made baron of Fanhope, and that the lords Cromwell, Tiptoft, and Hungerford were created at Leicester in 1426.

⁴ Rot. Parl. iv. 409; Statutes, ii. 273.

⁵ Above, p. 116; Rot. Parl. iv. 409.

⁶ Ib. iv. 403.

⁷ Ib. iv. 404.

Proceedings of Bedford in France, 1432-3.

Parliament of July 1433.

Bedford defends himself against false charges.

Bedford declared loyal.

Change of treasurer.

struggle; Bedford's health and strength were rapidly giving way. The death of his wife in November 1432 broke the strongest link that bound him to duke Philip, and a new marriage which he concluded early in 1433 with the sister of the count of S. Pol, instead of adding to the number of his allies, weakened his hold on Burgundy. Negotiations were set on foot for a general pacification. Gloucester spent a month on the continent, trying his hand at diplomacy¹, and immediately on his return summoned the parliament to meet in July. In the interval Bedford and Burgundy met at S. Omer, and the coolness between them became a quarrel, although they had still so great interests in common that they could not afford to break up their alliance. At the end of June Bedford visited England once more, and he was present at the beginning of the session². Whether he had seen or heard anything that led him to suspect his brother's friendship, it is not so easy to say; but on the sixth day of the parliament he announced that he had come home to defend himself against false accusations. It had been asserted, as he understood, that the losses which the king had sustained in France were caused by his neglect; he prayed that his accusers might be made to stand forth and prove the charges³. After mature deliberation the chancellor answered him: no such charges had reached the ears of the king, the duke of Gloucester, or the council. The king retained full confidence in him as his faithful liegeman and dearest uncle, and thanked him for his great services and for coming home at last. A sudden alarm of plague broke up the session in August, to be resumed in October⁴; but the effect of Bedford's visit on the administration was already apparent; lord Cromwell, before the prorogation, was appointed treasurer of the kingdom⁵, and in the interim prepared an elaborate statement of the national accounts. Money was so scarce that the parlia-

¹ April 22 to May 23; Rymer, x. 548, 549.

² Parliament opened July 8; Roger Hunt was the speaker; Rot. Parl. iv. 419, 420; Stow, p. 373; Fabyan, p. 607. Bedford reached London June 23; Chr. Lond. p. 120.

³ Rot. Parl. iv. 420.

⁴ The parliament was prorogued Aug. 13, to meet again Oct. 13; Rot. Parl. iv. 420.

⁵ Aug. 11; Ordinances, iv. 175.

ment authorised him to stay all regular payments until he had £2000 in hand for petty expenses. Cromwell's statement of the national finances¹ was brought up on the 18th of October, and was alarming if not appalling. The ancient ordinary revenue of the crown, which in the gross amounted to £23,000, was reduced by fixed charges to £8,990; the duchy of Lancaster furnished £2,408 clear, the indirect taxes on wine, and other merchandise, brought in an estimated sum of £26,966 more. The government of Ireland just paid its expenses; the duchy of Guienne, the remnant of the great inheritance of Queen Eleanor, furnished only £77 os. 8 $\frac{3}{4}$ d.: the expenses of Calais, £9,064 15s. 6d., exceeded the whole of the ordinary revenue of the crown. The sum available for administration, £38,364, was altogether insufficient to meet the expenditure, which was estimated at £56,878, and there were debts to the amount of £164,814 11s. 1 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. It is probable that the accounts of the kingdom had been in much worse order under Edward III and Richard II, but the general state of things had never been less hopeful. All expenses were increasing, all sources of supply were diminishing. But there could not have been much maladministration; a single annual grant of a fifteenth would be sufficient to balance revenue and expenditure and would leave something to pay off the debt. There was reason for careful economy; Bedford determined to make an effort to secure so much at least, and the discussion of public business was resumed on the 3rd of November². On that day the commons, after praying that a proclamation might be issued for the suppression of riotous assemblies, which were taking place in several parts of England, requested that the duke of Bedford would make, and the duke of Gloucester and the council would renew, the promise of concord and mutual co-operation which had been offered in the last parliament. This was done, and the two houses followed the example³. On the 24th the speaker addressed the king in a long speech,

Lord Cromwell's financial statement.

Bedford's proposal to economise.

Declaration of concord.

¹ Rot. Parl. iv. 432-439.

² A very peremptory summons was issued on Nov. 1 for the immediate attendance of several lay lords and abbots; Lords' Report, iv. 887.

³ Rot. Parl. iv. 421, 422.

The Commons pray Bedford to stay in England.

His self-denying offer.

Economies in the council, November 1433.

Grants in parliament, 1433.

extolling the character and services of Bedford, and stating the belief of the commons that his continued stay in England would be of the greatest conceivable security to the well-being of the king and his realms: he besought the king to request the duke to abide still in the land. The lords, on being consulted by the chancellor, seconded the prayer of the commons, and the proposal was at once laid before the duke. Bedford, in a touching speech, full of modesty and simplicity, declared himself at the king's disposal¹. The next day, giving a laudable example of self-denial, he offered to accept a salary of £1000 as chief counsellor instead of the 5000 marks which Gloucester had been receiving², and on the 28th Gloucester in council agreed to accept the same sum³. At the close of the session the archbishops, the cardinal, and the bishops of Lincoln and Ely agreed to give their attendance without payment, if they were not obliged to be present in vacation⁴. This simple measure effected a clear saving of more than £2000 a year. The good-will of the commons followed on the good example of the council; a grant of one fifteenth and a tenth, minus the sum of £4000 which was to be applied to the relief of poor towns, was voted, and tunnage and poundage continued⁵. The fifteenth would bring in at least £33,000 and the clerical grant voted in November⁶ would give about £9,000 more. The council was empowered to give security for 100,000 marks of debt⁷, and it was agreed, on the treasurer's proposal, that the accounts should be audited in council⁸. On the 18th of December Bedford produced the articles of condition on which he proposed to undertake the office of counsellor; he wished to

¹ Rot. Parl. iv. 423.

² The wages of the councillors are a constantly recurring topic in all the records of the time; see especially Rymer, x. 360; Ordinances, iii. 156, 202, 222, 265, 278; iv. 12; Rot. Parl. v. 404. Cardinal Beaufort when attending the king in France had £4000 per annum; Rymer, x. 472. Gloucester was to receive 4000 marks as lieutenant during the king's absence; 2000 when he was in England; Ord. iv. 12: to this sum 2000 marks were added, ib. p. 103; and 5000 marks fixed as his ordinary salary, ib. p. 105.

³ Rot. Parl. iv. 424; Ordinances, iv. 185.

⁴ Rot. Parl. iv. 446.

⁵ Ib. iv. 425, 426.

⁶ Dep. Keeper's Rep. iii. App. p. 15. It was three quarters of a tenth; Wilk. Conc. iii. 523.

⁷ Rot. Parl. iv. 426.

⁸ Ib. iv. 439.

know who would be the members of the continual council; he demanded that without his advice and that of the council no members should be added or removed, that the opinion of the council should be taken as to the appointments to great offices of state, that he should, wherever he was, be consulted about the summoning of parliament and the appointment to bishoprics, and that a record should be kept of the names of old servants of the king, who should be rewarded as occasion might offer. All these points were conceded, and the duke entered upon his office¹.

Bedford undertakes the office of chief counsellor.

But he was destined to no peaceful or long tenure. It was soon seen that even with Bedford at home duke Humfrey could not long be kept quiet. Signs of uneasiness and mistrust between the two brothers at last appeared. It was proposed that Gloucester should go to France, where the earl of Arundel was tasked beyond his strength in the defence of Normandy. The country was not altogether indisposed to peace, and an order had been passed in the parliament of 1431 that Bedford, Gloucester, Beaufort, and the council might open negotiations². On the 26th of April, 1434, a large council was held at Westminster³, a considerable number of lords and knights who were not of the privy council being summoned by writs of privy seal. Gloucester offered to go to France, and reviewed the conduct of the war there in such terms that Bedford, conceiving himself to be attacked, demanded that the words should be written down, in order that he might defend himself before the king. The council deliberated on Gloucester's proposition and found that it would involve an expenditure of nearly £50,000, which they saw no means of raising⁴. Gloucester, who as usual dealt in generalities, was pressed to explain how the money was to be secured. Bedford and the council severally appealed to the king, who declared that the matter must go no further. The poor lad, now only thirteen, consulted the council, and, probably under the advice of Beaufort, told the dukes that they were both his dearest uncles, that no attack

Uneasy relations between Gloucester and Bedford, 1434.

Gloucester's futile proposition.

¹ Rot. Parl. iv. 423, 424.

² Ordinances, iv. 210-213.

³ Ib. iv. 371.

⁴ Ib. iv. 213 sq.

Henry makes peace between his uncles.

Bedford goes back to France,
June 1434.
Congress of Arras, August 1435.

Defection of Burgundy.

Bedford's
death, Sept.
14, 1435.

Results of Bedford's
death.

had been made on the honour of either, and that he prayed there should be no discord between them. The discord indeed ceased, but Bedford immediately began to prepare for departure. On the 9th of June he addressed three propositions to the king; the revenues of the duchy of Lancaster should be applied to the war in France; the garrisons in the march of Calais should be put under his command; and he should be allowed to devote for two years the whole of his own Norman revenue to the war¹. The king and council gratefully agreed: on the 20th he took his leave of them², and about the end of the month he sailed for France. His game there was nearly played out. After a conference with the duke of Burgundy at Paris at Easter 1435, he was obliged, by the pressure of the pope and his conviction of his own failing strength, to agree to join in a grand European congress of ambassadors which was to be held at Arras in August, for the purpose of arbitrating and if possible making peace. The French offered considerable sacrifices, but the English ambassadors demanded greater; they saw that Burgundy was going to desert them, and on the 6th of September withdrew from the congress. Burgundy's desertion was the last thing required to break down the spirit and strength of Bedford. He died on the 14th at Rouen. Duke Philip, relieved by his death from any obligation to temporise, made his terms with Charles VII, and a week later renounced the English alliance. Bedford must have felt that, after all he had done and suffered, he had lived and laboured in vain. The boy king, when he wept with indignation at duke Philip's unworthy treatment, must have mingled tears of still more bitter grief for the loss of his one true and faithful friend.

339. With Bedford England lost all that had given great, noble, or statesmanlike elements to her attempt to hold France. He alone had entertained the idea of restoring the old and somewhat ideal unity of the English and Norman nationalities, of bestowing something like constitutional government on

¹ Ordinances, iv. 222-226; Rot. Parl. v. 435-438.

² Ordinances, iv. 243-247.

France, and of introducing commercial and social reforms, for which, long after his time, the nation sighed in vain. The policy on which he acted was so good and sound, that, if anything could, it might have redeemed the injustice which, in spite of all justificative argument, really underlay the whole scheme of conquest. For England, although less directly apparent, the consequences of his death were not less significant. It placed Gloucester in the position of heir-presumptive to the throne; it placed the Beauforts one step nearer to the point at which they with the whole fortunes of Lancaster must stand or fall. It placed the duke of York also one degree nearer to the succession in whatever way the line of succession might be finally regulated. It let loose all the disruptive forces which Bedford had been able to keep in subjection. It left cardinal Beaufort the only Englishman who had any pretension to be called a politician, and furnished him with a political programme, the policy of peace, not indeed unworthy of a prince of the church, a great negotiator, and a patriotic statesman, but yet one which the mass of the English, born and nurtured under the influences of the long war, was not ready heartily to accept.

Beaufort's policy after Bedford's
death.

For the moment perhaps both king and nation thought more of Burgundy's desertion than of Bedford's death, of revenge more than of continued defence. Peace with France would be welcome; it would be intolerable not to go to war with Burgundy. The chancellor, in opening parliament on October 10¹, dilated at length on the perjuries of duke Philip; if he said a word about Bedford, it was not thought worth recording: the only thought of him seems to have been how to raise money on the estates which he and the earl of Arundel, who also had laid down his life for the English dominion, had left in the custody of the crown. The commons, who had grown so parsimonious of late, granted not only a tenth and fifteenth, a continuance of the subsidy on wool, tunnage and Irritation against Burgundy.

Parliament
of 1435.

¹ Rot. Parl. iv. 481. John Bowes was speaker. It was called in pursuance of a resolution of council held July 5; Ord. iv. 304; Lords' Report, iv. 888.

Great effort of the commons.

Paris taken April 13, 1436.

Calais relieved by Edmund,
Beaufort.

Gloucester's short campaign in 1436.

poundage, but a heavy graduated income-tax, of novel character now¹, though it became too familiar in later times. They further empowered the council to give security for £100,000, a larger loan than had ever been contemplated before². Gloucester was appointed for nine years captain of Calais³, and at last he was to have the chance of showing his mettle; for the cardinal himself had nothing better to propose. The session closed on the 23rd of December; war was to be resumed early in the next year; the garrison of Calais ravaged the Flemish provinces, and the Burgundians prepared to besiege Calais. Yet, before anything was done by Gloucester, Paris had been recovered by the French king. Edmund Beaufort, now count of Mortain and Harcourt⁴, the aspiring rival of Gloucester and York, was able to snatch the first and almost solitary laurels. By him Calais was succoured and enabled to repel its besiegers before Gloucester would set sail for its relief, or the duke of York, the newly-appointed regent, who entered on his office in April, could complete his equipment⁵. Gloucester's Flemish campaign occupied eleven days⁶, and he returned, after this brief experience of marauding warfare, to receive from his nephew the title of Count of Flanders, an honour scarcely less substantial than the royal title which its bestower continued

¹ Rot. Parl. iv. 486, 487. Incomes of 100s. paid 2s. 6d., and 6d. in the pound up to £100; over £100 they paid 8d. in the pound up to £400; over £400 2s. in the pound. A similar grant was made in convocation Dec. 23; Dep. Keeper's Rep. iii. App. 16; Wilk. Conc. iii. 525.

² Rot. Parl. iv. 482. Writs were issued for a loan, Feb. 14, 1436, the treasurer to give security for repayment from the fifteenth granted in the last parliament; Ordinances, iv. 316, 329. Cf. pp. 352 sq.

³ Rot. Parl. iv. 483.

⁴ So entitled as early as April 19, 1431; Carte, French Rolls, ii. 273; he was made earl of Dorset in 1441, marquess in 1442, and duke of Somerset in 1448. Hardyng calls him 'wise and sage' (p. 388), and ascribes to him all the credit of relieving Calais, p. 396; as for Gloucester, 'he rode into Flanders a little waye and litle did to count a manly man.' 'The earl of Mortayne went to Calys sone after Estyr;' Gregory, p. 178. This chronicler gives the credit of the repulse of the Burgundians to Beaufort and Camoys. Cf. Leland, Coll. ii. 492; Engl. Chron. (ed. Davies), p. 55; Chron. Giles, p. 15.

⁵ According to Hall, p. 179, Stow, p. 375, the earl of Mortain was so jealous of the duke of York that he prevented him from leaving England until Paris was lost. He had wished, it was said, to marry queen Katharine, but was prevented by Gloucester; Chron. Giles, p. 17.

⁶ Aug. 1-15; see Stevenson, Wars in France, ii. pp. xix, xx.

to bear. This was the work of 1436. In 1437 the parliament, which sat from January to March, renewed the grants of 1435, except the income-tax, and did little more¹. This year negotiations were set on foot for the release of John Beaufort, earl of Somerset, who had been a captive in France since 1421; he was exchanged for the count of Eu and returned home to strengthen the party of the cardinal². After a year's experience the duke of York refused to serve any longer in France, and the earl of Warwick, Henry's tutor, was appointed to succeed him as regent³. Bedford's widow had already forgotten him and married one of his officers; queen Katharine had long ago set the example, although the public revelation of her imprudence was deferred during her life. She died on the 3rd of January, 1437, leaving the young king more alone than ever. Warwick died in April, 1439, after no great successes. Such credit as was gained in France at all fell to the share of the two Beauforts. The zeal of the nation died away quickly; and in October, 1439, a truce for three years with Burgundy was concluded at Calais⁴; negotiations for a peace with Charles VII going slowly on in parallel with the slow and languishing war⁵. The cardinal's schemes for a general pacification were ripening. Gloucester showed neither energy nor originality, but contented himself with being obstructive. The parliament, in a hopeless sort of way, voted supplies and

Parliament
of 1437.

Warwick
regent of France, 1437.

Death of the queen, 1437.

Truce with Burgundy, 1439.

¹ The parliament of 1437 began Jan. 21; Sir John Tyrell was speaker. The grants were made on the last day of the session; Rot. Parl. iv. 495, 496, 501, 502. The security given was for £100,000; p. 504. The clergy granted a tenth; Wilk. Conc. iii. 525.

² Rymer, x. 664, 680, 697.

³ The duke's indentures expired and he was not willing to continue in office, April 7, 1437; Ordin. v. 6, 7. The earl of Warwick was nominated lieutenant July 16, 1437; Rymer, x. 674. He died in April, 1439. After his death the lieutenancy seems to have been in commission; but the earl of Somerset is found calling himself, and acting as, lieutenant until after York's reappointment; see Appendix D to the Foedera, pp. 443-447; Stevenson, Wars in France, ii. 304. Cf. Ordinances, v. 16, 33; Chr. Giles, p. 18. It could however only be for a few months, as he was in England in December 1439; Ordinances, v. 112.

⁴ Rymer, x. 723-736.

⁵ The journal of the ambassadors sent to negotiate with France on the mediation of cardinal Beaufort and the duchess of Burgundy, who was Beaufort's niece, is printed in the Ordinances, v. pp. 335-437.

Parliament
of 1439.

sanctioned the granting of private petitions, trying from time to time new expedients in taxation and slight amendments in the commercial laws. In the session of 1439¹ the renewed grants of subsidies for three years—a fifteenth and tenth and a half—were supplemented by a tax upon aliens, sixteen pence on householders, sixpence a head on others²; and the unappropriated revenues of the duchy of Lancaster were devoted to the charge of the household³.

The duke of York regent in France;
1440.

340. The next year the projects of peace began to take a more definite form, and Gloucester's opposition assumed a more consistent character. On the 2nd of July⁴ the duke of York was again made lieutenant-general in France, in the place of Somerset, who had been in command since Warwick's death, and who, with his brother Edmund, achieved this year the great success of retaking Harfleur⁵. At the same time the duke of Orleans, who had been a prisoner in England since the battle of Agincourt, obtained the order for his release, on the understanding that he should do his best to bring about

Release of the duke of Orleans.

¹ The parliament began Nov. 12; on Dec. 21 it was prorogued to meet at Reading, Jan. 14; William Tresham was speaker; measures were taken against dishonest purveyors. Convocation granted a tenth; Wilk. Conc. iii. 536; Rot. Parl. v. 3; Chron. Lond. pp. 126, 127. Hall commends the commercial policy of this parliament, p. 187; see Rot. Parl. v. 24; Statutes, ii. 302. One act forbade alien merchants to sell to aliens, put their sales under view of the Exchequer, and ordered them within eight months to invest the proceeds in English goods. Cf. Stow, p. 377.

² Rot. Parl. v. 4-6; 3rd Report of Dep. Keeper, App. p. 17. 'Alyens were putte to hyr fynauce to pay a certayne a yeie to the kynge;' Gregory, p. 182.

³ The Lancaster inheritance had been preserved as a separate property of the crown, apart from the royal demesne, by Henry IV; and Henry V had added to it the estates inherited from his mother. Great part of it had however by charters of enfeoffment been put in the hands of trustees for the payment of his debts, charitable endowments, and trusts of his will. Of these trustees cardinal Beaufort was the most influential, and he retained the administration of the lands, according to the belief of parliament, much longer than was necessary. See Rot. Parl. iii. 428; iv. 46, 72, 138, 139, 301, 488; v. 6.

⁴ Rymer, x. 786. The appointment was for five years. He had not set out on May 23, 1441; Ordinances, v. 146. Hardyng's statements about the regency of France and Normandy are peculiar; he says that the duke of Burgundy governed for a year after Bedford's death; the earl of Warwick succeeded, p. 396; then the earl of Stafford for two years, the earl of Huntingdon for two, and then the duke of York for seven.

⁵ July to October; Appendix D to Foedera, pp. 453-459; Stow, p. 376.

peace with France. This was done notwithstanding the direct opposition and formal protest of Gloucester, who on the 2nd of June disavowed all participation in the act¹, and followed up his protest by a vigorous attack on his uncle. In this document, which was addressed to Henry², the duke embodied his charges against the cardinal and archbishop Kemp, and vented all the spite which he had been accumulating for so many years: the letter assumes the dimensions of a pamphlet, and is sufficient by itself to establish the writer's incapacity for government. Beaufort, according to his nephew's representation, had obtained the cardinalate to satisfy his personal pride and ambition, and to enable him to assume a place to which he was not entitled in the synods of the church and in the council of the king: he had illegally retained or resumed the see of Winchester and deserved the penalties of praemunire; he and the archbishop of York, his confederate, had usurped undue influence over the king himself, and had estranged from him not only the writer but the duke of York and the earl of Huntingdon, to say nothing of the archbishop of Canterbury; he had moreover, in his money-lending transactions, sacrificed the king's interest to his own; he had provided extravagantly for Elizabeth Beauchamp³ and his nephew Swinford; he had defrauded the king of the ransom of king James of Scotland by marrying him to his niece; he had mismanaged affairs at the congress of Arras in 1435 and at Calais in 1439; in the former case he had allowed Burgundy and France to be reconciled, in the latter he had connived at an alliance between Burgundy and Orleans. The release of the duke of Orleans simply meant the renunciation of the kingdom of France; Beaufort and Kemp had even gone so far as directly to counsel such a humiliating act. Public mismanagement, private dishonesty, and treachery both private and public, are freely charged against both the prelates.

Violent attack of Gloucester on Beaufort and Kemp.

Gloucester's charges against Beaufort, 1440.

¹ Rymer, x. 764-767.

² Stevenson, Wars in France, ii. 440; Hall, Chr. pp. 197-202; Arnold, Chr. pp. 279-286.

³ Henry V had left this lady '300 marks worth of lyvelode,' if she should marry within a year. She had waited two years and more; notwithstanding Beaufort, as his nephew's executor, had paid the money.

Reply of the council.

The duke's protest, which must have been very mischievous, was answered by a letter of the council¹, in which, not caring to notice the personal charges, they defended the policy of the act: the release of Orleans was an act of the king himself, done from the desire of peace; a desire fully justified by the great cost of bloodshed, the heavy charges, the exhaustion of both countries: it was a bad example to doom a prisoner of war to perpetual incarceration, or, by vindictively retaining him, to lose all the benefit of his co-operation in the obtaining of peace. The answer is full of good sense and good feeling, but it could never have commanded the same success as the manifesto of duke Humfrey obtained. That document helped to substitute in the mind of the nation, for the wholesome desire of peace which had been gradually growing, a vicious, sturdy, and unintelligent hatred to the men who were seeking peace: a feeling which prejudiced the people in general against Margaret of Anjou, and which, after having helped to destroy Gloucester himself, caused the outbreak of disturbances which led to civil war. It is curious to note how Gloucester tries to represent the duke of York and the earl of Huntingdon as sharers in his feelings of resentment. Either he was too much blinded by spite to see the real drift of the cardinal's policy, or else those deeper grudges of the royal house, which had cost and were still to cost so much bloodshed, were at the time altogether forgotten in the personal dislike of the Beauforts. Notwithstanding the protest, the duke of Orleans obtained his freedom².

Mischief done by Gloucester.

Eleanor Cobham, Gloucester's wife, tried for witchcraft, 1441.

The next year witnessed a miserable incident that served to show that Gloucester was either powerless or contemptibly pusillanimous³. After his separation from the unfortunate Jacqueline, which was followed by a papal bull declaring the nullity of their marriage, he had consoled himself with the society of one of her ladies, Eleanor Cobham, whom he had subsequently married. Eleanor Cobham, early in 1441, was suspected of treasonable sorcery, and took sanctuary at Westminster. After appearing before the two archbishops, cardinal Beaufort, and bishop Ascough of Salisbury, she was imprisoned in Leeds castle; and subsequently, on the report of a special commission, consisting of the earls of Huntingdon and Suffolk and several judges, she was indicted for treason. After several hearings, she declined to defend herself, submitted to the correction of the bishops, and did penance; she was then committed to the charge of Sir Thomas Stanley and kept during the remainder of her life a prisoner. The object of her necromantic studies was no doubt to secure a speedy succession to the crown for her husband. He does not seem to have ventured to act overtly on her behalf; whether from cowardice or from a conviction of her guilt. It was not forgotten that queen Johanna had in the same way conspired against the life of Henry V; and, when both accusers and accused fully believed in the science by which such treasonable designs were to be compassed, it is as difficult to condemn the prosecutor as it is to acquit the accused. The people, we are told, pitied the duchess. If the prosecution were dictated by hostility to her husband, the story is disgraceful to both factions alike.

¹ Stevenson, Wars in France, ii. 451.

² Nov. 12, 1440; Rymer, x. 829.

³ Chron. Lond. pp. 129, 130; Engl. Chron. (ed. Davies), pp. 57-60; Stow, p. 381; Fabyan, p. 614; Rot. Parl. v. 445.

Her trial and imprisonment.

During the years 1441 and 1442 the duke of York won some credit in the north of France; the power of Charles VII was increasing in the south. The English parliament met on the 25th of January in the latter year¹; granted the subsidies, tunnage and poundage, for two years, a fifteenth and tenth, and the alien tax. The vote of security for £100,000 had now become an annual act. A petition, connected doubtless with the duchess of Gloucester's trial, that ladies of great estate, duchesses, countesses, or baronesses, should, under the Parliament of 1442.

Trials of peeresses regulated by statute.

¹ Rot. Parl. v. 35; William Tresham was again speaker; the grants were made March 27; ib. pp. 37-40. 'At which parliament it was ordained that the sea should be kept half a year at the king's cost, and therefore to pay a whole fifteenth, and London to lend him £3000;' Chr. Lond. p. 130; Rot. Parl. v. 59. Convocation granted a tenth, April 16; Wilk. Conc. iii. 536. A general pardon was granted at Easter 1442, from which remunerative returns were expected; Ordinances, v. 185.

Fleet at sea.

provisions of Magna Carta, be tried by the peers, was granted¹; Sir John Cornwall, the baron of Fanhope, was created baron of Milbroke. It was also determined that the king's fleet should keep the sea from Candlemas to Martinmas; the force so ordered included eight great ships of a hundred and fifty men each; each ship attended by a barge of eighty men, and a balynger of forty: also four 'spynes' of twenty-five men. The statute of Edward III was ordered to be enforced on the royal purveyors: there were few general complaints, as what little legislation was attempted was connected with the promotion of trade and commerce, which from the beginning of the Lancastrian period had been so prominent in the statute-book. A demand was made for the examination of the accounts of the duchy of Lancaster, which was still in the hands of the cardinal and his co-feeoffees for the execution of the will of Henry V². The young king was busy with his foundations at Eton and Cambridge.

Trade legislation.Henry comes of age.

341. On the 6th of December, 1442, Henry reached the age of legal majority, and must then have entered, if he had not entered before, into a full comprehension of the burden that lay upon him in the task of governing a noble but exhausted people, and of setting to right the wrongs of a hundred years³. He had been very early initiated in the forms of sovereignty. Before he was four years old he had been brought into the Painted Chamber to preside at the opening of parliament, and from that time had generally officiated in person on such occasions. Before he was eight he was crowned king of England, and as soon as he was ten king of France. At the age of eleven he had had to make peace between his uncles of Bedford and Gloucester, and at thirteen had shed bitter tears over the defection of Burgundy. Whilst he was still under the discipline of a tutor, liable

Early training of the king.

¹ Rot. Parl. v. 56.

² Ib. v. 56-59. The appropriation of the duchy revenue to the household, ordered in 1439, was continued for three years; ib. p. 62.

³ A panegyric on Henry VI, written by John Blakman, S. T. B., afterwards a monk of the Charterhouse, furnishes some of the most distinct traits of his character; it is edited by Hearne, at the end of his Otterbourne, i. 287 sq.

to personal chastisement at the will of the council, he had been made familiar with the great problems of state work. Under the teaching of Warwick he had learned knightly accomplishments; Gloucester had pressed him with book-learning; Beaufort had instructed him in government and diplomacy. He was a somewhat precocious scholar, too early taught to recognise his work as successor of Henry V. It is touching to read the letters written under his eye, in which he petitions for the canonisation of S. Osmund and king Alfred, or describes the interest he takes in the council of Basel, and presses on the potentates of east and west the great opportunity for ecclesiastical union which is afforded by the councils of Florence and Ferrara¹. Thus at the age of fifteen he was busy at the work which had overtaken the greatest kings that had reigned before him, and which is undone still. In the work of the universities, like duke Humfrey himself, he was as early interested; his foundations at Eton and Cambridge were begun when he was eighteen, and watched with the greatest care as long as he lived. The education of his half-brothers Edmund and Jasper Tudor² was a matter of serious thought to him whilst he was a child himself. Weak in health,—for had he been a boy of average strength he would have been allowed to appear in military affairs as early as his father and grandfather had appeared,—and precocious rather than strong in mind, he was overworked

He was over-tasked in his youth.

His interest in education.

His weak health.

¹ Beckington's Letters, ed. Williams, i. 134, &c. 'Nonnullis etiam solebat clericis destinare epistolas exhortatorias, caelestibus plenas sacramentis et saluberrimis admonitionibus;' Blakman, p. 290.

² 'Quibus pro tunc arctissimam et securissimam providebat custodiam;' Blakman, p. 293. The same writer records his habit of saying to the Eton boys 'sitis boni pueri, mites et docibiles et servi Domini;' ib. p. 296. His answer to the petition for the restoration of grammar schools is in Rot. Parl. v. 137. Beckington's Letters are full of illustrations of his zeal for the universities. Yet Hardyng describes him as little better than an idiot when a child:—

'The Erle Richard in mykell worthyhead

Enfourmed hym, but of his symplehead

He could litle within his brest conceyve;

The good from evill he could uneth perceive;' p. 394.

Warwick was so tired 'of the symplesse and great innocence of King Henry' that he resigned his charge and went to France; p. 396. Henry's tendency to insanity may have come from either Charles VI or Henry IV.

Unrivalled misfortunes.

Henry's piety, and sanctity.

from his childhood, and the overwork telling upon a frame in which the germs of hereditary insanity already existed, broke down both mind and body at the most critical period of his reign. Henry was perhaps the most unfortunate king who ever reigned; he outlived power and wealth and friends; he saw all who had loved him perish for his sake, and, to crown all, the son, the last and dearest of the great house from which he sprang, the centre of all his hopes, the depository of the great Lancastrian traditions of English polity, set aside and slain. And he was without doubt most innocent of all the evils that befel England because of him. Pious, pure, generous, patient, simple¹, true and just, humble, merciful, fastidiously conscientious, modest and temperate, he might have seemed made to rule a quiet people in quiet times. His days were divided between the transaction of business and the reading of history and scripture². His devotion was exemplary and unquestionably sincere; he left a mark on the hearts of Englishmen that was not soon effaced: setting aside the fancied or fabled revelations, a part perhaps of his malady, and the false miracles that were reported at his tomb, it was no mere political feeling that led the rough yeomen of Yorkshire and Durham to worship before his statue, that dictated hymns and prayers in his honour, and that retained in the Primer down to the Reformation the prayers of the king who had perished for the sins of his fathers and of the nation. It is needless to say that for the throne of England in the midst of the death-struggle of nations, parties, and liberties, Henry had not one single qualification. He was the last mediæval king who attempted to rule England as a constitutional kingdom or commonwealth.

¹ 'Vir simplex sine omni plica dolositatis aut falsitatis, ut omnibus constat;' Blakman, p. 288. 'Veridica semper exercuerat eloquia;' p. 288. 'Fuerat et rectus et justus . . . nulli vero injuriam facere voluit scienter;' ib. p. 288. His early attempts at the exercise of power were checked; in 1434 the council advised him not to listen to suggestions about important matters, or about the changing of his governors; Ord. iv. 287; Rot. Parl. v. 438. In 1438 they tell him that he gives too many pardons, and has thrown away 1000 marks by giving away the constableness of Chirk; Ordin. v. 89. The executions which followed Cade's rebellion may be alleged against his merciful disposition; but although cruelty would be by no means wonderful in the case of a panic-stricken, nervous invalid, Henry's horror of slaughter and mutilation is so well attested that those acts must be charged on Somerset and his other advisers, rather than on the king. See Blakman, pp. 301, 302.

² 'Aut in orationibus, aut in scripturarum vel cronicarum lectionibus assidue erat occupatus;' Blakman, p. 289. 'Dies illos aut in regni negotiis cum consilio suo tractandis . . . aut in scripturarum lectionibus, vel in scriptis aut cronicis legendis non minus diligenter expendit;' ib. p. 299.

342. His coming of age did not much affect his actual position. He had long been recognised as the depositary of executive powers which were to be exercised by the council; he continued under the influence of the cardinal, from whom he had learned the policy of peace, though he had not learned the art of government. That which was a policy in Beaufort was in Henry a true love and earnest desire. He must have longed for peace as a blessing which he and living England had never known. Gloucester, powerless for good, stood aloof from government, sometimes throwing in a cynical remark in council, but chiefly employed in cultivating popularity and that reputation as a lover of literature which has stood him in so good stead with posterity. The parallel lines of war and negotiation run on for three years more, the war kept alive by the emulation of the duke of York and the Beauforts, a rivalry which, whilst it prevented anything like concerted action, saved the reputation of English valour abroad. The duke's term of office lasted until 1445; in 1442 a great expedition under Somerset was contemplated¹; the want of money delayed it until the summer of 1443; funds were at last provided by the cardinal, who pledged his jewels and plate and furnished £20,000; insisting, however, that security should be given in a special form submitted to the council, which called forth from Gloucester the sneering remark that as his uncle would lend on no other terms it was little use reading the special form². Before the expedition started distinct assurances

The cardinal continues to be the king's chief adviser, 1442.

Rivalry between York and the Beauforts.

Beaufort supplies money for Somerset's expedition to France in 1443.

¹ Sept. 8, 1443, the duke of Somerset went to France; 3700 men were slain or taken during the expedition; Gregory, p. 185. The preparations for the expedition formed a considerable part of the deliberations in council for nearly a year before; Ordinances, v. 218-409.

² Ordinances, v. 279, 280.

were given that Somerset's authority should not prejudice the position of the duke of York as regent¹; but the provision was almost neutralised by his promotion to the rank of duke. John Beaufort was made duke of Somerset in August 1443. His campaign was marked by no great success, and in the following May he died, leaving as his heiress the little lady Margaret, and as the representative of the family his brother Edmund, who was created marquess of Dorset on the 24th of June 1442. Stafford, who in May 1443 succeeded Chichele in the primacy, was still chancellor. Lord Cromwell, after nearly ten years of office, resigned the treasurership in July 1443, and was succeeded by Ralph Boteler, lord Sudeley², who retained it until 1446. No parliament was held between 1442 and 1445, but a great council was ordered for the third week after Easter in 1443, to which in ancient fashion all freeholders were to be called, and possibly a new tax propounded³. It is uncertain whether it was ever summoned, and if summoned it either did not meet or effected nothing. The year 1444 was occupied with negotiation. The earl of Suffolk, William de la Pole, grandson of Richard II's chancellor, and closely connected by marriage with the Beauforts, was the head of the English embassy to France; and he, whether pressed by the court in defiance of his own misgivings, or deliberately pursuing the policy which, whilst it was the best for the country, he felt would be ruinous to himself⁴, concluded on the

Edmund
Beaufort.

Council called in 1443.

Political action of the earl of Suffolk.

Negotiations for peace.

¹ Ordinances, v. 261.

² Ib. v. 299, 300; Rymer, xi. 35. Sudeley retained office until Dec. 18, 1446, when bishop Lumley of Carlisle succeeded him.

³ All the king's freemen and the great council were to be summoned to meet at Westminster a fortnight after Easter, May 5, 1443; Ordinances, v. 236, 237. No records are in existence that show this assembly to have met, but it is possible that some financial expedients which are described in the Ordinances, v. 418 sq., may belong to this date.

⁴ On the 1st of February, 1444, Suffolk's mission was discussed in council; he said that he had been too intimate with the duke of Orleans and other prisoners to be trusted by the nation, and he was very unwilling to go; but the chancellor overruled the objections; Ordinances, vi. 32-35. Accordingly, on February 20, the king wrote to Suffolk promising to warrant all that he might do in the way of obtaining peace, and overruling his scruples at undertaking the task; Rymer, xi. 53. This shows that Suffolk was throughout open and straightforward in his behaviour. The council

28th of May a truce which was to last till the 1st of April, 1446¹. During the truce negotiations were briskly pushed for a marriage, or number of marriages, which might help to secure a permanent peace. Henry, it was proposed, should marry Margaret, daughter of René of Anjou, the titular king of Naples and count of Provence; and the duke of York might obtain a little French princess for his baby son Edward². The former match was pressed and concluded by Suffolk, who, having been created a marquess on the 14th of September 1444, was sent to Nancy to perform the ceremonies of betrothal. Margaret was brought to England early in the following year and married on the 22nd of April; on the 30th she was crowned. She was sixteen at the time.

A truce concluded, 1444.

The king's marriage, April 1445.

Henry, in contemplation of the ceremony, had on the 25th of February opened a parliament, which sat, with several prerogations, until April 9, 1446³. This parliament, in March, 1445, granted a half-fifteenth and tenth⁴, and in April, 1446, a whole fifteenth and tenth and another half⁵: it also continued the subsidy on wool until Martinmas, 1449. The peace and the young queen were as yet new and popular, and the restoration of commerce with France was a great boon. On the 2nd of June, 1445, Suffolk gave an account of his labours to the lords, and on the 4th repeated it to the commons; both houses thanked him and recommended him to the king for his special favour; the record of his services and the votes of thanks were entered on the rolls of parliament⁶. On the last day of the session the chancellor addressed Henry in the name of the lords, in contemplation of the king's visit to France for

Parliament of 1445-6.

Suffolk thanked for his services.

knew what his policy was, and was warned of the dangers which ultimately overwhelmed him.

¹ Rymer, xi. 59-67; Rot. Parl. v. 74.

² Stevenson, Wars in France, i. 79, 80, 160, 168.

³ Rot. Parl. v. 66. William Burley was speaker.

⁴ Mar. 15; Rot. Parl. v. 68. Convocation granted a tenth in Oct. 1444, and another in 1446; Wilk. Conc. iii. 539 sq., 554. The pope had also imposed a tenth on the clergy for a crusade, and sent the golden rose to Henry; ib. p. 551. The king and clergy refused the papal tenth. Cf. Stow, p. 385. The golden rose was delivered Nov. 29, 1446.

⁵ Rot. Parl. v. 69; Hall, Chr. p. 206.

⁶ Rot. Parl. v. 73; Stow, p. 385.

Project of a lasting peace.

Gloucester's dislike to the policy and advocates of peace.

Rise of Suffolk.

the purpose of completing the pacification. The thought of peace had come, he said, not by the suggestion of the king's subjects but by direct inspiration from God: if the king would declare that his purpose of peace was thus spontaneous, the lords would do their best to make it a reality. The words, somewhat ominous, betray a misgiving, and, read by the light of later events, look like a protest¹. The article of the treaty of Troyes, which had bound the king not to make peace with Charles without the consent of the three estates of both realms, was however annulled by act of parliament². All seemed to promise a speedy end to the long trouble and the opening of a new era of happiness for England. It was the crowning victory of Beaufort's life, and it was the most galling defeat for Gloucester: not that he cared to continue the war or would have much preferred the daughter of the count of Armagnac to the daughter of the count of Provence³, but that still whatever Beaufort aimed at he tried to hinder. But the end of the long rivalry was near. In the earl of Suffolk Gloucester had a rival, perhaps an enemy, who cared less about the blood of Lancaster than the Beauforts did; who had devoted himself heart and soul to the service of the young queen, and looked with no special love on the man who, until she should bear a son, stood in the relation of heir-presumptive to the king. At once he took the leading place in the councils of the young couple; Gloucester was scarcely consulted, the king, who could never have felt much regard for his uncle, was persuaded that he was compassing his death with a view to his own succession⁴. In the event of queen Margaret being child-

¹ Rot. Parl. v. 102.

² Ib. v. 102, 103.

³ The Armagnac marriage had been proposed in 1442 (Rymer, xi. 7; Negotiations, &c., in Beckington, Letters, ii. 178-248): but if Gloucester had preferred it, he had reconciled himself to the Angevin match before Margaret's arrival, and had met her with great pomp. On the last occasion too in parliament he had put himself forward in commending Suffolk; Rot. Parl. v. 73.

⁴ 'Incepit rex Henricus graves et ingratas occasiones et querelas contra avunculum ducem Glocestriae ministrare, renuens ejus praesentiam et ab ipso se muniens cum custodibus armatis non paucis, tanquam ab ejus aemulo et inimico mortali;' Chron. ed. Giles, p. 33. Whethamstede's Register, drawn up by one who was well acquainted with duke Humfrey's less, Suffolk had, as was suspected, a deep design of his own; he obtained the wardship of the little lady Margaret¹, on whom the representation of the title of John of Gaunt devolved at her father's death. Child as she was, he projected for her a marriage with his son John: it might come to pass that the great-great-grandson of the merchant William de la Pole would sit on the throne of England. The obscure story of the arrest and death of Gloucester will, it may be safely assumed, never be cleared up; and the depth of the darkness that covers it has inevitably been made the occasion of broadcast accusations and suspicions of every sort. The ostensible events were simple enough.

343. It is by no means improbable that before the end of 1446 an attempt was made to bring the duke to account for his administration as protector, and that a somewhat stormy session of parliament was to be expected when it next met. Marmaduke Lumley, bishop of Carlisle, a friend and ally of Suffolk and an old opponent of Gloucester², was made treasurer in the place of lord Sudeley on the 18th of December. According to the later historians the duke was summoned before the council and had to rebut accusations of maladministration and cruelty committed during the king's minority. Of this discussion however the records of the time contain no trace³. Whatever was done was done in private; overt action however was reserved for 1447.

England had been in 1445 and 1446 devastated by the plague. It was not at all unreasonable to hold a parliament, under the circumstances, away from London; and the parlia-history, says that his enemies so prejudiced the king, 'ut crederet rex eum illius esse inimicum adeo grandem quod moliretur assidue media quibus posset jura coronae sibi surripere illique clam procurare necem ac sic in se regni regimen usurpare;' i. 179.

¹ Cooper's Lady Margaret, p. 5; Excerpt. Hist. pp. 3, 4.

² See above, p. 117; Gloucester had opposed his promotion in 1429; Ord. iv. 8.

³ Hall, Chron. p. 209, says that the duke was summoned before the council and accused of maladministration during the king's minority, of illegal executions and extra-legal cruelties; from which charges he freed himself in a clever speech and was acquitted. There are no traces of this in the extant authorities.

Parliament of Bury,
Feb. 1447.

Forces collected on the spot.

Arrest of Gloucester.

His death.

ment of 1447 was summoned to meet at Cambridge. By a second writ it was transferred to Bury S. Edmund's, a place where Suffolk was strong and Gloucester would be far away from his friends the Londoners. There it met on the 10th of February¹. The archbishop announced the cause of summons—to provide the king with money for a visit to France which was in contemplation². William Tresham, knight of the shire for Northamptonshire, and a friend of the duke of York, was chosen speaker. A large force was encamped in the neighbourhood, and it was perhaps known that some proceedings in parliament relating to Gloucester's conduct were to be expected. Neither the duke nor the cardinal seems to have been present at the opening of the session. On the 18th of February Gloucester arrived with about eighty horsemen and was met a mile out of the town by Sir John Stourton the treasurer and Sir Thomas Stanley the controller of the king's household, who bade him retire at once to his lodgings. As soon as he reached the North Spital, where he was to lodge, and had supped, he was arrested by the viscount of Beaumont, who appeared attended by the duke of Buckingham, the marquess of Dorset, and the earl of Salisbury. Several other persons were arrested at the same time; and on the following days a large number of the duke's servants were imprisoned³. On the 23rd duke Humfrey died in his lodging, called S. Saviour's, outside the north gate⁴: the next day his body was viewed by the members

¹ Rot. Parl. v. 128. The last day of the session was March 3; ib. p. 135. The credit for £100,000 was given on that day.

² This visit, which never took place, occupies a prominent place in the negotiations of these years, as 'Personalis Conventio;' Rymer, xi. pp. 87 sq.

³ See an account by a contemporary writer in English Chron. ed. Davies, pp. 116–118.

⁴ 'Fecit eum rex . . . aretari, ponique in tam arcta custodia quod prae tristitia decideret in lectum aegritudinis, et infra paucos dies posterius seccederet in fata;' Regist. Whethamstede, i. 179. Cf. Gregory, p. 188; Chr. Giles, p. 34; Fabyan, p. 619. The French contemporary historian Mathieu de Coussy asserts that he was strangled, ap. Buchon, xxxv. p. 102; the same writer (xxxvi. 83) says that the murder was ascribed by some to the duke of York, who indeed was the only person who was likely to profit by it. But this is most improbable. Hardyng, who wrote in the Yorkist interest, says, p. 400:—

of the parliament, after which it was taken to be buried at S. Alban's. Such little business as could be done in parliament was hurried through; no grants were asked for; and in March the king went down to Canterbury. It would be vain to attempt to account positively for Gloucester's death; it may have been a natural death, produced or accelerated by the insult of the arrest; it may have been the work of an underling who hoped to secure his own promotion by taking a stumbling-block out of his master's path: if it were the direct act of any of the duke's personal rivals, the stain of guilt can hardly fall on any but Suffolk. It is impossible to suppose that Henry himself was cognisant of the matter, and it is hard to suspect Margaret, a girl of eighteen, although she had already made herself a strong partisan, and there may have lurked in her that thirst for blood which marked more or less all the Neapolitan Angevins. It cannot be supposed that the cardinal would in the last year of his life reverse the policy on which he had acted for fifty years and deal such a fatal blow to the house of Lancaster; or that the marquess of Dorset, who had more to fear from the duke of York than from the duke of Gloucester, would connive at a deed so contrary to the interest of the Beauforts. It is just possible that the council, which must have ordered the arrest, may, by some division of responsibility which would blunt the edge of individual consciences, have connived at the murder. It is almost as probable that the duke was really guilty of treason and was put out of the way to save the good character of others who would be implicated if he were brought to trial. It is most probable that Suffolk knew more of the secret than any other of the lords. The keeper of the privy seal, Adam Moleyns, bishop of Chichester, must have sealed the warrant for the arrest; and in his Obscurity of the question.

Impossibility of the cardinal's guilt.

The council responsible for the arrest.

The secret of it kept by Suffolk.

'Where in parlesey he dyed incontinent
For hevynesse and losse of regiment;
And ofte afore he was in that sykenesse
In poynt of death, and stode in sore distresse;
. . . he so dyed in full and hole creaunce
As a christen prince of royall bloude full clere, Contryte in herte with full greate repentaunce.'

Cf. Stow, p. 386.

Yet Suffolk was never legally charged with murder.

The death probably natural.

Charges brought against Gloucester's servants.

They are pardoned.

confession, made shortly before his death, he stated some matters which Suffolk had to disavow, although the name of duke Humfrey was not mentioned. Yet there is nothing in the history of either of these men that would give the least probability to such a charge as this. The commons, when in 1451¹ they petitioned for sentence of forfeiture against Suffolk, did not go beyond terming him the cause and labourer of the arrest, imprisonment, and final destruction of the duke; the accusation in its complete form was the work of the triumphant Yorkists long after. On the whole, the evidence, both of direct statement and silence among contemporary writers, tends to the belief that Gloucester's death was owing to natural causes, probably to a stroke of paralysis; his arrest to some design in which all the leading lords were partakers. The charges made against his servants, who were arrested at the same time, were definite enough; they had conspired to make the duke king of England and Eleanor Cobham queen; they had falsely and traitorously imagined the death and destruction of the king, and had conspired together for the purpose; they had raised an armed force and set out for Bury S. Edmund's to kill the king². On the 8th of July Thomas Herbert and four others were tried by a special commission, of which Suffolk was the head, and convicted by a Kentish jury at Deptford; but a week later they were pardoned by the king; and in the month of October their reputed accomplices received a similar pardon. We may infer from this that Henry could scarcely have believed the story of his uncle's treason; but the favours which were afterwards showered on both Suffolk and Moleyns show

¹ Rot. Parl. v. 226.

² Rymer, xi. 178. Thirty-eight of the duke's servants were arrested. On Friday, July 14, five were condemned to the penalties of treason and brought to the gallows. At the last moment Suffolk produced the pardon and they were released; Gregory, p. 188. A list of forty-two is given by Ellis, Original Letters, 2nd Series, i. 108, 109; cf. Leland, Coll. ii. 494. Gregory says that the arrested persons never 'ymagenyd no falseness of the that they were put upon of.' The pardon is granted in consideration of the approaching festival of the Assumption, on which day the pope had granted indulgences to those visiting the king's college at Eton: it is dated July 14, and was no doubt the king's independent act. See Blakman, p. 301.

equally clearly that he did not believe them responsible for the duke's murder.

On the 11th of April, six weeks after the death of Gloucester, the cardinal of England passed away; not, as the great poet has described him, in the pangs of a melodramatic despair¹, but with the same business-like dignity in which for so long he had lived and ruled. As he lay dying in the Wolvesey palace at Winchester he had the funeral service and the mass of requiem solemnised in his presence; in the evening of the same day he had his will read in the presence of his household, and the following morning confirmed it in an audible voice; after which he bade farewell to all, and so died; leaving, after large legacies, the residue of his great wealth to charity². He had been indeed too rich for his own fame; Henry, when the bishop's executors offered him a sum of £2000 from the residue, put them aside, saying, 'My uncle was very dear to me and did much kindness to me whilst he lived; the Lord reward him. But do ye with his goods as ye are bounden; I will not take them³.' Henry spoke the truth; Beaufort had been the mainstay of his house; for fifty years he had held the strings of English policy, and done his best to maintain the welfare and honour of the nation. That he was ambitious, secular, little troubled with scruples, apt to make religious persecution a substitute for religious life and conversation; that he was imperious, impatient of control, ostentatious and greedy of honour,—these are faults which weigh very lightly against a great politician, if they be all that can be said against him. It must be remembered in favour of Beaufort that he guided the helm of state during the period in which the English nation

Death of cardinal
Beaufort,
April 1447.

His wealth.

His political skill.

¹ Hall, Chr. p. 210, on the authority of John Baker, a counsellor of the cardinal, gives a last speech, which contains nothing positively unnatural, but much that is improbable. It is asserted that the bulk of the cardinal's wealth fell to Edmund Beaufort, the marquess of Dorset, his nephew, who was one of his executors. This does not appear from the will; £4000 is left to the bastard John of Somerset, and to the king the jewels pledged by the parliament to the cardinal and in his hands at his death. His last loan to the king seems to be one of 2000 marks in 1444; Rymer, xi. 55: but he had provided £20,000 in 1443.

² Cont. Cröyland, ap. Gale, p. 582.

³ Blakman, de Virtutibus Henrici VI, p. 294.

Character of his administration.

tried first the great experiment of self-government with any approach to success; that he was merciful in his political enmities, enlightened in his foreign policy; that he was devotedly faithful and ready to sacrifice his wealth and labour for the king; that from the moment of his death everything began to go wrong and went worse and worse until all was lost¹. If this result seems to involve a condemnation of his policy, it only serves to enhance the greatness of his powers and fidelity. But his policy, so far as it was a policy of peace and reconciliation, is not condemned by the result. It was not the peace, but the reopening of the strife that led directly to ruin. It is probable that he foresaw some part of the mischief that followed; certainly the words on his tomb, 'tribularer si nescirem misericordias Tuas²,' may be read as expressing a feeling that, humanly speaking, there was little hope for his country under Henry VI.

Suffolk left chief minister.

The death of Gloucester, followed so closely by the death of the cardinal, left Suffolk, the queen's minister, without a rival; Edmund Beaufort was ordered to undertake the lieutenancy in France and Normandy, thereby increasing the jealousy between him and York³; and under their joint misfortune and mismanagement all that remained to England in France, save Calais, was lost.

344. Suffolk was an old and experienced soldier, and, if it were not for the cloud that rests on him in relation to

¹ There are among the ordinances of the privy council some good illustrations of Beaufort's character. On one occasion it was proposed to appropriate for the payment of debt some fund that was already assigned to a similar purpose; the whole council approved, but the cardinal protested against the deception; 'so by this mean no man hereafter should trust none assignment, whereto he wol in no wyse consent.' The treasurer agreed with the cardinal; Ordinances, v. 216.

² Godwin de Praesulibus, p. 232.

³ The duke of York had left Normandy in the autumn of 1445, and the country was governed by commissioners appointed during his absence, until 1447. According to Whethamstede (i. 160) Henry had reappointed him for five years more, but had at Somerset's instigation cancelled the nomination. In July, 1447, York was appointed lieutenant of Ireland (Wars, &c. i. 478), but he still retained the title of lieutenant-governor of France in November, 1447. In December, 1447, it had been determined to appoint Edmund Beaufort, and he was acting as full lieutenant in May, 1448. See Appendix D to Foedera, pp. 509-538; Ordin. vi. 90.

Gloucester's death, might seem entitled to the praise of being a patriotic and sensible politician. The grandson of the minister of Richard II, born in 1396¹, he had been since 1431² a member of the royal council; by his marriage he was connected with the Beauforts; his wife was Alice, widow of the earl of Salisbury and daughter of Thomas Chaucer of Ewelme, whose mother was sister to Katharine Swinford. The policy of peace which Beaufort had nursed, had been carried into effect by him; and it was pursued by him when he became the most powerful man at court. It was a bold policy, for it was sure in the long run to ruin its supporter even in the estimation of the class which was to gain most by the result. Suffolk saw that England could not retain her hold on France, and he tried, by surrendering a part of the conquest to maintain possession of Normandy and Guienne. He knew well how dangerous a part he had undertaken, and openly warned the council of the results which really followed. He had promised, probably by word of mouth, that, on the completion of the marriage scheme, the remaining places which the English held in Maine and Anjou should be surrendered to king René. If by such a sacrifice peace could be obtained it would be cheaply purchased; and it might be, for Charles VII had more than once offered terms that would leave Henry in possession of more than he now retained. But affairs had materially changed; Charles was gaining strength, England was more and more feeling her exhaustion. Anjou and Maine were now the keys of Normandy, no longer the gate by which England could march on France. The project of peace languished, the surrender of Maine was urged more imperiously. The cessation of warfare was maintained only by renewal of short truces, until in March 1448³ the coveted province was actually given up, and then a truce for only two years was granted. The high spirit of Edmund Beaufort chafed against the delays and irritations of diplomacy, and unfortunately his strength, whether of mind of peace.

His policy

Surrender of Maine and Anjou.

Policy and impolicy of the surrender.

¹ Dugd. Bar. p. 186.

² Ordin. iv. 108.

³ The negotiations may be traced in the collections of William of Worcester, published by Stevenson, Wars in France, vol. ii. pp. [634] sq. The final surrender took place March 11; Rymer, xi. 210, 214.

Breach of the truce.

Loss of Normandy in 1449 and 1450.

Unpopularity of the court.

or of armaments, was not equal to his spirit. He was made duke of Somerset in March 1448¹, and in company with bishop Moleyns, commissioned to treat for a perpetual peace. But before the end of the year the French were complaining that the truce was broken: early in 1449 it was really broken by the capture of Fougères by a vassal of Henry²; and in April war began again. Somerset saw all the strongholds of Normandy slip from his grasp with appalling rapidity: the English ascribed it to treachery, but, against strong armies without and a hostile population within, it was impossible to retain them. In May Pont l'Arche was taken; Conches, Gerberoi, Verneuil followed; in August Lisieux surrendered; on the 29th of October Rouen. In January 1450 Harfleur and Dieppe fell; in May the English were defeated in a battle at Formigny³, and Bayeux was taken; Caen surrendered on the 23rd of June, Falaise on the 10th of July; on the 12th of August Cherbourg, the last stronghold in Normandy. Not content with recovering Normandy, Charles was threatening a descent on England, and the Isle of Wight was expecting invasion. In the meanwhile England was suffering the first throes of the great struggle in which her medieval life seems to close.

No parliament was held in 1448; the year was occupied in peace negotiations; nothing is known of the proceedings of the council; and, as the surrender of Maine became known in the country, the popularity of the court and of Suffolk waned.

¹ Somerset's creation as duke was on March 31, 1448 (not 1447: see Nicolas, Hist. Peerage, p. 437); Lords' Reports, v. 258, 259. The commission to him and Moleyns is dated April 6, 1448. See Stevenson, Wars in France, ii. 577; Hardyng, p. 399.

² Mar. 24; Blondel, p. 5. The conduct of Francis L'Arragonois, who broke the truce, with the connivance of Suffolk and Somerset, as he tried to prove, and possibly with that of Henry, is the subject of a long discussion in the letters of the time. Stevenson, Wars in France; Stow, p. 386. The chronicler however (Giles, p. 36) represents the true state of the case when he says that the French were eagerly watching for the first breach of truce in order to overwhelm the English, 'imputantes omnem causam rebellionis.' See also Aeneas Sylvius, Opp. p. 440. According to M. de Coussy (Buchon, xxxv. 133 sq.) Somerset professed himself unable to control the English forces or to restore Fougères.

³ Hardyng, p. 399.

As early as May 1447 he had been allowed at his own request to defend his conduct before the council: he had heard that he was reported to have acted faithlessly in the matter; and it had come also to the king's ears; the duke had desired a hearing, and May 25 was appointed: there were present the chancellor, treasurer, the queen's confessor, the dukes of York and Buckingham, lords Cromwell, Sudeley, and Say, with some others. The vindication was able and eloquent; the king regarded it as complete, and declared that the charges brought against Suffolk by public report were mere scandals, and that he was guiltless of any real fault. He ordered the reports to be silenced, issuing letters to that effect on the 18th of June¹. On the 2nd of June, 1448, Suffolk was made duke, and, although he must have been aware that his policy found no favour with the people, he bore himself as an innocent man to the last. In February 1449 the parliament met at Westminster², and granted a half-tenth and fifteenth, and continued tunnage and poundage for five years. After two prorogations in consequence of the plague, it met in June at Winchester, and there continued the wool subsidy for four years and renewed the tax on aliens; the commons attempted also to tax the clergy by granting a subsidy of a noble from each stipendiary priest in consideration of a general pardon. Henry sent the bill to convocation, telling the clergy that it was for them to bestow the subsidy; if they would grant the noble, he would issue the pardon³. The clergy accepted the compromise and voted the tax. An urgent appeal for help for Normandy was made by Somerset's agents⁴; but matters were already too far gone to be helped; still to the last we see the king and council toiling in vain to send over men and munitions. At vindicates himself, May 1447.

Suffolk

Parliaments
of 1449.

¹ Rot. Parl. v. 447; Rymer, xi. 172-174.

² Rot. Parl. v. 141. It met Feb. 12; John Say was speaker. On the 4th of April it was prorogued to May 7, and on May 30, to June 17, at Winchester. The grants were made April 3 and July 16, the last day of the session; ib. pp. 142, 143. Security was given for £100,000; p. 143. In July the clergy voted a tenth and 6s. 8d. on chaplains; Wilk. Conc. iii. 556. Another tenth was voted in November; ib. p. 557.

³ Rot. Parl. v. 152, 153; 3rd Report Dep. Keeper, p. 27.

⁴ Rot. Parl. v. 147.

home too the prospect was becoming very threatening. A second parliament was called in November. War had broken out with Scotland and the earl of Northumberland had suffered an alarming defeat¹.

Parliament
of 1449-50.

The session was opened on the 6th of November 1449, and continued at Westminster or at Blackfriars, by prorogation, until Christmas, when it was again prorogued to the 22nd of January 1450². Little is known of the proceedings during these weeks, but they were probably stormy; for on the 9th of December bishop Moleyns, who next to the duke of Suffolk was regarded as responsible for the surrender of Maine, resigned the Privy Seal³. Bishop Lumley of Carlisle, Suffolk's ally, who had been treasurer since 1446, had in October 1449 made way for the lord Say and Sele, who immediately became unpopular. The dissatisfaction of the country would no doubt have resulted in a rebellion, if there had been any one to lead it: the cession of Maine and Normandy had produced a violent reaction against Suffolk; the finances of the country had gone to ruin; the king's debt, the debt of the nation, had since Beaufort's death gone on increasing, and now amounted to £372,000; his ordinary income had sunk to £5000; the household expenses had risen to £24,000⁴. Stafford, the chancellor, who was growing old, might be expected to give way under the circumstances; he had been eighteen years in office, and if he had done little good he had done no harm: as soon as the parliamentary attack on Suffolk began, he resigned, and archbishop Kemp, the faithful coadjutor of Beaufort, now a cardinal⁵, was called again into the chancery, too late however to restore the falling fortunes of his master. Suffolk had

General
disaffection.

Financial ruin.

Archbishop Kemp again
chancellor.

¹ Henry was charged with conniving at the breach of the truce with the Scots, when visiting Durham in 1447; Chr. Giles, p. 35.

² Rot. Parl. v. 171. John Popham was speaker. The parliament met at Westminster, and was adjourned at once to Blackfriars, returning Dec. 4 to Westminster. On the 17th it was adjourned to Jan. 22; and on March 30 adjourned to Leicester for April 29. It sat until May 17.

³ Rymer, xi. 255.

⁴ Rot. Parl. v. 183.

⁵ Kemp was made cardinal, with the title of S. Balbina, by Eugenius IV, Dec. 18, 1439 (Panvin. Ep. Vit. Paparum, p. 300), and cardinal bishop of S. Rufina July 21, 1452 (Ang. Sac. i. 123). There is a high panegyric upon him in a letter of Henry VI to the pope on the occasion of his promotion; Beckington, i. 39. It is possible that Kemp had, although attached not acted cordially with Kemp, and the cardinal's return to office was one sign that the duke's influence over the king was already weakened.

345. The history of the trial and fall of Suffolk, although more fully illustrated by documentary evidence, is scarcely less obscure, in its deeper and more secret connexion with the politics of the times, than is that of the arrest and death of Gloucester. Looked at in the light of the parliamentary records, the attack seems to be a spontaneous attempt on the part of the commons to bring to justice one whom they conceived to be a traitorous minister; and, if it were indeed so, it would be the most signal case of proper constitutional action by way of impeachment that had occurred since the days of the Good Parliament. That it was not so is sufficiently proved by the fact, recorded by a strong anti-Lancastrian partisan, that the commons were urged to the impeachment by a member of the council who was a personal enemy of Suffolk, and by the circumstances of the duke's death, which proved that bitterer enemies than the commons were secretly at work against him. Yet there is no difficulty in understanding the causes of the great ruin which befel him. The loss of Maine and Anjou had been followed by the loss of great part of Normandy. Maine and Anjou had been surrendered by the policy of Suffolk. Normandy was being lost by the incapacity or ill luck of Somerset. Both were in the closest confidence of the king and queen. It was not easy for the rough and undisciplined politicians of the country to discriminate between the policy of Suffolk and the incapacity or ill luck of Somerset. The easiest interpretation of the phenomena was treason, and there were not wanting men like lord Cromwell to guide the commons to that conclusion. Cromwell repre-

Obscure history of Suffolk's trial.

Prosecution of Suffolk, occasioned by his ill-success, prompted by lord Cromwell.

to Beaufort, opposed himself to the influence of Suffolk. In 1448, when the see of London was vacant, Henry applied for the appointment of Thomas Kemp, the nephew of the cardinal; Suffolk, however, procured letters in favour of Marmaduke Lumley, the treasurer, and called the earlier application surreptitious. The pope administered a serious rebuke to the king and appointed Kemp; Beckington, Letters, i. 155 sq. It will be observed that Lumley's resignation of the treasurership just preceded the attack on Suffolk.

sented possibly a small minority in the council; possibly he stood alone there; he was an old servant of Henry, whom the cardinal had been able to keep in his place, and who was personally hostile to Gloucester¹. Now that the cardinal and the duke were both gone, he may have envied the rise of a new minister like Suffolk, or he may thus early have been connected with the band of men who later on undertook the overthrow of the dynasty. It seems however certain that private grudges served to embitter the public quarrel. Lord Cromwell on the 28th of November 1449 charged William Taillebois, of South Kyme in Lincolnshire, with an attempt to assassinate him at the door of the Star Chamber. Suffolk defended Taillebois, who notwithstanding was accused by a petition of the commons and sent to the Tower. In the subsequent proceedings against Suffolk the revenge for his protection of Taillebois formed one ingredient, and two of the charges brought against him were based on his attempts to screen the culprit².

Private quarrel of Cromwell and Suffolk.

The mischief began during the Christmas holydays. Bishop Moleyns had gone down to Portsmouth to pay the soldiers who were going to France, and was there on the 9th of January³

Bishop Moleyns murdered,
Jan. 1450.

¹ Cromwell had been, as we have seen, a councillor in 1422, chamberlain to Henry VI, and treasurer from 1433 to 1443; he became chamberlain again in 1450. It was at the marriage of his niece to Thomas Neville that the quarrel of Egremont and the Nevilles broke out; W. Worc. pp. 770, 771. The duke of Exeter sided with Egremont, and the duke of York with the Nevilles. Cromwell in 1454 exhibited articles in parliament against the duke of Exeter, and no doubt was then in the York interest. He was accused of treason in 1455, and on bad terms with Warwick, the two charging on each other the guilt of the battle of S. Alban's. He died however, in 1456. See Paston Letters, i. 293, 344, 345, 376; cf. Ord. vi. 198.

² 'Et postea dominus de Cromwelle reddidit duci Suffolchie vices suas in male anno ipsi duci.' During the parliament Cromwell obtained damages for £1000 against Taillebois from a Middlesex jury; and then 'domino de Cromwell secreta laborante dux Suffolchie per communes in parlamento de alta et grandi prodicione appellatus est;' W. Worcester, pp. [766-769]; Rot. Parl. v. 181, 200.

³ Gregory, p. 189, 'for his covetysses as hyt was reportyde.' 'Through the procurement of Richard duke of York,' Stow, p. 387. 'Et pacem sitiens cum morte recessit atroci,' Chr. Giles, p. 58. 'Inter quos et amicus noster Adam Molines secreti regii signaculi custos et litterarum cultor, amisso capite truncus jacuit;' Æneas Sylvius, Opp. p. 445. Æneas had addressed Moleyns as the king's first favourite or next to the first; Epist. 18, p. 514: in another letter, Epist. 64, he congratulates him on his style. See also Epist. 80. There is a letter of Moleyns to Æneas, Epist. 186.

murdered by the sailors, the soldiers looking on. In his last moments he was heard to say something about the duke of Suffolk, which was understood as a confession of their common delinquency. Suffolk, probably aware that a formal charge would be preferred against him, attempted to anticipate it, and, as he had done before the council in 1447, to put himself at once on his defence. Accordingly, on the first day of the session, January 22, 1450, he made a formal protest before the king and lords. He declared in simple and touching language his services and sacrifices, denied the slander that was publicly current against him in consequence of the bishop's supposed confession, and prayed that, if any one would charge him with treason or disloyalty¹, he would come forth and make a definite accusation, which he trusted to be able to rebut. The commons at once took up the gauntlet. On the 26th they petitioned that, as he had acknowledged the currency of these infamous reports, he might be put in ward to avoid inconvenient consequences; on the 27th the lords, acting on the advice of the chief justice, resolved that he should not be arrested until some definite charge was made; on the 28th the commons made the definite charge, and the duke was sent to the Tower. This first charge was based on the report that he had sold the realm to Charles VII, and had fortified Wallingford castle as headquarters for a confederacy against the independence of England². Ten days later the first formal and definite impeachment was made; the chancellor having been changed in the meantime³; and on the 7th of February cardinal Kemp, attended by several of the lords, was sent by the king to the commons to hear the charge. This elaborate accusation contained eight counts of high treason⁴ and misprision of treason: the duke had conspired with the king of France to depose Henry and place on the throne his own son

Suffolk anticipates the charges laid against him.

The commons demand his arrest.

General charges of treason.

First set of formal charges; also of treason.

¹ Rot. Parl. v. 176.

² Ib. v. 176, 177. 'And also for the dethe of that nobylle prynce the duke of Gloucester;' Gregory, p. 189.

³ The chancellor resigned Jan. 31: the charges were brought forward on the 7th of February; Rot. Parl. v. 177.

⁴ Rot. Parl. v. 177-179; Hall, Chr. pp. 212, 213; Paston Letters (ed. Gairdner), i. 99-105.

John de la Pole as husband of the little heiress of the Beauforts¹; he had advised the release of the duke of Orleans, and had conspired with him to urge Charles VII to recover his kingdom; he had promised the surrender of Anjou and Maine, had betrayed the king's counsel to the French, had disclosed to them the condition of the king's resources, and had by secret dealing with Charles prevented the conclusion of a lasting peace, even boasting of the influence which he possessed in the French court²; he had likewise prevented the sending of reinforcements to the army in France, had estranged the king of Aragon and lost the friendship of Brittany. On the 12th of February these articles were read and referred to the judges, and the discussion was adjourned at the king's discretion. The delay gave time for a fresh indictment to be drawn up.

Referred to the judges.

Second set of charges.

Charges of malversation.

Suffolk asserts his innocence.

On the 7th of March the lords resolved that Suffolk should be called on for his answer; and on the 9th eighteen additional articles were handed in by the commons. These, which may be regarded as a second and final indictment, chiefly comprised charges of maladministration, malversation, misuse of his power and influence with the king, the promotion of unworthy persons, the protection of William Taillebois, and the sacrifice of the English possessions in Normandy by a treacherous compact with the king of France³. Suffolk was then brought from the Tower and received copies of both the bills. On the 13th he stated his own case in parliament: he denied with scorn the charge that he had or could have planned the king's deposition; as for the matters of fact contained in the eight articles, the rest of the council were as much responsible as he; his words had been perverted to a meaning which they would not bear.

¹ The marriage of the two children was celebrated after the arrest; Rot. Parl. v. 177.

² This was possibly a reference to the language which he had used in the Privy Chamber, when attempting to excuse himself from acting as ambassador in 1444; above, p. 142; 'I have had great knowledge among the parties of your adversaries in France,' &c.; Ord. vi. 33. Here, however, the speech is said to have been made in the Star Chamber. 'He declared openly before the lords of your council here being, that he had his place in the council house of the French king as he had here, and was there as well trusted as he was here, and could remove from the said French king the priviest man of his council if he would;' Rot. Parl. v. 179.

³ Rot. Parl. v. 179-182.

The next day the chief justice asked the lords to advise the king; but the question was again deferred, and it was not until the 17th that the compromise was effected which would, as it was supposed, save the duke and satisfy the commons. All the lords 'thenne beyng in Towne' were called into the king's chamber; Suffolk was admitted and knelt before the king. The chancellor reminded him that he had not put himself on his peerage in regard to the first bill of impeachment, and asked whether he had anything further to say in that matter. The duke replied by a forcible repetition of his denial and a protestation of innocence, and then placed himself entirely at the king's disposal, thus not acknowledging any fault but showing himself unwilling to stand a regular trial. The chancellor then declared the king's mind: as to the greater and more heinous charges included in the first bill, the king held Suffolk 'neither declared nor charged¹'; as to the second bill, the royal intention was to proceed not by way of judgment, but on the ground of the duke's submission: accordingly the king, by his own advice, 'and not reporting him to the advice of his lords, nor by way of judgment, for he is not in the place of judgment,' ordered him to absent himself from the king's dominions for five years from the 1st of May following. The lords lodged a protest against this way of dealing with an accused person, insisting that the royal act done without their advice and counsel should not be construed to their prejudice in time to come; this protest, however, which was presented by the viscount of Beaumont, one of Henry's faithful friends, was itself part of the scheme of compromise². It was clear that Suffolk could not be tried formally unless the king and council were prepared to face the storm of popular indignation which, however undeservedly, had been aroused against the policy of peace; nor, if the matter were allowed to Compromise.

He does not put himself on his trial, but submits.

The king sends him abroad.

Protest of the lords.

¹ The expression is obscure and might be equivalent to 'not proven:' but, taken with the context, it seems to signify that the king regarded these charges as prima facie groundless, that he in fact 'ignored' or threw out the indictment.

² Rot. Parl. v. 182, 183; cf. Paston Letters, i. 115. Mr. Gairdner's edition of these letters, and his prefaces, which furnish an absolutely invaluable sketch of the history of this period, leave scarcely anything to be added, and comparatively little to be cleared up.

Possible clue to this proceeding.

run its course in the parliament, could the king have there interfered to rescue him from the uncertain issue¹. He had therefore declined to be tried by his peers, and sacrificed himself to save the king and the council, or that part of it which followed the same policy. He had six weeks given him to prepare for his departure. After settling his affairs and writing a beautiful letter of farewell to his infant son, he sailed on the 30th of April². On the 2nd of May he was beheaded by the crew of a ship which had been waiting to intercept him off the coast of Kent. There is no evidence to determine whether the act was prompted by the vindictiveness of political rivalry or by the desire of vengeance for the death of Gloucester, or was the mere result of the hatred felt by the sailors of the fleet, which had been fatal to bishop Moleyns, or was part of a concerted attempt against the dynasty³. Anyhow it robbed Henry of his most faithful and skilful adviser, and left him for a time dependent on the counsel of the aged archbishop of York.

Suffolk
murdered at sea, May 1450.

Parliament of April 1450,
at Leicester.

The parliament, which met again at Leicester on the 29th of April and granted a graduated tax on incomes arising from lands and offices, completed its work by making a special provision for the royal household; the fee farms of the crown were to be applied to this purpose to the amount of £5522 os. 7d.; and the revenues of the duchy of Lancaster, so far as they were not already appropriated, were devoted to the same object⁴.

Act of Resumption.

A general act of resumption was passed, by which all the grants made since the king's accession were annulled; a great number however of exceptions and reservations were made, and the act became a precedent which many subsequent parliaments thought

¹ The proceedings at the councils preliminary to the Leicester parliament of 1426 may be compared with this: so long as the matter was before council a compromise might be effected; if parliament were appealed to, such justice must be done as parliament willed. See above, p. 106; and Ordinances, iii. 185, 186.

² The letter is printed among the Paston Letters, ed. Gairdner, i. 121, 122; and the account of the duke's death is given in the same collection, vol. i. pp. 124, 126.

³ Æneas Sylvius (Opp. p. 442), representing perhaps foreign opinion, regards the death of Suffolk as connected with the attempt of the duke of York to change the government: his account of Suffolk is hostile; 'qui leges pro suo arbitratu et populis et principibus dicit. Suppressit quos odit et iterum quos amavit erexit.'

⁴ Rot. Parl. v. 172-176.

it wise to follow¹. The session closed on the 17th of May. Immediately after the death of the duke of Suffolk the rebellion of Cade and the Kentish men broke out.

346. This event, which more than anything else in Henry's reign proves his utter incapacity for government, serves also to show how helpless the removal of Suffolk had left him. Of the two men who would most naturally have taken the lead in council, the duke of Somerset was in France, the duke of York was in Ireland. The lord Say and Sele, who was one of the special objects of popular hatred, was the king's treasurer. Cardinal Kemp the chancellor was scarcely fitter than Henry himself to deal with an armed mob. The condition of the country would have tasked much stronger and more unscrupulous men². The nation was exhausted by taxation, impatient of peace, thoroughly imbued with mistrust. Cade and the party which used him—for there were not wanting signs and symptoms of much more crafty guidance—based their complaints and demands on the existence of grievances, political, constitutional and local, which could not be gainsayed³. They united in one comprehensive manifesto the loss of Normandy, the promotion of favourites, the exclusion of the lords of the blood royal from council, the interferences with county elections, Helplessness of Henry after Suffolk's death.

Rebellion under Jack Cade, May and June 1450.

¹ Rot. Parl. v. 183-200. Whethamstede remarks that the necessity for these acts was caused by the king's extravagant liberality; the politicians in parliament remembered 'quo modo pauperiem regis subsequitur spoliatio plebis;' i. 249. Hardyng says that taxes and dymes ceased in consequence of the relief; p. 401. 'The kyng hath sumwhat graanted to have the resumpcion agayne in summe, but nat in alle;' J. Crane to J. Paston, May 6, 1450; Paston Letters, i. 127; Arnold's Chronicle, pp. 179-186.

² Some changes were made at this time; lord Beaumont is said to have been made chamberlain, and lord Rivers (Richard Wydville) constable; Paston Letters (May 13), i. 128. If this were done, changes were made soon after, for in July lord Beauchamp was treasurer (in Say's place) and lord Cromwell chamberlain; W. Worc. p. 769.

³ 'It was for the weal of him our sovereign lord and of all the realm and for to destroy the traitors being about him, with other diverse points that they would see that it were in short time amended;' Gregory, p. 190. 'This attempt was both honourable to God and the king, and also profitable to the commonwealth; promising them that if either by force or policy they might once take the king, the queen, and other their counsellors into their hands and governance, that they would honourably entreat the king and so sharply handle his counsellors that neither fifteens should hereafter be demanded, nor once any impositions or tax should be spoken of;' Hall, p. 220.

and the peculiar oppressions of the commons of Kent. The leader took the name of John Mortimer, and declared himself to be cousin to the duke of York. He found means to collect round him, from Kent, Surrey and Sussex, a force to which he gave a semblance of order and discipline, and which was arranged very much as it would have been if called on to serve under the regular local administration¹. He proclaimed that he came to correct public abuses and remove evil counsellors. His manifesto contained fifteen articles of complaint and five of redress. The complaints included the threatened devastation of Kent in revenge for Suffolk's death, the heavy taxation, the exclusion of the lords of the royal blood from the king's presence and the promotion of upstarts, the abuse of purveyance, the false indictments by the king's servants who coveted the estates of the accused, false claims to land promoted by the king's servants, the treasonable loss of France, the expense of suing for the allowance of the barons of the Cinque Ports, extortion of sheriffs in farming offices, excessive fines and amercements of the green wax, the usurpations of the court of Dover castle, undue interference with elections, illegal appointment of collectors of taxes, and the burdens of attending the county court. The articles demanded were a resumption of demesne, the banishment of the Suffolk party and the return of the duke of York to court, the vindication of the fame of duke Humfrey; Suffolk and his party were made answerable for the death of Gloucester, cardinal Beaufort, and the duke of Warwick, as well as for the loss of France; the last article was a demand for the abolition of the abuses noted in the complaint.

Proclamation by the rebels.

Outbreak of revolt.

The outbreak took place in Whitsun week whilst the king was still at Leicester. On the 1st of June Jack Cade encamped at Blackheath. On the 6th Henry reached London. On the 11th, with 20,000 men, he marched on Blackheath, from whence Cade had retreated²; on the 18th a part of the royal force was ¹ 'They chesse them a captayne, the whyche captayne compellyd alle the gentellys to arysse whythe them;' Gregory, p. 190. Cf. Stow, pp. 388, 399.

² At Blackheath the king ordered all his liege men should 'avoid the field;' whereupon the rebel army dispersed. The next day he went in pursuit to Greenwich, and Stafford was killed at Sevenoaks; the king cut to pieces at Sevenoaks: but the spirit of mutiny broke out in the rest¹; the king was obliged to send the treasurer to the Tower, either to appease the mutineers or to save the minister. Encounter of the royal forces with the rebels.

 Deserted by his army the unhappy king retired to Kenilworth; the mayor and citizens of London offered to stand by him, but Henry had no confidence either in them or in himself. On his departure the rebels returned; Cade entered London on the 3rd of July, and on the 4th the treasurer was seized and beheaded. Henry retires to Kenilworth.
 On the 5th, in a battle on London bridge, the rebels were defeated and the city freed from their presence. The chancellor then offered pardons already sealed to Cade and his followers. The pardons were accepted; the rebels dispersed; Cade to plunder and ravage, the more honest followers to their own homes. His subsequent conduct was not such as to justify his pardon, and no pardon could have a prospective validity to cover his new crimes. A reward² was set on his head, and he was soon after killed in Kent. Cade in London.
 The disturbances did not end here. Anarchy was spreading from the moment that Henry was seen to be incompetent. In Wiltshire bishop Ascough of Salisbury had been murdered in June. The malcontents in Kent elected a new captain after Cade's death; but the government speedily recovered from the panic in which they had fallen, and the severe executions which followed attested the sincerity of the alarm³. He is killed in Kent.

347. It is now that Richard duke of York first comes prominently on the stage. He was about forty years of age, and had been for fifteen years in public employment as regent of France or lieutenant of Ireland⁴. In both capacities he had Other disturbances.
The duke of York.

slept at Greenwich but the lords went home soon after. Then, according to Gregory, another captain, who had taken the name of the former, led his force up to Blackheath and forced their way into London, where, on the 4th of July, they beheaded lord Say. Gregory, pp. 192, 193.

¹ Chron. ed. Giles, p. 40; Fabyan, p. 623.

² Rymer, xi. 275.

³ On Cade's rebellion see Gairdner, preface to Paston Letters, vol. i. pp. lii-lvi sq.; Sussex Archaeological Collections, vols. xviii, xix; Rogers, Loci, e libro Veritatum Gascoigne, pp. 188 sq.

⁴ 'Regent was of all that longed to the kyng.
 And kept full well Normandy in specyall,
 But Fraunce was gone afore in generall;
 And home he came at seven yere ende agayne

With mekell love of the lande certayne.' Hardyng, p. 399.

He had been a good and popular ruler in Ireland, where the house of shown good ability ; and in France especially his administration, which came to an end shortly after Henry's marriage and before the loss of Normandy, had been fairly successful. Whatever credit it really deserved, it shone conspicuously in contrast with the luckless administration of Somerset ; and York's popularity was in some measure the result of the mistrust inspired by his rival. For the two dukes were rivals in more ways than one. They were the nearest kinsmen of the king ; the male line of Edward III had run into two branches ; of the posterity of John of Gaunt, Somerset, after the king himself, was the male representative, the duke of York represented the descendants of Edmund of Langley. It is true that York, as representing the Mortimers, and through them the line of Lionel of Clarence, had a prior claim to the crown, and, in case of the king dying childless, the question of the rights of that line would have to be decided. But precedent was by no means clear ; and the claim, ascribed to Henry IV, to succeed as heir of the house of Lancaster, complicated a question which was obscure enough already. If the inheritance after Henry VI belonged to the male heir of Edward III, it would be difficult to set aside Somerset ; if it belonged to the heir general of John of Gaunt, the lady Margaret was not without real pretensions ; but the Beauforts had no claim through Henry IV and the elder house of Lancaster, and, although their legitimation by pope and parliament was complete, they were excluded from the succession by Henry IV so far as he had power to do it. If on the other hand the right of an heiress to transmit her claim to the crown to her descendants were admitted, York had no doubt the prior right : but no such case had yet occurred in English history¹. Henry IV had tried to entail the crown on his sons to the exclusion of heiresses ; the recognition of the earl of March as heir of Richard II in 1385 had little more significance than the recognition of Arthur of Brittany by Richard I. If then the Mortimer had long cultivated popularity ; ib. The duke's mission to Ireland was regarded by his friends as an exile ; Gregory, pp. 189, 195.

¹ The right of Henry II, as successor of Henry I, is the only similar case, and in it there were so many points of difference as to destroy any real analogy.

Rivalry between him and Somerset.

Uncertainty of succession to the throne.

Questions of succession.

Beauforts were excluded, York might claim as heir of Edmund of Langley¹; if the claims of the line of Clarence were admitted he might inherit as heir of Lionel. But so long as the house of Lancaster was on the throne, it was a delicate matter to urge a claim which, on the only principle on which it could be urged, was better than their own. And the conduct of the Mortimers had been such as to lead to the conclusion that their claim would not be urged. Edmund Mortimer, the ally of Owen Glendower, had indeed broached the rights of his nephews, and Richard of Cambridge had conspired to place his brother-in-law the young earl of March on the throne; the name of Mortimer had twice been mingled with deeds of treason and insurrection; but the heads of the house had been loyal and faithful, even to self-sacrifice. The last earl had been on the closest terms of friendship with Henry V; and Richard of York himself had been educated and promoted by the Lancastrian kings, as if they had no suspicion that he would ever think of supplanting them. But now that Henry had been married for five years without issue, the question of the succession could not fail to be constantly before the minds of both competitors. With Somerset it was more than a question of succession, it was a question of existence; the house of York would not be likely to tolerate the continued influence of the bastard line. Personal emulation added another element to the causes of mutual mistrust; for Somerset had shown a signal contempt for the first military aspirations of duke Richard, and his own early brilliancy had paled before the more substantial glories of his rival, until it was entirely forgotten in the loss of Normandy. Now that Somerset and the policy which he supported had become odious, the nation looked kindly on the one sound adminis-

Double claim of York.

Position of the Mortim-ers.

Position of Somerset.

Popularity of the duke
of York.

¹ On the claim of duke Richard, as heir of Edmund, and the effect of his father's attainder, see Bailey, Succession to the English Crown (1879), pp. 40 sq. On the constitutional character of the duke's action Mr. Plummer (Fortescue, pp. 33 sq.) has some important remarks in modification of the view taken in this chapter; and insisting too strongly, as I think, on the legality of the attacks on Suffolk and Somerset, and the illegality of the modes in which the court defended them. But the whole episode is in danger of being treated commonly on principles more or less antedated.

trator left, and the more so perhaps when they saw in him the rightful heir to the throne.

His constitutional position.

Yet Richard of York had no such claim as Henry IV to the character of a constitutional deliverer. He had none of the great traditions which, however illusory, had hung round the early Lancasters, earl Thomas and earl Henry. His father had suffered death as a traitor, and it was only by an act of impolitic equity that his blood had escaped the taint of legal corruption. His uncle, under the titles of Rutland, Aumâle, and York, had been connected with every conspiracy that was framed against Henry IV, and had been more than once imprisoned. His grandfather Edmund, the most worthless of the brood of Edward III, had been little else than a self-indulgent courtier. Any prince moreover who should come to the throne as the mere heir of Richard II would be likely to claim it free from all the constitutional restrictions on prerogative, which had been accepted and acted on by the three Henries. Nor, finally, was the kingdom at all in the condition to need a deliverer like Henry IV. It was exhausted, impoverished, and in disorder, but it was not unconstitutionally ruled. It was weakness, not tyranny, that lay at the root of the national distress. The administration of justice was sound, but the power of enforcing justice was to some extent wanting; the constant occurrence of local riots, the predatory bands which kept whole districts in alarm, the difficulty of collecting taxes, the general excitement of popular feeling arising on the national disgrace abroad, all called for a strong administration. Henry himself connived at no injustice; Somerset's incapacity was shown only by his misadventures abroad; and there is no reason to suppose that he wished to play the despot at home. But York's position was too full of danger to the crown to make it possible to lodge the administration in his hands; whilst in his own estimation it was such as entitled him to nothing lower than the first place in court and council. It is not for the historian to attempt too minutely to adjust the balance between the two parties on moral or political grounds; neither York nor Somerset was a monster of vice nor a paragon of virtue; neither was endowed with much political skill or showed paramount ability in administration: the constitutional position indeed of Somerset was more defensible than that of York; but Somerset was thoroughly unpopular, and York, owing to that unpopularity, gained the character of a popular champion, the representative of legitimate succession and administrative reform.

Weakness of the government.

Comparison of Somerset and York.

The death of Suffolk had left Henry without a minister, and Cade's rebellion had proved not only that he could not act for himself, but that there were troubles ahead which might task a strong man. York was tired of Ireland, where his friends thought him an exile, Somerset had let France slip out of his hands. It was a race who should come home first and take the kingdom in hand. York seems to have reached England before his rival, but Somerset had a strong ally in the queen, and he was not far behind. The capture of Cherbourg on the 12th of August set him free from all duty in Normandy; on the 11th of September he was made High Constable of England¹. Before this the duke of York had visited the king. His return was not unexpected, and measures had been taken, justified no doubt by the belief that he was implicated in Cade's rebellion, to intercept him and to prevent him from collecting his friends². Notwithstanding these precautions he forced his way to London, and made his formal complaint to the king. He complained of the attacks made on himself and his servants, and of a proposal to indict him for treason. The king in reply told him how much appearances had been against him, how he was implicated in the murder of Moleyns and commonly reputed to be hostile to Henry himself; concluding however with the admission that he regarded him as his faithful subject, words which amounted to an apology for the mistrust that had been shown him³. In a further remonstrance, presented somewhat later, he embodied some of the complaints of the rebels. He told the king that there was common complaint that justice was not duly ministered to offenders, especially those indicted for treason; he promised Somerset comes from France and York from Ireland.

Visit of York to the king.

His complaint.

He obtains from Henry a promise to appoint a new council; and a parliament is called.

¹ Rymer, xi. 276.

² Chr. Giles, p. 42.

³ The bill of complaints presented to Henry is given in Stow, pp. 353, 354. These documents are placed by Stow under the year 1452, but they belong, as Mr. Gairdner says (Past. Lett. i. p. lx), to 1450.

Proposals of the duke of York.

to aid the king in remedying this, and urged that the king's officers should be instructed to arrest and commit to the Tower all such persons as were so noised or indicted, of what estate, degree, or condition soever they were, there to abide without bail until they could be tried in court of law. Henry declined to take the advice of the duke without consulting the council. The main proposition the king met with a promise to appoint a sad and substantial council, of which the duke was to be a member¹. The duke then urged the calling of a new parliament; and on the 5th of September a summons was issued convening it on November 6. So much having been conceded, he went to Fotheringay, whence he conducted negotiations with his friends, and attempted to influence the elections in the counties². His chief allies were the Nevilles, the earl of Salisbury his brother-in-law, and the earl of Warwick his nephew; the duke of Norfolk³, John Mowbray, also was inclined to support him in his attempt to make himself influential in the council. How far his designs really went it is impossible to say: no doubt the court believed that he was an accomplice of Cade, who had asserted his claim to be one of the chief councillors; he too was the only person who had had anything to gain by the death of Gloucester and Suffolk; but there was little evidence as to the latter crime, and he was not really suspected of conniving at the former. He was himself throughout his career very cautious in stating any claims of his own. At this moment he appeared only as the guardian of order and demanded reform of abuses in the government.

The alarm felt by Henry and the court as to the duke's ulterior designs.

Parliament of November 1450.

The parliament met on the 6th of November⁴, and cardinal Kemp in his opening speech stated the urgent necessity of national defence, and of putting down the local tumults. The French were threatening invasion; Calais was in imminent danger.

¹ The remonstrance is in Stow, p. 385, and among the Paston Letters, i. 153; the answer is given (after Holinshed) by Mr. Gairdner; ib. introd. p. lxii.

² W. Worc. p. 769. The dukes of York and Norfolk chose the persons who were to be elected in Norfolk; Paston Letters, i. 160, 161, 162.

³ John Mowbray succeeded his father in 1432 and was confirmed in the dukedom in 1444. His mother, Katharine Neville, was sister to the earl of Salisbury, and his wife, Eleanor Bouchier, was sister to archbishop Bouchier and half-sister to the duke of Buckingham. He died in 1461.

⁴ Rot. Parl. v. 210.

The election of speaker at once showed that York's attempt to influence the elections had been successful¹; the choice of the commons fell on Sir William Oldhall, his chamberlain and counsellor, one of the allies who had been only prevented by arrest from meeting him when he landed. The proceedings of the session were begun by an altercation between the two dukes, the one supported by the commons, the other by the court and council². During the session parliament was supreme; Somerset was arrested on the 1st of December, his equipage being plundered by the mob³. On the 18th the parliament was prorogued⁴; and immediately after Christmas Somerset was made captain of Calais⁵. When the parliament met again, January 20, 1451, the struggle was renewed. Henry plucked up spirit to reject a petition that Suffolk might be declared a traitor⁶; but he was obliged to receive another⁷ in which the commons demanded that he should remove from court the duke of Somerset, the duchess of Suffolk, the lord Dudley, the bishop of Lichfield, and the abbot of Gloucester⁸, with several knights and gentlemen. The king refused to dismiss the lords, but consented to the removal of the rest for a year. This was itself no small triumph; Dudley and the abbot of Gloucester were excluded from the council; and Somerset's position became still more critical. Thomas Yonge, the

Disputes between York and Somerset.

Petition for the removal of the king's friends.

Henry's partial concession.

¹ Rot. Parl. v. 210; Paston Letters, i. 163.

² W. Worc. p. 769.

³ Dec. 2; Gregory, p. 195; Chr. Giles, p. 42. Dec. 1; Fabyan, p. 626.

⁴ Rot. Parl. v. 213.

⁵ W. Worc. p. 770. Henry was at Greenwich at Christmas. Gregory says that in February 1451 the king and the dukes of Somerset and Exeter were at Canterbury, 'where were dampnyde many men of the captayne ys men for hyr rysyng, and for hyr talking agayne the kyng, havyng more favyr unto the duke of Yorkethenne unto the kyng'; Gregory, p. 196. Henry punished 'the stubborn heads' but spared the poor people; Hall, p. 222. The judges however commissioned for Kent were the duke of York, lord Bouchier, Sir John Fastolf, and others; Paston Letters, i. 186. A general pardon was issued May 18; Rymer, xi. 286.

⁶ Rot. Parl. v. 226.

⁷ Ib. v. 216.

⁸ Reginald Bowlers, abbot of Gloucester, was an old servant of Henry, of great piety and learning. He became abbot in 1437, had refused the bishopric of Llandaff in 1440, and had been a member of the council since 1443; Mon. Angl. i. 536; Beckington's Letters, i. 31; Ordinances, v. 269 sq. The bishop of Lichfield, William Booth, was the subject of a satirical poem printed in Exc. Hist. p. 357; Wright, Pol. Songs, ii. 225.

Proposal to declare the duke of York heir to the crown.

Supplies.

Somerset remains in power.

Loss of Guienne and Gascony in 1451.

Movements of the duke of York.

member for Bristol, ventured to propose that the duke of York should be declared heir to the crown ; and no small part of the commons supported the proposal, which was resisted by the king and the lords¹. Little was done however in the parliament, which sat until April 19 and met again on May 5². The act of resumption passed in the last session was again enacted³, Jack Cade and his followers were attainted⁴: an order was given for the enforced payment of the subsidy granted at Leicester ; and the exigencies of the government were met by assigning to the king a preferential payment of £20,000 on the subsidies, to be expended on the defence of the realm, after the maintenance of Calais was secured⁵. The result of the deliberations was to shake but not to overthrow Somerset. He retained his influence with both king and queen ; the unpopular abbot of Gloucester had already in December been made bishop of Hereford ; Thomas Yonge was sent to the Tower⁶.

There was still one chance open for the recovery of England's proud position on the continent. Normandy was lost, but Guienne was not yet conquered ; and some show of energy and promptness abroad might have saved the dynasty at home. But the opportunity was lost. The French overran Gascony in the summer of 1451 ; Bourdeaux fell in June ; Bayonne was taken on August 25 ; before the winter all the country was in their hands, and Calais was again threatened. The duke of York believed himself fully warranted in making this a ground of his renewed attack on the minister. He had failed to overcome him by the constitutional procedure of parliament. He determined now to follow up the formal remonstrance by such a display of force as would bring the king to his senses⁷.

¹ W. Worc. p. 770 ; Chr. Lond. p. 137 : 'A parliament wherein all the commons were agreed, and rightfully elected him (York) as heir apparent of England, nought to proceed in any other matters till that were granted by the lords, whereto the king and lords would not consent nor grant but anon brake up the parliament.'

² Rot. Parl. v. 213, 214.

⁴ Ib. v. 224.

⁶ W. Worc. p. 770 ; Rot. Parl. v. 337.

⁷ 'That year' (1451), says Gregory, 'was competent well and peaceable as for any rising among ourself, for every man was in charity, but somewhat the hearts of the people hung and sorrowed for that the duke of

³ Ib. v. 217.

⁵ Ib. v. 211, 214.

348. On the 9th of January, 1452, the duke wrote a formal declaration of his loyalty, and offered to swear it on the Blessed Sacrament before any two or three lords whom Henry should appoint¹. On the 3rd of February he published a letter to the men of Shrewsbury in which he attacked the duke of Somerset, accusing him of the loss of Normandy and Guienne, and complaining of his constant attempts to prejudice the king against him, labouring for his undoing, endeavouring to corrupt his blood and to disinherit him and his heirs². For these reasons, which involved the speedy ruin of the nation, he declared himself to be about to proceed against Somerset, and begged the men of Shrewsbury to take measures for the maintenance of order in the contingent which they were to contribute to the expedition. He was joined by the earl of Devonshire and lord Cobham³, and marched on London. Henry was not unprepared; he no doubt saw in the duke's proceedings full confirmation of the designs which had been imputed to him in 1450; he could no longer believe that the untoward events of that year were unconnected with the policy of York, and Somerset was by his side to keep all suspicions alive. On the 16th of February Henry marched against his cousin⁴; and on the 17th summoned lord Cobham to his presence⁵. The duke avoided an engagement, but was prevented by the royal orders from entering the city, and, expecting aid from Kent, moved on to Dartford with a force of not less than seventeen thousand men⁶. The king thereupon marched to Blackheath and encamped there, probably with a still larger force. A battle was prevented by the negotiation of the bishops and other lords, among whom the chief were bishops Waynflete and Bourchier,

He declares his loyalty, and attacks Somerset,

Feb. 1452.

He marches to London.

Henry goes to meet him.

Meeting at Blackheath,
Feb. 1452.

Gloucester was dead, and some said that the duke of York had great wrong, but what wrong there was no man that durst say; but some gounyrd and scme lowryd and had disclain of other; 'Chron. p. 198.

¹ Stow, p. 393.

² Cf. Hall, p. 225. The letter is printed in Ellis, Original Letters, 1st Series, i. 11-13; Paston Letters, i. pp. lxxi, lxxii.

³ English Chron. ed. Davies, p. 69.

⁴ Fabyan, p. 626.

⁵ Ordinances, vi. 116.

⁶ Whethamstede estimates the duke's force at ten thousand; and the king's at three times that number; i. 160, 161. See however Paston Letters, i. p. cxlviii.

Charges made by the duke of York against the duke of Somerset.

the earls of Salisbury and Warwick, and the lords Beauchamp and Sudeley¹. The duke found that his cause was not so popular in Kent as he had expected; the earls of Salisbury and Warwick had not yet declared themselves on his side, and he was willing to treat. He was anxious only as yet to prove his own loyalty and to overthrow Somerset. The king offered him pardon for himself, a general amnesty, and full opportunity of obtaining justice in the ordinary process of law². It was now, possibly, that he laid before the king his formal charges against Somerset, in a bill of accusation similar to that which had proved fatal to Suffolk. According to this statement, Somerset was directly responsible for the loss of Normandy, where he had removed the good officers whom his predecessor had left, and let out their places to the highest bidder; he had alienated the king's friends by imprisonment and fines, he had connived at the breaches of the truce in 1449; he had weakened the garrisons, had neglected to succour besieged places, had surrendered Rouen in a way that was treacherous and treasonable, had allowed Calais to fall into a state in which it was barely defensible, and had embezzled the money paid by way of indemnity for private losses on the surrender of Maine and Anjou³. Here was a sufficiently formidable bill of indictment; yet there were no charges of tyranny or maladministration at home, nothing that on the most liberal interpretation could justify the attempt to coerce the king. And so the lords seem to have thought. It was agreed that Somerset should remain in custody until he had answered the accusation, and on this understanding the duke of York dismissed his forces⁴. On the

¹ Fabyan, p. 627; Paston Letters, i. p. lxxiv.

² Whethamstede, i. 162.

³ The full text of the accusation is printed for the first time by Mr. Gairdner, Paston Letters, i. pp. lxxvii sq.; it was known to Stow, Chr. p. 393.

⁴ The duke of York yielded 'on condition that his petitions before asked for the weal of the king and of all his realm might be granted and had, and his enemies to be committed to the Tower to abide the law, and so the lords were agreed and granted that it should be and were sworn to each other; and forthwith the duke sent his men home again, and he meekly came and submitted himself at the Blackheath to the king, his adversaries there standing present contrary to the appointment and their

1st of March he presented himself in the king's tent, and, to his great disgust, found Somerset in his accustomed place. He himself was sent under guard to London where, on the 10th of March¹, a reconciliation with the king was effected. The duke of York, at S. Paul's, swore fealty to Henry and promised for the future to sue for remedy in legal form, whenever he should be aggrieved. But no mention was made of Somerset, and the duke returned to his home disappointed of his more immediate aim. England was not yet ready for the civil war, and did not regard an armed force as the constitutional expedient for getting rid of a minister in whom the king trusted. The king himself, too ready to believe in the sincerity of the pacification, issued in the following month a general pardon², and spent the autumn in a royal progress the object of which was to reconcile all parties. But the policy and influence of Somerset were still supreme. Archbishop Kemp was transferred in July from York to Canterbury; bishop Booth of Lichfield, one of those against whom the commons had petitioned in 1451, was promoted to York. The treasury however remained under the management of John Tiptoft earl of Worcester, a friend of the duke of York, who had been appointed on the 15th of April. One good effect followed the rising; an expedition was sent in September³ to Guienne under the earl of Shrewsbury, who recovered Bourdeaux and gave hopes of a glorious vindication of English renown⁴.

Misunderstanding and reconciliation, March 10, 1452.

The duke of York is unsupported.

Change of ministers.

In January 1453 the king called a parliament to meet at Reading on the 6th of March⁵. The place was probably selected as one free from the York influence, which was strong in London, and the election of the speaker showed that oaths; Chr. Lond. p. 138; cf. Stow, p. 385. Whethamstede says nothing about the arrest of Somerset, i. 163. Hall states the matter as uncertain; the king 'caused the duke of Somerset to be committed to ward as some say, or to keep himself privy in his own house, as others write;' p. 226. Cf. Fabyan, p. 627.

Parliament at Reading, March 1453.

¹ Cf. Chron. Giles, p. 43. Stow gives the form of the duke's submission, p. 395. Whethamstede (i. 163) says that the duke obtained papal absolution from this oath before he imprisoned Somerset in 1453.

² Whethamstede, i. 85, 86 sq.

³ Rymer, xi. 313.

⁴ Mem. de J. du Clercq (Buchon, xxxviii), liv. 2, cc. 2 sq., liv. 3, cc. 1-5.

⁵ Rot. Parl. v. 227.

the duke was not likely to have his own way in the assembly. The choice fell on Thomas Thorpe, a knight of the shire for Essex, and a baron of the Exchequer, who was strongly opposed to him¹. The session was short; little was done beyond granting supplies, the liberality of which seems to show that the pacification was regarded as satisfactory. A grant of a tenth and fifteenth was voted; the other taxes, tunnage and poundage, the subsidy on wool and the alien tax, were continued for the king's life. A force of twenty thousand archers was moreover granted, to be maintained by the counties, cities and towns according to their substance. These grants were made on the 28th of March², and the parliament was then prorogued to April 25, when it was to meet at Westminster. The second session was occupied with financial business, and closed on the 2nd of July after an additional half-tenth and fifteenth had been granted, and the number of archers reduced to thirteen thousand. On the 22nd of June Sir William Oldhall, the speaker of the last parliament, was attainted for his conduct at Dartford in 1452 and for his alleged complicity with Cade³. The parliament was not yet dissolved, but ordered to meet again at Reading on the 12th of November⁴.

349. In the interval the storms gathered more heavily and more fatally than ever. On the 23rd of July the earl of Shrewsbury was killed at Castillon⁵ and the whole of the recent conquests were shortly recovered by the French. During the autumn⁶ the king was attacked by illness, which very

¹ Rot. Parl. v. 228. Thorpe was a faithful Lancastrian, who had been Remembrancer of the Exchequer and was removed from office by Tiptoft, when he became treasurer in 1452. He was made a baron of the exchequer in 1453; was at the battle of S. Alban's in 1455, and was saved from condemnation in parliament that year by the king refusing the petition against him. He was taken prisoner at the battle of Northampton in 1460, and beheaded by the Yorkists in 1461. Foss, Biog. Jurid. p. 658.

² Rot. Parl. v. 228-232. The convocation of Canterbury granted two tenths in Feb. 1453, Wilk. Conc. iii. 562; about the same time the York clergy granted half a tenth, ib. p. 563; and a whole tenth at Michaelmas, p. 564.

³ Rot. Parl. v. 265, 266.

⁴ Ib. v. 236.

⁵ Du Clercq, iii. c. 2 (Buchon, xxxviii. 130).

⁶ July 6, at Clarendon; Chr. Giles, p. 44; W. Worc. p. 771. So great

Thorpe speaker.

Grants of money and men.

Second session.

Prorogation to Reading.

Shrewsbury killed.

Illness of the king;

soon produced a total derangement of his mental powers and made him for the time an idiot. On the 13th of October queen Margaret bore her unfortunate son Edward. The coincidence of the three events was strangely important. The final loss of Guienne destroyed all the hold which the government still had on the respect of the country; the king's illness placed the queen and the duke of York in direct rivalry for the regency; the birth of the heir of Lancaster cut off the last hope which the duke had of a peaceful succession to the crown on Henry's death.

The duke was not idle during the vacation; he procured the arrest and imprisonment of Thorpe the speaker on an action of trespass, and in contempt of the privilege of parliament¹; a quarrel between the Percies and the Nevilles² caused the latter to draw closer to their kinsman, and he secured the assistance of the duke of Norfolk for a renewed attack on Somerset. The parliament met at Reading in November, only to be prorogued to the following February³. The king's illness increased, and it was the urgent business of the council to provide for the interrupted action of the executive. On the 21st of November a great council was held for the purpose of securing peace in the land, and to this the duke of York, who seems at first not to have been properly summoned, was called up by special letters⁴. In this invitation Somerset did not join, and the invitation itself probably implies that the council was now inclined to accept the services of his rival. The duke attended and made a formal protest against the proceedings of the government in depriving him and birth of an heir.

The speaker arrested.

Schemes of Duke Richard.

Council in November 1453.

Complaints of the duke
of York.

was Somerset's unpopularity that he was regarded as accountable for Henry's sickness, for having taken him to Clarendon; Gregory, p. 198.

¹ The duke of York had collected certain harness and other habiliments of war in the bishop of Durham's house in London. These Thorpe had seized and carried off, possibly under the orders of the court. At the beginning of Michaelmas term the duke brought an action against him in the court of exchequer, and got damages to the amount of £1000, and costs £10; for the non-payment of which he was thrown into the Fleet prison; Rot. Parl. v. 239.

² See above, p. 150, note 1, and p. 174.

³ Rot. Parl. v. 238.

⁴ Ordinances, vi. 163, 164.

Possible
design of the queen.

New attack on Somerset.

Parliament
meets in February 1454.

York declared loyal.

of the advice of his personal counsellors¹. It is not improbable that the queen on this occasion proposed to assume the regency during her husband's illness²; and the duke of Norfolk perhaps took the same opportunity of presenting his charges against Somerset; the arrest and imprisonment of the luckless minister followed early in December³. He was not friendless, and both parties prepared to appear with armed force at the ensuing parliament⁴. The influence however of the duke of York had already made itself felt in the council. The place of meeting was altered; the earl of Worcester on the 11th of February, 1454, prorogued the assembly to the 14th at Westminster⁵; and on that day the duke of York opened the proceedings under a commission from the king and council. He was already in possession of supreme power, although not yet nominally regent; the influence of Somerset in the council was paralysed by his arrest; an indictment against the earl of Devonshire for high treason, in consequence of his action in 1452, failed, and the duke of York, conceiving himself to be attacked, claimed and received from the lords an assurance of their belief in his loyalty⁶. The house of commons in vain demanded the release of their speaker. He had been arrested at the suit of the duke; the privilege of the commons was

¹ See the curious document printed by Mr. Gairdner, Paston Letters, i. cxlviii, from the Rot. Pat. 32 Hen. VI, m. 20; Lambard, Archeion, p. 151.

² One of the Paston Letters (i. 265) mentions a bill of five articles in which the queen claimed the regency, the patronage in church and state, and the expediture of the sum allowed to the king for livelihood.

³ The petition of Norfolk against Somerset is in the Paston Letters, i. 259. He had delivered some charges before; to these Somerset had replied, and Norfolk had answered the reply. He contends that the duke's acts have justified the charges; he has used bribery to prevent the charges being brought home, 'some saying that the cases by him committed be but cases of trespass, and other taking a colour to make universal peace;' but he is guilty of the loss of Guienne and Normandy; he demands a full inquiry.

⁴ Paston Letters, i. 264, 265.

⁵ Rot. Parl. v. 238, 239. The duke of Norfolk had attempted to influence the elections in Suffolk, and the sheriff made a return that he dared not proceed on account of the menaces of the duke's servants; on which account the duke afterwards had him summoned before the council; Ord. vi. 183.

⁶ Rot. Parl. v. 249.

asserted on his behalf; the question of privilege was referred to the judges, who denied that they had power to decide such high matters, and the lords determined that he should remain in prison¹. The commons had to make the best of it, and elected a new speaker, Sir Thomas Charlton, member for Middlesex². Through him on the 19th of March they addressed the lords with a request that measures might be taken for the defence of Calais, for which an outlay of £40,000 was required, and that the promise which the chancellor had made at Reading, to appoint a sad and wise council, might be fulfilled. Cardinal Kemp replied to the address, promising a good and comfortable answer³. That answer he did not live to furnish. He died three days after, on the 22nd of March. He was about seventy-four, a man of great experience, moderation and fidelity; the friend and coadjutor of Beaufort, and yet thoroughly respected by the opposite party. He knew however that he himself must be the next victim; the duke of Norfolk, the pliant agent of the duke of York, had already begun to threaten him, and his death may have been hastened by the alarm and excitement⁴. He left the two most important posts in church and state vacant, and removed the most powerful influence that might have curbed the ambition of the duke of York.

Question of privilege.

A new speaker.

Address of the commons.

Death of Cardinal
Kemp.

A message sent by the lords, to inquire the royal pleasure as to the appointment of a new archbishop and a new chancellor, revealed unmistakeably the present condition of the king. It was impossible to attract his attention or to get a word from him. On the 23rd a committee of the lords visited him at Windsor; on the 25th they reported the failure of their mission⁵. Nothing now could be done without the appointment of a regent. On the 27th the lords chose the duke of York to be protector and defender of the realm⁶. The duke accepted the election with a protest that he undertook

Continued illness of the king,
March 1454.

The duke of York chosen protector.

¹ Rot. Parl. v. 239, 240.

² Ib. v. 240.

³ Ib. v. 240.

⁴ 'Eo quod noluit in aliquo a veritate declinare, sic ab aliquibus dominis et specialiter a duce Norfolkiae minatur, quod citius elegit mori quam vitam ducere mortis;' Chron. Giles, p. 45.

⁵ Rot. Parl. v. 240-242.

⁶ Ib. v. 242.

Conditions of acceptance.

the task only in obedience to the king and the peerage of the land, in whom, by reason of the king's infirmity, 'resteth the exercise of his authority.' He requested further the advice and assistance of the lords, which was graciously promised, and a definition of his functions and commission. These were described as constituting him chief of the king's council, and as comprised under the title of protector and defender, 'which importeth a personal duty of intendance to the actual defence of this land, as well against the enemies outward, if case require, as against rebels inward, if any hap to be, that God forbid, during the king's pleasure and so that it be not pre-judice to my lord prince¹.' Precedents were to be searched to determine the amount of the protector's salary. The resolution of the lords was embodied in an act, which received the assent of the commons and passed on the 3rd of April; by this the duke was constituted protector until the prince came of age, or as long as the king pleased². On the previous day he had placed the great seal in the hands of his brother-in-law, the earl of Salisbury³; on the 9th the monks of Canterbury had a licence to elect the primate, and their choice, directed by the protector and confirmed by the pope, fell on Thomas Bouchier, bishop of Ely, a grandson of duke Thomas of Gloucester and half-brother of the duke of Buckingham⁴. The same day the council recommended George Neville, the chancellor's son, a young man of twenty-three, for the next vacant bishopric⁵. Although these appointments indicate a determination in the victorious faction to strengthen, wherever it was possible, their hold on power, their position was not by any means assured, and their administration, whether it were guided by policy or by an honest wish to be fair, was one of compromise. The appointment of the archbishop, although he afterwards showed himself a faithful Yorkist, was one to

Salisbury
chancellor;

Bouchier
archbishop.

Policy of this appointment.

¹ Rot. Parl. v. 242; above, p. 110.

² Rot. Parl. v. 242, 243; Rymer, xi. 346.

³ Rymer, xi. 344, 345; Rot. Parl. v. 449.

⁴ On the 30th of March the council determined to nominate Bouchier for the primacy; Ordinances, vi. 168, 170. He was elected April 23; Ang. Sac. i. 123.

⁵ Ordinances, vi. 168; Rot. Parl. v. 450.

which no objection could be raised on the ground of incompetency or partisanship, and was perhaps intended to secure the support of the Staffords and Bouchiers¹. Tiptoft was not removed from the treasury. The mixed composition of the parliament prevented any extreme measures. No attempt was made in parliament to bring Somerset to trial; a fact which perhaps his near relationship to the Nevilles² might account for. He was, as a matter of course, deprived of the government of Calais, which the duke of York took upon himself³, and he remained in prison, as did the Lord Cobham, who was in disgrace as a partisan of York's⁴. The provision which had been made by the king for his two half-brothers was confirmed, and the rights of the queen and the little heir-apparent were scrupulously guarded wherever they were supposed to be affected. Owing to the confused way in which the acts of this long parliament have been enrolled, it is difficult to assign to the particular session the several financial acts to which no date is appended; but it may be presumed that they formed part of the closing business of the parliament. The act of 1450, which assigned £20,000 to the king, was repealed⁵, and a new provision was made for the expenses of the household; the subsidies appropriated to Calais were vested in the earls of Salisbury, Shrewsbury, Wiltshire, and Worcester, and the Lord Stourton⁶. On the 28th of February a graduated

No extreme measures attempted.

Other transactions in parliament.

¹ Anne of Gloucester, daughter of duke Thomas of Woodstock, married first Edmund earl of Stafford who died in 1403, and secondly William Bouchier earl of Eu who died in 1420. By her first husband she had Humfrey earl of Buckingham, Hereford, Stafford, Northampton, and Perche, lord of Brecon and Holderness, who was in 1444 created duke of Buckingham; by her second husband she had Henry Bouchier, created viscount in 1446, Thomas archbishop of Canterbury 1454-1486, and other sons. The duke of Buckingham had married Anne Neville, sister of the earl of Salisbury. He attempted, as we shall see, to mediate in the first years of the struggle. His eldest son, the earl of Stafford, fell at the first battle of S. Alban's, and he himself at Northampton in 1460.

² The earl of Salisbury was, it will be remembered, son of Ralph Neville earl of Westmoreland, by Johanna Beaufort, Somerset's aunt.

³ Rot. Parl. v. 254.

⁴ Ib. v. 248.

⁵ Ib. v. 247. The amount assigned to the household was £5183 6s. 8d.

⁶ Ib. v. 243. These lords were relieved from their office in the next Parliament; ib. p. 283. The duke of York was made captain of Calais fine was imposed on the lords who absented themselves from parliament¹; on the 15th of March the infant prince was created prince of Wales²; on the 9th of March the Lord Cromwell demanded security of the peace against Henry Holland, the duke of Exeter³. An act of resumption, which was now becoming a part of the regular business of parliament, was likewise passed⁴. Several statutes were enrolled.

Administration of the duke of York.

The parliament probably broke up a week before Easter, April 21⁵; and the government devolved upon the protector and the council, which he no doubt was able to form at his own discretion. The first task which he undertook was the pacification of the north, where the quarrel between the Nevilles and the Percies was spreading⁶; the duke of Exeter had joined the latter party and had attempted, by the use of the king's name, to stir up Yorkshire and Lancashire against the duke of York. The protector's presence in the north served to disperse the forces of the two factions, but not to reconcile them; the duke of Exeter came to London and took sanctuary at Westminster, whence he was taken by force and confined at Pomfret. The Percies remained at large. A second question was how to dispose of the duke of Somerset. In a meeting of the great council on the 18th of July, his friends attempted to obtain his release on bail, but on the appeal of the protector it was determined to ask the advice of the judges and of the absent lords; and the 28th of October was fixed as the day on which the charges of the duke of Norfolk were to

Somerset kept in prison.

July 17; Rymer, xi. 351. Councils were held for the purpose of raising money for Calais in May and June; Ordinances, vi. 174-180, &c.

¹ Rot. Parl. v. 248; Ordinances, vi. 181-183.

² Rot. Parl. v. 249.

³ Ib. v. 264.

⁴ Ib. v. 267 sq.

⁵ The last dated transaction is one of April 17; ib. p. 247.

⁶ The duke of Exeter and lord Egremont rose against the Nevilles in 1453. The duke was summoned before the council on June 25, 1454, Ordinances, vi. 189; arrested and imprisoned at Pomfret July 24, ib. vi. 217; and at Wallingford, ib. vi. 234; but released on the king's recovery. The earl of Devon also, who had a private war with lord Bonnevile, was arrested during York's regency; Chr. Giles, p. 46. Bonnevile had had a quarrel with the earl of Huntingdon, father of the duke of Exeter, in 1440; Beckington, i. 193; Paston Letters, i. 264, 290, 296, 350; Ordinances, vi. 130, 140, 217, 234.

be brought forward¹. What was then done is not known; Somerset, however, was not released.

350. The king recovered his senses a few weeks later. He was sane at Christmas, and recognised his little son for the first time on the 30th of December; on the 7th of January he admitted bishop Waynflete to an interview. The dismissal of the protector and his ministers was imminent². On the 5th of February Somerset was released; the duke of Buckingham, the earl of Wiltshire, and the lords Roos and Fitzwarin undertaking that he should present himself for trial on the 3rd of the following November³. On the 4th of March he appealed to the king in council and was declared loyal; he and the duke of York were bound over to accept an arbitration⁴; on the 6th Somerset was restored to the captaincy of Calais⁵. On the 7th the great seal was taken from the earl of Salisbury and given to archbishop Bourchier⁶, no doubt to secure Buckingham's support; on the 15th James Butler earl of Wiltshire was made treasurer⁷. A great council was then called, to meet at Leicester, to provide for the safety of the king⁸, and the partisans of York were no longer summoned to attend the ordinary councils. The duke could scarcely allege that such measures were unconstitutional or unprecedented, for they were in close analogy with his own policy of the previous year. He saw that they must be met by a resistance backed with armed force. With the Nevilles he collected his forces in the north⁹, and marched towards London. On the 20th of May, in conjunction with Salisbury and Warwick, he addressed the archbishop in a letter dated at Royston, and followed it up with an appeal to the king on the 21st from Ware¹⁰; in both the lords declared their loyalty, and affirmed that their forces were intended only to secure their own safety against their enemies who surrounded the king, and to enable recovers early in 1455.

The king

Somerset released.

Bourchier chancellor

York is not satisfied and marches on London.

¹ Ordinances, vi. 207, 218.

² Paston Letters, i. 315.

³ Rymer, xi. 361; see J. du Clercq, iii. c. 10.

⁴ Rymer, xi. 361, 362.

⁵ Ib. xi. 363.

⁶ Ordinances, vi. 365.

⁷ Dugdale, Origines Juridicales.

⁸ Rot. Parl. v. 280.

⁹ Whethamstede, i. 164.

¹⁰ Rot. Parl. v. 281; Paston Letters, i. 325. The letter to the king is given in Latin by Whethamstede, i. 184.

His letter to the king intercepted.

them to prove their goodwill towards him. The letter to the king was, as they afterwards said, intercepted by Somerset, but if it had been delivered it could have made little difference. Henry, with his half-brother the earl of Pembroke, the dukes of Somerset and Buckingham, the earls of Northumberland, Devonshire, Stafford, and Wiltshire, and a force of two thousand men, advanced to S. Alban's, and there on the 22nd the two parties met. Negotiation was tried in vain; the Yorkists demanded an interview with the king and the arrest of the counsellors whom they hated. The royal party replied with threats which they must have known that they were too weak to execute; and Henry was himself moved to declare that he would be satisfied only with the destruction of his enemies. A battle followed, in which the duke of Somerset, the earl of Northumberland, the earl of Stafford, son of Buckingham, and the lord Clifford, on the king's side, were slain, and he himself was wounded. Although in itself little more than a skirmish which lasted half an hour, and cost comparatively little bloodshed, the first battle of S. Alban's sealed the fate of the kingdom; the duke of York was completely victorious; the king remained a prisoner in his hands, and he recovered at once all the power that he had lost¹.

First battle of S. Alban's
May 22, 1455.

Somerset
slain.

Political result of the battle, in forcing queen Margaret into the foreground.

The battle of S. Alban's had one permanent result: it forced the queen forward as the head of the royal party. Suffolk first and Somerset after him had borne the brunt of the struggle, and enabled the duke to say that it was against the evil counsellors, not against the king himself, that his efforts were directed. The death of Somerset left her alone²; the duke of Buckingham, although loyal, was not actuated by that feeling towards the house of Lancaster which moved the Beauforts, and which drew down upon them in successive generations the hatred of the opposition. The young duke of Somerset was too young to have more than a colourable complicity with his father's policy, although he was not too young to inherit the enmities which his very name entailed upon him. Nor could the royal party under Margaret's guidance be said to have any longer any policy but that of resistance to the duke of York. She had been taught to believe, and no doubt believed, that he was accessory to Cade's rebellion and to the murder of Suffolk; he was directly answerable for the death of Somerset. York himself made scarcely any pretence to the character of a reformer of the state; it was to vindicate his own position, to dislodge the enemies who poisoned the king's mind against him, that he rose in arms; and the charges against them, by which he tried to justify his hostility, were such as tended rather to involve the accused in popular odium than to indicate a treacherous intent. Still it may be questioned whether the design of claiming the crown had distinctly formed itself in his mind before this period. That he regarded himself and was regarded by his party as the fittest man to rule England, under a king so incapable as Henry VI, could only be a justification of his proceedings in the eyes of those who believed that such a sense of fitness gives by itself a paramount claim to office. Under these circumstances the struggle henceforth loses all its constitutional features; the history of England becomes the history of a civil war between two factions, both of which preserve certain constitutional formalities without being at all guided by constitutional principles. Such principles neither actuate the combatants nor decide the struggle: yet in the end they prove their vitality by surviving the exhausted energies of both the parties, and maintaining the continuity of the national life in the forms which its earlier history had moulded.

¹ Whethamstede, i. 167; Stow, pp. 390-400; Archaeologia, xx. 519; Paston Letters, i. 327-333; J. du Clercq, iii. c. 23.

² See on Margaret's spirit and attitude generally, Plummer, Fortescue, pp. 53 sq.

Apparent incompleteness of the duke's designs.

Changes in the constitutional action of the period.

351. Immediately after the battle the unhappy king admitted his victorious enemies to reconciliation: on the 26th of May he summoned the parliament to meet in July¹; and on the 29th he removed the treasurer, replacing him with the viscount Bouchier, the archbishop's brother²: the government of Calais

Changes in the ministry.

¹ Lords' Report, iv. 936: by another letter he directed certain lords to bring up only their household servants and avoid setting a dangerous example; Ordinances, vi. 244.

² Paston Letters, i. 334.

Preparations for parliament.

It meets,
July 1455.

York and the Nevilles declared loyal.

Oath of allegiance taken.

Second illness of Henry and second protectorate of duke Richard,
Nov. 1455.

was given to Warwick, and the duke of York himself became high constable. But the royal party was not yet intimidated; the private feuds which divided the lords were not merged in the public quarrel; lord Cromwell was at enmity with Warwick: the elections even required careful attention on the part of the new government, and the duke had some trouble in obtaining a parliament which would be likely to warrant his proceedings¹. The circumstances, however, of the session bore some analogy to those of the last parliament. The estates met on the 9th of July; on the 10th the chancellor declared the causes of the summons: the sustenance of the royal household, the defence of Calais, the war against the French and Scots, the employment of the thirteen thousand archers voted in 1453, the preservation of peace in the country, the procuring of ready money, the protection of the sea, and the pacification of Wales². Five committees of the lords addressed themselves to the several points³: the next day Sir John Wenlock was chosen speaker; the duke of York presented a schedule giving his account of the recent struggle, and the king declared him and the Nevilles to be loyal⁴. On the 24th an oath of allegiance to Henry was laid before the lords; it was taken by the two archbishops, the dukes of York and Buckingham, eleven bishops, six earls, two viscounts, eighteen abbots, two priors, and seventeen barons; and orders were given for it to be taken by the absent members⁵.

On the 31st the parliament was prorogued, and before the day of meeting, November 12, the king was again insane. The formalities observed in 1454 were again adopted: on the 13th the commons asked for the nomination of a protector: on the 15th they repeated the request, and the chancellor undertook to consult the lords; the lords agreed and nominated

¹ The duchess of Norfolk wrote to John Paston praying him to vote for her candidates; Letters, i. 337: the Norfolk nominees were returned; ib. 339, 340. On the 5th of July the king wrote to the sheriff of Kent about the 'busy labour' which had been spent in that county in order to influence the elections, and ordered him to proclaim that the election was free according to the laws; Ordinances, vi. 246; Rot. Parl. v. 451.

² Rot. Parl. v. 278; Stow, p. 400.

³ Rot. Parl. v. 279.

⁴ Ib, v, 280,

⁵ Ib, v. 282.

the duke of York: on the 17th, in answer to the speaker's inquiry as to the result of the proposal, it was announced that the royal assent was given to the nomination made by the lords¹. The duke under protest accepted the office; and the king by letters patent on the 19th made the formal appointment, to continue until the duke should be relieved of his charge by the sovereign himself in parliament, or the prince should come of age. On the 22nd the king vested the 'politique rule and governance' in the hands of the council, of which the duke was chief. He ordained 'that his council shall provide, commyne, ordain, speed and conclude all such matters as touch and concern the good and politique rule and governance of this his land; he was himself to be informed of all matters that concerned his person. The council accepted the responsibility, protesting that the sovereignty must always remain in the royal person². On the 13th of December the parliament was again prorogued to January 14, 1456; on which day it met³. On the 25th of February the king had recovered⁴, and, under the influence of Margaret, at once relieved the duke from his office of protector⁵. What little else was attempted in the session may be learned from the petitions; Warwick's appointment as captain of Calais was completed⁶; duke Humfrey was declared to have been loyal⁷; the questions arising on the imprisonment of Thomas Yonge were referred to the council⁸, and provision was made for the household⁹; no taxation seems to have been asked for; a new act of resumption was passed¹⁰. The few statutes enrolled are important only as being the last attempts at legislation made during the reign. Probably the

The government vested in the council.

Henry's recovery, February, 1456.

Other proceedings in parliament.

¹ Rot. Parl. v. 284-289, 453; Rymer, xi. 369, 370.

² Rot. Parl. v. 289, 290.

³ Rot. Parl. v. 321; Ordinances, vi. 274.

⁴ Feb. 9, John Bocking wrote to Sir John Fastolf, that the king was inclined to continue the duke as chief counsellor, but the queen was opposed to it; Paston Letters, i. 378.

⁵ Rot. Parl. v. 321, 322; Rymer, xi. 373.

⁶ Rot. Parl. v. 341.

⁷ Rot. Parl. v. 335. This was proclaimed on the 31st of July, 1455, having been for seven years opposed by the king and council; Whethamstede, i. 181; Stow, p. 400.

⁸ Rot. Parl. v. 337.

⁹ A sum of £3934 19s. 4³d. was assigned; Rot. Parl. v. 320.

¹⁰ Whethamstede, i. 250; Paston Letters, i. 377; Rot. Parl. v. 300 sq.

The duke of York had not mended matters.

Pacific exertions of Henry.

Influence of the duke of Buckingham.

Intrigues with Scotland and France.

king's sudden recovery brought to a precipitate end both the session of the parliament and the supremacy of the protector. Before he was formally relieved from his office he and Warwick had come up with a large guard to parliament; he had not strengthened his political position during his short term of office; and he went out leaving affairs in worse confusion than that in which he had found them.

352. Two years of comparative quiet followed the king's restoration to health. Henry made a sustained effort to keep peace between the parties which were gathered round the queen and the duke of York. They watched one another uneasily, but neither would strike the first blow¹. The death of Somerset had deprived the duke of his main grievance, and the queen of her ablest adviser: the chief object of each seems to have been to prevent the other from gaining supreme influence with the king. Henry was willing to listen to the duke, but could scarcely be expected to trust him. He showed no vindictive feeling towards the Nevilles; in March 1456 he assented to the promotion of George Neville to the see of Exeter. He retained for several months the ministers whom the duke had appointed, and probably gave his confidence chiefly to the duke of Buckingham, who was constantly called in to take the part of a mediator. But a state divided against itself is not secured by the most skilful diplomacy against attacks from without; and Margaret of Anjou had little scruple about employing the services of foreign foes to overthrow her foes at home. The king of Scots, whose mother was a Beaufort, made the death of Somerset an opportunity of declaring that he would not be bound by the truce which had been concluded in 1453²; the duke of York, acting in the king's name, accepted the challenge; the king found himself obliged to repudiate the action of the duke; the nation was taught that the court was in league with the Scots, and as a matter of fact Scotland became the refuge of the defeated Lancastrians. The French in the same way were courted by the queen, who, intent upon the victory of the moment, would not see that a national dynasty cannot be maintained by the forces of foreign enemies. The duke of York, on the other hand, was intriguing with the duke of Alençon, who was conspiring against Charles VII¹. In October 1456 the king called a council at Coventry, in hopes of turning this political armistice into such a peace as might make concordant action possible. The lords attended in arms, and the duke of Buckingham had to make peace between Warwick and the young Somerset². The council had no other result than a change of ministers; the Bouchiers, whose leaning towards the duke of York was becoming more decided, were removed; bishop Waynflete became chancellor³, and the earl of Shrewsbury treasurer⁴. The removal of the Bouchiers perhaps indicates that the mediating policy of the duke of Buckingham was exchanged for a more determined one, and that the duke of York was henceforth to be excluded from the royal councils. In 1457 the alarm of war on the side of France became more threatening; Calais was known to be in the utmost danger⁵; Sandwich and Fowey were taken by the French fleets, and no power of resistance seems to have been forthcoming⁶. Henry travelled through the country making ineffectual attempts at reconciliation, and received again at Coventry the oath of the duke of York, who was however warned that he was pardoned for the last time⁷. The queen negotiated with the national Council at Coventry,

¹ See Paston Letters, i. 386, 387, 392.

² See Beckington, Letters, ii. 139-144; cf. Rymer, xi. 383.

Oct. 1456.

Change of ministers.

Alarm of war, 1457.

¹ Cont. Monstr. liv. iii. c. 77.

² Paston Letters, i. 408.

³ Oct. 11; Ordinances, vi. 360; Rymer, xi. 383.

⁴ Oct. 5; Paston Letters, i. 403, 407.

⁵ Mathieu de Coussy ascribes the attack on the English coast by Pierre de Brezé in 1457 to an agreement between Margaret and Charles VII; and gives an account of an alliance with Scotland to be cemented by the marriage of two sons of Somerset with two daughters of James II (Buchon, xxxvi. 295, 296). Du Clercq, who recounts the invasion, does not mention the agreement with Margaret; liv. iii. c. 28. Both parties had the idea of strengthening themselves by French alliances; Cont. Monstr. liv. iii. cc. 77, 89. But of course York's intrigues with Alençon would be regarded as justified by the fact that Charles VII was the national enemy.

⁶ Eng. Chron. ed. Davies, p. 74.

⁷ Such seems to have been the object of a great council called to meet at Coventry Feb. 14, 1457; in which the duke swore that he would seek redress only by legal means, and was warned that he was pardoned for the last time; Rot. Parl. v. 347; Gregory, p. 203; Ordinances, vi. 433. Mr. Gairdner (Paston Letters, i. cxxviii. sq.) traces the king's movements by the dates of privy seals. Cf. Fabyan, p. 631.

Pacifica-tions and intrigues.

Bishop Pecock.

Meeting at London in January, 1458.

Great pacification at S. Paul's, March 25, 1458.

During the peace both parties prepare to renew the struggle.

enemies and weakened more and more the hold which the king had on the people. The duke and the Nevilles either plotted in secret or waited until she had ruined her husband's cause. Norfolk received licence to go on pilgrimage. The clergy, under the guidance of Bouchier, were employed in the trial of bishop Pecock of Chichester¹, a learned and temperate divine, who was trying to convert the heretics by argument rather than by force, and who in the strength of his own faith had made admissions which recommended him to neither the orthodox nor the heterodox. At the close of the year Henry called a great council with his usual intention of making peace: on the 27th of January, 1458, all the lords met in London and the neighbourhood, the Yorkist party within the city, the Lancastrian lords outside. As might be expected, both hard words and hard blows were heartily interchanged; but the king, with the aid of archbishop Bouchier, succeeded at last. A grand pacification took place in March, and on Lady Day at S. Paul's², after an imposing procession in which the duke led the queen by the hand, the high conflicting parties swore eternal friendship. The ministers who had contrived this happy result remained in office. The command of the fleet and the captaincy of Calais were allotted to Warwick³; and the duke of York and other lords who had conquered at S. Alban's, by paying for masses for the souls of the slain, appeased the hostility of their sons. The victories won by Warwick as soon as he had assumed his command were sufficient to vindicate the wisdom of employing him as admiral, but they increased his popularity and made the queen more than ever apprehensive of his predominance.

353. The eternal friendship sworn in March 1458 served for about a year and a half to delay the crisis, whilst it gave both parties time to organise their forces for it. But long before they came to blows all pretence of cordiality had vanished. In October

¹ Wilkins, Conc. iii. 576; Eng. Chr. p. 75; Whethamstede, i. 279 sq.; Fabyan, p. 632.

² Ordinances, vi. 290 sq.; Fabyan, p. 633; Political Songs, ii. 254; Hall, p. 238. Cf. Paston Letters, i. 424-427; Stow, Chr. pp. 403, 404; Whethamstede, i. 295-308.

³ Ordinances, vi. 294, 295.

the king held a full council and recalled the earl of Wiltshire to the treasury¹. In November² a riot occurred at Westminster in which the earl of Warwick was implicated, and which caused him to leave England and establish himself at Calais, which henceforth became the head-quarters of disaffection. The country returned to the condition in which it had been the year before: it was divided as it were between two hostile camps; all regular government was paralysed; the queen devoted herself to organising a party for her son; the Yorkists spread the evil report that the royal boy was a bastard or a changeling. The treasurer was said to be amassing untold wealth³; yet the taxes were uncollected, and the king's debts unpaid. Everything was going wrong; and everything, wrong or right, was represented in its worst colours. The grant of the taxes to the king for life made it unnecessary to call a parliament; but this abeyance of constitutional forms, whilst it seemed to confine personal altercations within the walls of the council chamber, left the nation at large without an opportunity of broaching its grievances or forcing them on the notice of the king. At last, in the month of September 1459⁴, the final breach occurred. The earl of Salisbury, who seems to have been, notwithstanding his years and experience, more inveterately hostile to the king than either York or Warwick, collected a force of 5000 men at Middleham and marched towards Ludlow castle, where he was to join the duke of York, and with him to visit the king at Coleshill. The queen, mistrusting the object of the visit, sent lord Audley with an insufficient force and a royal warrant for the earl's arrest. The two lords met at Bloreheath on the 23rd; Salisbury refused to obey the warrant, defeated Audley, who was killed on the field, and made his way to Ludlow, where Warwick also joined him. Henry was better prepared than they expected. He marched on Ludlow: the opposing force, after attempting to surprise him at Ludford, melted before him; and, unable to face him, Warwick goes to Calais, November 1458.

Divisions and rumours.

Cessation of parliaments.

Salisbury marches southwards with a large force.

Battle of Bloreheath, Sept. 23, 1459.

¹ The council was summoned for Oct. 11; Ordinances, vi. 297; the treasurer was appointed Oct. 30.

² Nov. 9; Eng. Chron. (ed. Davies), p. 78; Stow, Chr. pp. 404, 405. Fabyan, p. 633, places it on Feb. 2.

³ Eng. Chron. p. 79.

⁴ Eng. Chron. p. 80; Whethamstede, i. 338.

Flight of the Yorkist lords.

the duke and his companions fled. York took refuge in Ireland; the two earls went to Calais¹, after writing to the king a formal protest in which they proclaimed their own loyalty, complained of the misrepresentations of their enemies and the oppression of their vassals, and alleged that the cause of their flight was not dread of those enemies but fear of God and the king². This letter was written on the 10th of October; the king, on the 9th of the same month, called a parliament to meet at Coventry on the 20th of November. No summons was addressed to the three delinquents or the lord Clinton, but all the rest of the barons were cited. No time was given for the earls to pack the house of commons; the knights of the shire were returned, on the nomination of the Lancastrian leaders, and in such haste that the sheriffs had to petition for indemnity as having made their returns in accordance with the dictation of privy seal letters, and even after the expiration of their term of office. The charge was made in the parliament of 1460 that the members were returned without due election, and in some cases without even the form. However this may have been, in the result the king had it all his own way³.

Parliament called at Coventry.

Parliament of Coventry,
Nov. 20, 1459.

The bishop of Winchester opened the proceedings with a discourse on the text 'Grace be unto you, and peace be multiplied⁴.' The speaker was Thomas Tresham, the member for Northamptonshire. The business of the session was the attainder of the duke of York and his friends. The bill which contained the indictment is an important historical manifesto; for whether its statements are true or not they furnish a proof of what the king and the Lancastrian party believed to be true.

¹ Whethamstede, i. 345. ² Stow, pp. 405, 406; Eng. Chr. pp. 80, 81.

³ Hall, p. 243; Eng. Chr. p. 83; Rot. Parl. v. 367, 374. The writs for the parliament of Coventry are printed in the appendix to the Lords' Report, pp. 940 sq. in the usual form. Mr. Plummer, on the evidence of the petition for indemnity, thinks that the elections were made under privy seal writs and not under writs under the great seal (Fortescue, p. 35). But the writs were in proper form, and the illegality consisted in the dictating of the names of the persons to be elected in privy seal letters, together with the action of the sheriffs of the previous year who had acted beyond their term of office, and who in some cases made the returns without formal election; see Prynne, ii. 142, and below, p. 409.

⁴ Rot. Parl. v. 345; cf. Whethamstede, i. 345.

The duke's connexion with Cade's rebellion, his conduct in forcing himself on the king's councils, his disloyal practices in parliament, his attempt at rebellion in 1452, his breach of the oath taken at S. Paul's in the same year, his attack on the king at S. Alban's, his breach of the oath taken at Coventry in 1457, and at S. Paul's in 1458; his responsibility for the battle of Bloreheath and continued resistance to the king at Ludlow, Ludford, and Calais;—all are rehearsed in order¹. Besides the duke and the Nevilles, the young earls of March and Rutland, lord Clinton, two of the Bouchiers, Sir John Wenlock, the speaker of 1455, Sir William Oldhall, the speaker of 1450, the countess of Salisbury, and several other persons of less note were attainted on these charges². Lord Powys and two other knights who had submitted after the skirmish at Ludford had their lives spared, but forfeited their lands³. The others were adjudged to suffer the penalties of high treason: the king reserving however his prerogative of pardon⁴. A petition for the attainder of Lord Stanley was rejected by him, although presented by the commons. A very solemn oath of allegiance was then taken by the lords, who swore further to defend the queen and the prince, to accept the latter as his father's successor, and to do their best to secure the crown to the male line of the king's descendants. The latter article shows that, although the right of the duke of York to the crown had not been formally stated, it was sufficiently well known to require some such precautions. The oath was recorded, signed and sealed by the two archbishops, three dukes, sixteen bishops, five earls, two viscounts, sixteen abbots and priors, and twenty-two barons⁵. Of these only a small number appeared later on as Yorkist partisans, but the list does not furnish a complete roll of the Lancastrian lords. It is signed by the duke of Norfolk and the lords Bonneville and Stourton, who were Yorkists; the names of the duke of Somerset, the earls of Devonshire, Oxford, and Westmoreland, the lords Hungerford, Lovell, and Moleyns,

The York-ist lords attainted.

Sentences of the parliament of Coventry.

Oath of allegiance taken by the lords,

notwithstanding party divisions.

¹ Rot. Parl. v. 346–350.

² Ib. v. 350; Eng. Chron. ed. Davies, pp. 83, 84.

³ Rot. Parl. v. 349.

⁴ Ib. v. 350; Whethamstede, i. 356.

⁵ Rot. Parl. v. 351.

all Lancastrians, are not attached to it. There can be no doubt that the king had a large majority of supporters among the lords, independently of the influence which the prelates consistently exercised on behalf of peace. The commons cannot be so distinctly classified, but it would seem that parties in most of the counties were so nearly balanced as to enable either faction by a little exertion to influence the elections in their own favour¹. The north of England, notwithstanding the influence of the Nevilles, was loyal; the old feud between the first and second families of earl Ralph made the head of the house, the earl of Westmoreland, at least half Lancastrian; the estates of the Percies and Cliffords, and of the duchy of Lancaster, gave great influence in Yorkshire to the same party; the queen had succeeded in raising a strong feeling of affection in the western counties. In the east, Norfolk, Suffolk², and Kent seem generally to have been inclined to the duke of York, who was also strong on the marches. The south-western counties did not witness much of the military action of the time, and bore their share in the common burden quietly; no politician sufficiently prominent to be chosen speaker represented any western county during the whole struggle.

The parliament of Coventry sat only for a month, and attempted nothing further. On the 20th of December it was dissolved by the lord chancellor in a speech abounding with gratitude³. In this short campaign Henry had shown energy, decision, and industry, which earlier in his reign might have insured him a happy career. Moderation, mercy, and readiness to forgive he invariably showed. If he seems to have been unwise just now in driving his formidable antagonist to extremities, it must be remembered that he had borne and forgiven very much already, that he must have earned the scorn of the nation if he endured the defiance of his subjects, however

Local distribution of the two parties.

The parliament dissolved, Dec. 20, 1459.

The king's behaviour and policy.

¹ Unfortunately the returns for the parliaments of 1459 and 1460 are so imperfect as to preclude any comparison of names.

² John de la Pole, the young heir of the duke of Suffolk, was a Yorkist, and married a daughter of the duke of York; he was restored to the dukedom in 1463.

³ Rot. Parl. v. 370.

powerful, and that he was fully awake to the jeopardy in which his son's inheritance stood.

The sentence passed against the rebellious nobles served only to confirm them in their purpose. They were out of the king's reach; the duke of York in Ireland and the Nevilles at Calais were able to concert measures for an invasion of England; the king had neither politic counsel, nor military skill, nor sufficient resources to dislodge them. The queen's efforts to stir up the native Irish and the French against their strongholds served only to increase her unpopularity; the successive attempts made by the lord Audley, lord Rivers, Sir Baldwin Fulford, and the duke of Somerset, to seize Calais, or to neutralise its importance by occupying Guisnes, to clear the channel from Warwick's cruisers, or to guard against his landing at Sandwich, proved ludicrously ineffectual. The treasurer, by severe requisitions from the Yorkist towns, and by the exercise of the right of purveyance, which, in the abeyance of all administrative order, was the only means left for raising supplies from day to day, drew down popular hatred on the cause which was reduced to such expedients. The first half of the year 1460 passed away whilst the clouds were thus gathering. In March¹ Warwick passed over to Ireland, whence, having arranged his plan of operations with the duke, he returned to Calais in June² and immediately prepared for the attack. On the 26th of that month, Salisbury, Warwick, and Edward earl of March, the eldest son of the duke of York, crossed over to Kent; they had a papal legate in their company and were immediately joined by archbishop Bourchier and a host of Kentish men³.

The Yorkist lords plan a descent on England.

The royal forces fail to seize Calais.

Unpopularity of the Treasurer.

Warwick and York concert an invasion.

Landing of the earls.

In the document⁴ which now or a little earlier was addressed by the duke and the three earls to the archbishop and commons of England may be read their formal indictment against the government of Henry VI. It contains many points which are mere constitutional generalities, statements that have no special reference to the circumstances of the times, and charges which Manifesto issued by the Yorkist lords against the king's friends.

¹ W. Worc. p. 772; Eng. Chr. p. 85.

² W. Worc. p. 772.

³ W. Worc. p. 772; Eng. Chr. p. 86.

⁴ Stow, pp. 407, 408; Eng. Chr. pp. 86, 87. See Gregory, p. 206.

had been from time immemorial part of the stores of political warfare; but it comprises other points which, whilst they evince the unscrupulous hostility of the accusers, at the same time reveal the causes of the king's fall and explain his helplessness in the great crisis. First come the oppressions of the church, offences which least of all could be laid to Henry's charge; then follow, as notorious grievances, the poverty of the king, which has compelled the practice of purveyance; the perversion of the law, whereby all righteousness and justice is exiled from the land; the waste of royal revenue on men who are 'the destroyers of the land,' so that the king cannot live of his own as his ancestors did, but is obliged to plunder the commons; the heavy taxation which had enriched the very men who had lost Anjou, Maine, and Normandy; the recent demand of a force to be maintained by the townships for the king's guard; the attempts made to stir up the Irish against the duke and the French against Calais, attempts which show that the ministers are ready to betray the realm into the hands of foreigners; the murder of Gloucester and attempted murder of the duke of York and the earls; the influence of the earls of Shrewsbury and Wiltshire and the lord Beaumont, who have prevented the king from showing grace to them, hoping to escape the penalty due to them for causing the misery of the kingdom, 'whereof they be causes and not the king, which is himself as noble, as virtuous, as righteous, and blessed of disposition as any prince earthly;' and the acts of the parliament of Coventry which were really the acts of the same lords. In expectation of a French invasion, the writers pray the archbishop and the commons to assist them in gaining access to the king, and call on God, the Virgin, and all saints to witness the sincerity of their profession of fealty. In another memorial, circulated among the Kentishmen, all these charges are repeated and the king's friends are accused of teaching that his will is above the law¹. Having thus prepared the way the lords marched on London, where the citizens received them on the 2nd of July². With March and Warwick were the lords Fauconberg, Clinton, Bouchier, Audley,

Charges
against the royal advisers.

Kentish memorial.

The lords enter London.

¹ Chr. White Rose, p. lxxv.

² W. Worc. p. 773; Eng. Chr. p. 94.

Bergavenny, Say, and Scrope. The lords Scales, Vesey, Lovell, and de la Warr, held out against them in the Tower. Convocation was sitting at the time, and Warwick took the opportunity of stating his grievances before the clergy, and swearing faith and allegiance on the cross of Canterbury. Then, leaving the earl of Salisbury as governor of London, they set out to meet the king.

Henry, who was with his council at Coventry, marched, when he heard of the landing of the earls, for Northampton; Margaret was gathering forces in the north. At Northampton the earls arrived with 60,000 men, and after Warwick had made three separate attempts to force himself into the king's presence, in which he was foiled by the duke of Buckingham, the battle of Northampton was fought on the 10th of July¹. Like the first battle of S. Alban's it was marked by a great slaughter of the Lancastrian lords; the duke of Buckingham, the earl of Shrewsbury, the lords Beaumont and Egremont, were slain beside the king's tent. It is a miserable sign of Warwick's vindictiveness that those against whom he had private grievances, such as Egremont, or with whom he was in public rivalry, such as Beaumont and Shrewsbury, were the special victims. He had given orders that no man should lay hand on the king or on the commons, but only on the lords, knights, and squires; and the command was so far faithfully obeyed². The lord Grey of Ruthyn, who led the king's vanguard, went over to Warwick, and the battle lasted only half an hour. Henry was taken in his tent and obliged to accept the profession of devotion which the earls consistently professed³. On the 16th of July he was brought to London⁴. On the 19th the defenders of the Tower surrendered, and lord Scales, on his way to sanctuary, was murdered by the boatmen on the Thames⁵. On the 25th George Neville, bishop of Exeter, brother of the earl of Warwick, was made chancellor⁶. On

Battle of Northampton, July 10, 1460.

Slaughter of the Lancas-trian lords.

Desertion of Grey of Ruthyn.

The king taken and brought to London.

¹ Eng. Chr. pp. 95-97; Gregory, p. 207; W. Worc. p. 773; Whethamstede, i. 372 sq.

² Eng. Chron. p. 97.

³ Ib. p. 97.

⁴ Ib. p. 98.

⁵ W. Worc. pp. 773, 774; Eng. Chr. p. 98.

⁶ Rymer, xi. 458, 459, 460. Cf. Ordinances, vi. 303.

the 30th a parliament was summoned in the king's name to meet at Westminster on the 7th of October¹. On the 5th of August Warwick was recognised as captain of Calais. On the 8th the rebel lords were declared loyal. The queen fled to Scotland; the duke of York returned to England before the day of the meeting of parliament.

354. The duke of York saw that his hour of triumph was now come: regardless of the oaths which he had so often sworn, and of the mercy which had been, until the parliament of Coventry, so constantly extended towards him, he determined to make his claim to the crown. The parliament was opened by the new chancellor in due form: John Green, member for Essex, was chosen speaker², and on petition of the commons the acts of the last parliament were repealed at once³. On the third day of the session, the duke, having previously dislodged Henry from his apartments in the palace⁴, appeared in the chamber of the lords, and, going up to the royal seat, laid his hand on the cushion as if about formally to take possession. The gesture was viewed by the assembled lords with more wonder than approval. Archbishop Bourchier asked what he wanted, and whether he wished to go in to see the king. The duke replied, 'I do not bethink me that I know of any within the realm for whom it were not more fitting that he should come to me and see me than for me to attend on him and visit him⁵.' This outspoken boast did not procure him any distinct support, and it was clear that the royal position could not be stormed⁶. On the 16th of October therefore the duke's counsel laid before the lords his pedigree and the formal claim to the crown, as heir of Edward III, through Lionel of Clarence⁷. The next day the claim was reported to the king, who was probably well prepared for it. He replied by requesting the lords to search for materials by which the claim might be refuted, and they appealed to him as a diligent

Flight of Margaret.

Parliament of Oct. 7, 1460.

The Coven-try acts repealed.

The duke of York asserts his right to the throne;

and puts in his pedigree.

The king is informed, and orders a search.

¹ Lords' Report, iv. 945.

² Rot. Parl. v. 373, 374.

³ Rot. Parl. v. 374.

⁴ Eng. Chron. p. 99.

⁵ W. Worc. p. 774; Eng. Chr. p. 99; Fabyan, p. 637. Hall gives a long speech, Chr. pp. 245 sq.

⁶ Whethamstede, i. 377-380; W. Worc. p. 774.

⁷ Rot. Parl. v. 375.

student of chronicles to do the same¹. On the 18th the judges were consulted; but, although Sir John Fortescue the chief justice afterwards wrote a treatise on the question, they were not now prepared to answer; they replied that the question was not for them but for the lords of the king's blood to decide. The king's counsel, sergeants, and attorney general, sheltered themselves under the same excuse. Thus left to themselves the lords drew up five articles of objection to the duke's claim; they could not recognise it without breaking the solemn oaths which they had so often taken; the acts of parliament by which the succession was settled were still the law of the land and were of such 'authority as to defeat any manner of title made to any person;' it was a serious question whether the right of the crown did not pass by the entails so often made upon the heirs male; the duke did not even bear the arms of Lionel of Clarence, but those of Edmund of Langley his younger brother; lastly, king Henry IV had claimed the crown by hereditary descent from Henry III, not by conquest or unrighteous entry, as the duke's counsel had asserted². The first three arguments were sound, the other two worse than useless. The duke presented a formal reply; the allegation of the oath he met by the assertion that oaths made contrary to truth, justice, and charity, are not obligatory; that the oath of allegiance binds no man to that which is inconvenient and unlawful, and that he was prepared to defend himself at the due time in the spiritual court against the charge of perjury; to the second and third articles he replied that the succession rested only on the act of 1406, which by itself afforded conclusive proof that Henry IV had no valid claim by descent; as for the heraldic question, although he had not assumed the arms of Clarence, he might have assumed them or even those of Edward III; he had abstained, and the country well knew why he had abstained, from making either claim before now. As for the descent of the house of Lancaster as stated by Henry IV, it was in no wise true, and should be thoroughly disproved³. On Saturday, the 25th of October, the chancellor informed the lords that a way of compromise had been devised

The judges decline to give an opinion.

Five objections drawn up by the lords.

Answer of the duke to the objections of the lords.

A compromise devised.

¹ Rot. Parl. v. 375, 376.

² Ib. v. 376.

³ Ib. v. 377.

Henry is to be king for life, and the duke is to succeed him.

Oaths taken.

Henry submits.

Question as to the composition of the parliament of 1460.

which, as the title of the duke was indefeasible, would save the king's dignity, would satisfy the duke, and enable the lords themselves to escape from the guilt of perjury: the king was to 'keep the crowns and his estate and dignity royal during his life, and the said duke and his heirs to succeed him in the same.' This proposal was approved by the lords, who determined to leave to the king the choice of acceptance or refusal. Henry received the chancellor graciously, and heard his tale, and then, as the record continues, 'inspired with the grace of the Holy Ghost¹, and in eschewing of effusion of Christian blood, by good and sad deliberation and advice had with all his lords spiritual and temporal, condescended to accord to be made between him and the said duke, and to be authorised by the authority of the parliament.' The agreement was drawn up; the duke and his sons were not to molest the king; he was declared heir to the crowns; any attempt on his life was made high treason; the principality of Wales and the earldom of Chester were made over to him; an income of 10,000 marks was assigned to him and his sons, and they swore to the lords, and the lords to them, oaths of mutual defence². The unfortunate king, unable to make even a protest for the rights of his son, was prevailed on to ratify the agreement; the act of 1406 was repealed, and on the 31st of October the transaction was completed. It was said that the duke had chosen the 1st of November for his coronation in case the lords had accepted him as king.

Although the decision of the question of succession was thus made to be the king's personal act, and the lords present availed themselves of the compromise to save themselves from the guilt of perjury, there can be little doubt that the parliament contained hardly any of the king's partisans, and but few of the lay lords who had taken the oath of allegiance a year before.

¹ 'The kynge for fere of dethe graunted hym the crowne, for a man that hathe but lytylle wytte wyll soone be aferyd of dethe, and yet I truste and beleve there was no man that wolde doo him bodely harme;' Gregory, Chr. p. 208.

² Rot. Parl. v. 377-381; Engl. Chr. pp. 100-106. According to the last authority the duke was made protector, prince of Wales, and earl of Chester.

Of those lay lords the duke of Buckingham, the earl of Shrewsbury, lords Beaumont, Scales, and Egremont were dead, and many others stayed away. The dukes of Somerset and Exeter, the earls of Devonshire and Northumberland, and the lords Clifford, Dacre, and Neville were in the north. Lords Grey and Audley had changed sides. The list of the triers of petitions contains only the names of Warwick and Salisbury among the earls, and Grey of Ruthyn, Dacre, Fitz-Warin, Scrope, Bonneville, Berners, and Rougemont-Grey among the barons¹. The commons had little to do with the business, save by assenting to the decision of the lords. If betrayal or tergiversation is to be imputed to any under the very difficult circumstances in which they found themselves, the blame must lie most heavily on the spiritual lords; on Bouchier and Neville, now the avowed partisans of the duke. Yet it was probably owing to their reluctance to incur the blame of perjury that Henry was secured in possession of the throne for life. The whole baronage was summoned to this parliament, but it can scarcely be regarded as so free or full an assembly of the estates as even the parliament of Coventry had been. Its work lasted but a few weeks, and already the march of events was too rapid to wait on the deliberations of any such assembly.

The clerical element.

355. The battle of Wakefield enabled the Lancastrian party to avenge the blood of Suffolk, Somerset, and Buckingham. York and Salisbury had gone northwards to thwart the designs of the queen, who had collected a considerable force by letters issued in the king's name². On the 21st of December they had lost a part of their force in a struggle with the duke of Somerset at Worksop³; on the 29th they were overwhelmed at Wakefield by the united forces of Somerset, Northumberland, and Neville. The duke was killed in the battle, his son the earl of Rutland was slain by lord Clifford; the earl of Salisbury was taken prisoner and beheaded at Pomfret by the Yorkshiresmen, whom he had offended when administering the duchy

Battle of Wakefield,
Dec. 29, 1460.

Death of York and Salisbury.

¹ Rot. Parl. v. 373.

² Whethamstede, i. 381; Eng. Chr. p. 106.

³ W. Worc. p. 775.

of Lancaster¹. The indignities offered to the slain testify at once to the lack of moderation in the victorious party, and to the cruel embitterment of public feeling by personal and private antipathies.

The earl of March wins a battle at Mortimer's Cross, Feb. 3, 1461.

Second battle of S. Alban's, Feb. 17.

Henry and Margaret retire to the North.

Edward claims the crown.

Whilst the duke of York and Salisbury were thus perishing in the north, the young earl of March was raising forces on the Welsh marches, and Warwick remained in the neighbourhood of London with the captive king. Against the earl of March Jasper Tudor earl of Pembroke, the king's half-brother, and the earl of Wiltshire pitted themselves. They were defeated at Mortimer's Cross near Wigmore on the 3rd of February². Against Warwick queen Margaret and the northern lords advanced southwards the same month; the second battle of S. Alban's, on the 17th, restored the king to liberty, and proved that Warwick was not invincible³. The victorious earl of March and the defeated earl of Warwick met at Chipping-Norton, and hastened to London⁴. Henry and Margaret, in order to prevent their followers from sacking the capital, had moved from S. Alban's⁵ to Dunstable, and lost their chance of seizing the city, where, although the common people were as usual bitter against the court, they would have met with no organised resistance. On the 28th the earls of March and Warwick entered London⁶; on the 1st of March the chancellor, bishop Neville, called a general assembly of the citizens at Clerkenwell, and explained to them the title by which Edward, now duke of York, claimed the crown. The mob received the instruction with applause, and proclaimed that he was and should be king. On the 3rd a council of the party

¹ 'The commune peple of the cuntre whiche loved him nat ;' Eng. Chr. p. 107. According to William of Worcester the Bastard of Exeter killed him; W. Worc. p. 775; cf. Whethamstede, i. 382.

² Eng. Chr. p. 110; W. Worc. pp. 775, 776. On the 12th of February Edward had the king's commission to raise forces against the queen, although her name is not mentioned; Rymer, xi. 471; cf. Ordinances, vi. 307-310.

³ Eng. Chr. pp. 107, 108; W. Worc. p. 776; Whethamstede, i. 390 sq.

⁴ W. Worc. p. 777.

⁵ Towards York, for fear their forces should sack London; Gregory, Chr. p. 214; Eng. Chr. p. 109; W. Worc. p. 776.

⁶ W. Worc. p. 777.

was held at Baynard's Castle. Archbishop Bouchier, bishop Beauchamp of Salisbury, bishop Neville, the duke of Norfolk, the earl of Warwick, the lords Fitzwalter and Ferrers of Chartley, and Sir William Herbert, with their friends, there took upon themselves to declare Edward the rightful king. On the 4th he was received in procession at Westminster, seized the crown and sceptre of the Confessor, and was proclaimed king by the name of Edward IV¹. On the 10th the Bishop of Exeter became Edward's chancellor as he had just before been Henry's: and on the 18th the lord Bouchier returned to the Treasury².

He is acknowledged king, March 4. 1461.

From the 4th of March the legal recognition of Edward's royal character begins and the years of his reign date. The fact is important as illustrating the first working of the doctrine by virtue of which he assumed the royal character. Although there was no formal election, no parliamentary recognition, and a mere tumultuary proclamation, the character of royalty was regarded as complete in virtue of the claim of descent, and as soon as that claim was urged. Parliamentary recognition followed; but Edward's reign was allowed to begin from the day on which he declared himself king. The nation, by its action in the next parliament, sanctioned the proceeding, but the whole transaction is in striking contrast with the revolution of 1399, and even with the proceedings taken a few weeks before, when the duke of York made his claim. To anticipate the language of later history, the accession of the house of York was strictly a legitimist restoration.

Character of the usurpation.

The struggle was not even now fought out; although Edward was king in London, Henry and Margaret still possessed a large and hitherto undefeated army. Feeling however the insecurity of their position in the south, they had returned to Yorkshire³, whither Edward at once pursued them. On the ¹ 'By counsaill of the lords of the south;' Hardyng, p. 406. 'By the advice of the lords spiritual and temporal and by the election of the commons;' Gregory, Chr. p. 215; cf. Hall, Chr. p. 254; Eng. Chr. p. 110; Whethamstede, i. 405-407; Fabyan, p. 639.

² Rymer, xi. 473.

³ With them were the dukes of Somerset and Exeter, the earls of Devon Battles at Ferrybridge and Towton; March 28

and 29.

Berwick surrendered to the Scots.

Edward IV
crowned.

The cause of the fall of Henry VI.

28th of March a battle was fought at Ferrybridge, in which lord Clifford on the one side, and lord Fitzwalter on the other, fell¹. The next day the two hosts met at Towton, and in a bloody battle Edward was victorious. Of the Lancastrian lords, the earl of Northumberland, and lords Wells, Neville, and Dacre were slain; the earls of Devonshire and Wiltshire were taken and executed, the former at York, the latter at Newcastle. The dukes of Somerset and Exeter escaped². Margaret carried off her husband and son to Scotland. By the surrender of Berwick to the Scots, in April, the fall of the house of Lancaster was recognised as final³. Edward, after securing his conquests, returned to London, and was crowned at Westminster on the 28th of June⁴.

The overthrow of the house of Lancaster was not in itself a national act. The nation acquiesced in, approved and accepted it, because it had no great love for the king, because it distrusted the queen and the ministers and policy which she represented, because it had exhausted its strength, and longed for peace. The house of Lancaster was put practically, although not formally, upon its trial. Henry was not deposed for incompetency or misgovernment, but set aside on the claim of a legitimate heir whose right he was regarded as usurping. But such a claim would not have been admitted except on two conditions; the house of York could not have unseated the house of Lancaster unless the first had been exceedingly strong, and the second exceedingly weak. The house of York was and Wiltshire, the lords Moleyns, Roos, Rivers, and Scales; Hardyng, p. 495.

¹ W. Worc. p. 777. Lord Fitzwalter was John Radcliffe, husband of the heiress of Fitzwalter, and a titular lord only: see Nicolas, Hist. Peerage, p. 199.

² Gregory, p. 216, gives a list of the lords who were at Towton on the king's side: the prince of Wales, the dukes of Exeter and Somerset; the earls of Northumberland and Devonshire; the lords Roos, Beaumont, Clifford, Neville, Wells, Willoughby, Harry of Buckingham, Rivers, Scales, Mauley, Ferrers of Groby, Lovell, and the young lord of Shrewsbury; Sir John Fortescue, Sir Thomas Hammys, Sir Andrew Trollope, Sir Thomas Tresham, Sir Robert Whittingham, Sir John Dawney. Henry and Margaret had been left at York; Hall, p. 254. The slain lords were Northumberland, Clifford, Neville, Wells, and Mauley. Cf. Paston Letters, ii. 6; Hardyng, p. 407.

³ Hall, p. 256.

⁴ Gregory, p. 218.

strong in the character and reputation of duke Richard, in the early force and energy of Edward, in the great popularity of Warwick, in the wealth and political ability of the family party which he led : but its great advantage lay in the weakness of the house of Lancaster. That weakness was proved in almost every possible way. The impulse which had set Henry IV on the throne, as the hereditary champion of constitutional right, and as personally the deliverer from odious tyranny, had long been exhausted. The new impulse which Henry V had created in his character of a great conqueror, a national hero and a good ruler, had become exhausted too ; its strength is proved by the fact that it was not exhausted sooner. Since the death of Gloucester and Beaufort, in 1447, everything had gone wrong ; the conquests of Henry V were lost, the crown was bankrupt, the peace was badly kept, the nation distrusted the ministers, the ministers contemned, although they did not perhaps deserve, the distrust of the nation. Henry himself never seems to have looked upon his royal character as involving the responsibility of leadership ; he yielded on every pressure, trusted implicitly in every pretended reconciliation, and, unless we are to charge him with faults of dissimulation with which his enemies never charged him personally, behaved as if his position as a constitutional monarch involved his acting as the puppet of each temporary majority. Without Margaret, he might have reigned as long as he lived, and perhaps have outlived the exhaustion under which the nation after the struggle with France was labouring. He might with another wife have transmitted his crown to his posterity as Henry III had done, who was not less despised, and much more hated. But in Margaret, from the very moment of her arrival, was concentrated the weakness and the strength of the dynastic cause ; its strength in her indomitable will, her steady faithfulness, her heroic defence of the rights of her husband and child ; its weakness in her political position, her policy and her ministers. To the nation she symbolised the loss of Henry V's conquests, an inglorious peace, the humiliation of the popular Gloucester, the promotion of the unpopular Beauforts. Her domestic policy was one of

Strength
of York.

Weakness of Lancaster.

Personal weakness of the king :
false strength of the queen.

Fatal preponderance of Margaret.

Her unpopularity.

jealous exclusion : she mistrusted the duke of York, and probably with good cause : she knew the soundness of his pedigree, and looked on him from the first as a competitor for the crown of her husband and son. She was drawn to the Beauforts and to Suffolk by the knowledge that their interests were entirely one with the interests of the dynasty. She supported them against all attacks, and when they perished continued the policy which they had shared. The weight of their unpopularity devolved on her, and she was unpopular enough already. Still she might have held out, especially if she had known how to use the pliancy and simplicity of her husband. But when the nation began to believe that she was in league with the national enemies ; when she began to wage a civil war, pitting the north against the south, and it was believed that her northern army was induced to follow her by the hope of being allowed to plunder the rich southern farms and cities ; when she stirred up, or was believed to have stirred up, the Irish against the duke of York, the French against Calais, and the Scots against the peace of England, she lost all the ground that was left her. The days were long past when the English barons could call in French or Scottish aid against a tyrant ; no king of England had yet made his throne strong by foreign help. It was fatal here. Men began to believe that she was an adulteress or her son a changeling. Her whole strength lay henceforth in the armed forces she was able to bring into the field, and a defeat in battle was fatal and final. Warwick saw his advantage, prepared his forces, grasped success at the critical moment, and triumphed in the field over a foe whose whole strength was in the field. Thus the house of Lancaster fell without any formal condemnation, without any constitutional impeachment. Henry had not ruled ill, but had gradually failed to rule at all. His foreign policy was not in itself unwise, but was unpopular and unfortunate. His incapacity and the failure of the men whom he trusted, opened the way for York and the Nevilles : and the weaker went to the wall. National exhaustion and weariness completed what royal exhaustion and weakness had begun. Spirit and ability supplanted simple incapacity ; the greater

Her strong partisanship.

Her foreign connexion.

Calumnies about her.

Fall of the house of Lancaster.

force overcame the smaller, national apathy co-operated with national disgust; and the decision which the fortune of war had adjudged, the national conscience, judgment and reason accepted. The present decision of the struggle neither depended on constitutional principles nor was ascertained by constitutional means. In the general survey of history, the justification of the change is to be found in this—that England, as at the Norman Conquest, needed a strong government, and sought one in the house of York; but the deep reasons, which in the economy of the world justify results, do not justify the sins of the actors or prove the guilt of the sufferers.

Edward IV came to the throne with great personal advantages. He was young and handsome; he had shown great military skill, and won a great victory; he brought the prospect of peace; he had no foreign connexions; he was closely related to the most powerful of the old houses of England. In many points his personal position was like that of Henry IV at the beginning of his reign; but he was younger, less embarrassed by previous obligations, more buoyant and hopeful. His character develops its real nature as his reign goes on, and it is seen how personal fitness adapted him to be the exponent of despotic theory. Whilst he was learning and practising the lessons which Richard II might have taught him, but which kings learn only too well without accredited instructors, the other Edward, an exile and wanderer in France or in Scotland, was learning from Sir John Fortescue the principles of constitutional government, by which the house of Lancaster rose; on which they always believed themselves to act, and in spite of which they fell. But Edward IV was too young, and his advisers too wary, to violate more than was absolutely necessary the forms of the constitution; so long as they were supreme they could use it for their own ends; they were popular, the commons would need no pressure: they were powerful, their rivals dared not lift their heads in parliament. Warwick could manage the lords, Bourchier the clergy. One parliament, prepared to take strong measures, could make the new king safe, and they

Position of Edward IV
at the beginning of his reign.

Edward of Lancaster, the pupil of Fortescue.

Popularity and power of Edward
of York.

had no scruples of conscience about the strength of any measure that might be conclusive.

Parliament of November 1461.

Number of lords.

New creations.

New earls and dukes.

356. Edward's first parliament, called on the 23rd of May to meet on the 6th of July, was delayed by the condition of the Scottish border, and did not meet until the 4th of November¹. Summons was issued to but one duke, Norfolk, to four earls, Warwick, Oxford, Arundel, and Westmoreland, to the viscount Bouchier, and to thirty-eight barons, of whom seven were now first summoned; the whole number of lay peers was forty-four², which, when contrasted with the number of fifty-six summoned to the parliament of 1453³, the last which was called before the great struggle, shows perhaps a smaller falling off than might have been expected. Many, especially in the higher ranks of the peerage, had fallen; many were in exile; some were willing to temporise. The fourteen who were attainted in the parliament itself were either dead or in arms against the new dynasty. The king too was already taking measures for replacing the missing dignities with new creations; on the 30th of June lord Bouchier was made earl of Essex, and William Neville, lord Fauconberg, was raised soon after to the earldom of Kent; the king's brothers were made dukes, George of Clarence and Richard of Gloucester; the seven new barons were William lord Herbert, Humfrey Stafford of Southwick, Humfrey Bouchier of Cromwell, Walter Devereux of Ferrers, John Wenlock of Wenlock, Robert Ogle of Ogle, and Thomas Lumley; Bouchier, Devereux, and Lumley holding old baronies. Of these Stafford and Bouchier represented the old interest of the house of Buckingham; Herbert was the king's confidential friend, and the others were faithful adherents of the fortunes of his house. Bishop Neville, as chancellor, opened the parliament with a discourse on the text 'Amend your ways and your doings⁴.' The speaker was Sir James Strangeways, knight of the shire for Yorkshire, who was founding a new family on his connexion with the Nevilles.

¹ Rot. Parl. v. 461; Paston Letters, ii. 15, 22, 31.

² Lords' Report, iv. 950 sq. ³ Ib. pp. 931 sq. ⁴ Rot. Parl. v. 461.

On the 12th of November the serious business began with an address of the commons to the king. Strangeways in their name thanked God for the king's victories, and the king for his exertions; not content with that, he expatiated on the iniquities of the late period of disorder, all of which were laid to the charge of Henry, and demanded the punishment of offenders¹. The address was followed by a petition, presented nominally by the commons, embodying the claim made by the counsel of the duke of York in the last parliament, and praying for the declaration of the king's title. After rehearsing the pedigree it proceeded to recount the circumstances under which Edward had assumed the title of king, and to recognise its validity according to the law of God, the law of man, and the law of nations, praying that it might be affirmed by act of parliament, and that, in consequence, the alienations of royal territory under the late dynasty might be cancelled, and an act of resumption passed. Then, recurring to recent events, it re-
The commons demand the punishment of the king's enemies, and the declaration of his title.
 capitulated the history of the compromise made in 1460, charged the breach of that agreement upon Henry, and demanded its repeal. Edward is thus regarded as succeeding to the rights of Richard II, and Henry as both a usurper and a traitor². The king's advisers, wiser than the commons, modified the petition before it became an act of parliament, by numerous clauses saving the rights which had been created during the Lancastrian reigns and since Edward's accession³.
Henry charged with breach of the compact of 1460.

Another roll of petitions, that the judicial acts of the late dynasty might be declared valid⁴, form the basis of a statute which was absolutely necessary if civil society was to be held together. In his answers the king undertook to confirm such proceedings, to renew the creation of the disputed peerages and to allow others to stand good, to allow confirmations of charters to be issued by the chancellor, and to recognise the validity of all formal acts of the kind, carefully excluding from the benefit of the concession the victims attainted in the present Discussion on the validity of the acts of the Lancaster kings.

¹ Rot. Parl. v. 462.² Ib. v. 463-467; Whethamstede, i. 416, 417.³ Rot. Parl. v. 467-475.⁴ Ib. v. 489 sq.

session¹. Neither petition nor statute ventures to touch the question of the validity of laws passed under the Lancastrian kings; perhaps the subject was too difficult to be attempted, perhaps the public interests were lost sight of in the anxiety to preserve individual rights. The other branch of the work of the session was the punishment of the opposing party. A bill of attainder was presented to the king in the form of an act of parliament², and with his approval laid before the commons, who assented to it; it was then by advice and assent of the lords spiritual and temporal returned to the king to receive the royal assent, which was given in the usual form 'le roy le voet.' By this act Henry VI is attainted of high treason, and condemned to forfeit the duchy of Lancaster, his patrimonial estate, which is henceforth attached as a separate provision to the crown; Margaret likewise is attainted for high treason, and with her son suffers forfeiture; the attainder is shared on diverse counts by the fourteen lords, living or dead, who had most vigorously supported them³, and by a large number of knights, squires, clerks, merchants, and others, the most notable of whom are Sir John Fortescue, the late chief justice, and John Morton, afterwards archbishop of Canterbury. Parallel with the attainder of the dead lords is the act restoring the reputation and legal position of the early victims of Henry IV; the attainder of the earl of Salisbury and lord le Despenser, who perished in 1400, was reversed, that the earl of Warwick and his mother might have their inheritance; the heirs of lord Lumley were restored, and the sentence against Richard of Cambridge, the king's grandfather, was annulled⁴. Some obdurate commoners were summoned to submit or incur

Bill of attainder passed,

against Henry,
Margaret, and their friends.

Restoration of the victims of the Revolution
of 1399.

¹ Statutes, ii. 380 sq.

² Rot. Parl. v. 476-483; W. Worc. p. 778.

³ Henry duke of Somerset, Thomas Courtenay earl of Devon, Henry late earl of Northumberland, Thomas lord Roos, John late lord Neville, Henry duke of Exeter, William viscount Beaumont, John late lord Clifford, Leo late lord Wells, lord Rougemont-Gray, Randolph late lord Dacre, Robert lord Hungerford, Jasper earl of Pembroke, James late earl of Wiltshire; Rot. Parl. v. 480. Hardyng wrote to press on Edward the example of Henry IV, in favour of clemency; Chr. p. 409. The Yorkists were dissatisfied with his moderation; Paston Letters, ii. 30.

⁴ Rot. Parl. v. 484.

the penalties of treason¹; the defenders of Harlech, which still held out for Margaret, were condemned to forfeiture². An ordinance directed against liveries, maintenance, and gambling, was proclaimed by the king, and a statute, referring indictments taken in sheriff's tourn to the justices of the peace, completed the legislative work of the session³. Statutes of this parliament.

On the 21st of December the parliament was prorogued, after a speech addressed by the king to the commons, in which, in modest and manly language, he thanked them for their share in what he regarded as a restoration, and for helping him to avenge his father, promising to devote himself heartily to the national service, and asking for a continuance of their good-will⁴. The parliament met again in the following May only to be dissolved⁵. Its work ended here, and seemed to promise better days to come; no money had been asked for, no barbarous severities were perpetrated; many of the attainted lords were dead, the way for reconciliation was open for the living. Pope Pius II on the 22nd of March, 1462, wrote to congratulate the new king on his accession⁶. The royal success had been so great as almost to dispense with new cruelties. It would have been well if the policy thus foreshadowed could have been carried into effect. Royal speech in prorogation. It must be remembered that Edward was not yet twenty, and that he had been fairly well educated and trained; he was not the voluptuary that he afterwards became, and he was under the influence of the Nevilles, who, whatever their faults may have been, were wise enough to see the importance of moderation. The king's character did not stand the test to which it was from this time subjected, but he need not be regarded as intentionally false now because in after-life he became a tyrant. Favourable omens.

357. The Lancastrian cause might have seemed desperate, but Margaret knew no despair. In Scotland first, and then in

¹ Rot. Parl. v. 483.

² Ib. v. 486.

³ Ib. v. 487 sq.; Statutes, ii. 389.

⁴ Rot. Parl. v. 487.

⁵ Ib. v. 488: the Convocation of Canterbury granted a tenth on the 21st of July, 1462; Wilkins, Conc. iii. 580.

⁶ Rymer, xi. 489.

Margaret maintains a warfare on the border. The earl of Oxford put to death, Feb. 1462.

Somerset submits.

Foreign intrigues in 1463.

Parliament of 1463-5.

France, she enlisted some sympathy for her wrongs; and on the northern border, where the Percies were strong, she maintained a stout resistance, to the final ruin of her friends. In February 1462 the earl of Oxford, on suspicion of intriguing with her, was arrested, tried before the high constable, the earl of Worcester, and beheaded with his son, a knight, and two squires¹. In March Somerset arrived in Scotland, and undertook the command whilst the Queen went to France². In the summer the border castles fell; in the late autumn Margaret recovered them; in November and December the king retook them again, and admitted Somerset to peace and favour³; early in 1463 Bamborough and Alnwick were again in Lancastrian hands. The politicians of both parties, in the summer of this year, went abroad to canvass for new allies. The duke of Burgundy was courted by both, and in his magnificent way listened to both. To Margaret he gave money, with bishop Neville he negotiated a truce. In the meantime money was required for the maintenance of the government. The convocation had indeed made its grant in 1462, and Edward had done his best to disarm the clerical opposition by granting on November 2 the same year⁴ letters patent which guaranteed the confirmation of ecclesiastical privilege. But the lay estates were as yet untaxed. To raise supplies a new parliament met on the 29th of April, 1463, which sat by virtue of several prorogations, at Westminster and York, until the year 1465⁵. The Rolls preserve little record of its transactions beyond a few trade petitions, an act of resumption, and the attainder of those enemies who incurred the guilt of treason during its continuance⁶. It showed however towards Edward an amount of confidence which must have been based either on fear or on hope, for it could not have been ¹ The earl, his son Aubrey, Sir Thomas Todenham, and two esquires were beheaded; Gregory, p. 218; Chron. Lond. p. 142; W. Worc. p. 779.

² Gregory, Chr. pp. 219, 221; W. Worc. p. 779; Paston Letters, ii. 131.

³ W. Worc. p. 780. On the exact chronology of these years see an article by Mr. Perceval, in the Archæologia, xlvii. 265-294, and Mr. Plummer's notes on Fortescue, pp. 61, 62, 63. The queen went to France in April and returned about October, 1462. She sailed again to Flanders, probably in June, 1463.

⁴ Rymer, xi. 493-495; Wilkins, Conc. iii. 582.

⁵ Rot. Parl. v. 496-570. John Say was speaker.

⁶ Ib. v. 511.

the result of experience. A grant of £37,000 was made for ^{Money} the defence of the realm, to be levied in the way in which the ^{grants in} fifteenth and tenth were levied, and to be subject to the usual deduction of £6000 for the relief of decayed towns; this grant seems to show that £37,000 was the ordinary produce of a fifteenth and tenth¹. This was done in the first sitting which closed in June 1463. On meeting again in November the commons changed the form of the grant and ordered it to be levied under the name of a fifteenth and tenth². In the closing ^{Grant for} session, January 21, 1465, tunnage and poundage and the sub- ^{life in 1465.}sidy on wool were granted to the king for his life³; but this was after the battle of Hexham had made him practically supreme. By these grants the commons probably obtained the royal assent to several commercial statutes, which show that with a strong government the interests of trade were reviving, and the national development following the line which it had taken in the better days of Henry V and Henry VI. But the interest of the drama still hangs on the career of Margaret⁴, which drew near its close.

Having obtained some small help from Lewis XI, she re- ^{Renewal of}newed the struggle at the close of 1463⁵: Somerset had returned ^{warfare in} to his allegiance⁶ early in the next year; the Lancastrian host ^{1464.}entered England from the north. John Neville, lord Montague, brother of Warwick, was sent to meet the invading forces, and defeated them in two battles; at Hedgley Moor on the 25th of April, and at Hexham on the 8th or 15th of May⁷. At Hexham the duke of Somerset, the lords Roos and

¹ Rot. Parl. v. 497; Warkworth, p. 3. Convocation granted a tenth, July 23, 1463; Wilk. Conc. iii. 585, 587; and in 1464 a subsidy of sixpence in the pound for the crusade; p. 598.

² Rot. Parl. v. 498; Nov. 4.

³ Rot. Parl. v. 508.

⁴ In June 1462, at Chinon, Margaret borrowed 20,000 livres of Lewis XI to be repaid within a year after the recovery of Calais; in default of payment Calais was to be delivered to Lewis; App. D to Foed. p. 86.

⁵ It appears almost certain that Margaret, after her departure from England in 1463, remained abroad until 1470: see Perceval, Arch. xlvii. cited above, p. 204, but cf. Plummer, p. 62.

⁶ Gregory, p. 223; W. Worc. p. 781.

⁷ The exact date of the battle of Hexham is not certainly fixed. According to Gregory the march on Hexham began May 14, and on the 15th Somerset

Battle at Hexham,
May 1464.

Rewards and punishments.

George Neville made archbishop of York.

The king's marriage announced, Sept. 1464.

Disappointment of the Nevilles on Edward's
marriage.

Hungerford, and Taillebois, titular earl of Kyme, were taken. Somerset was beheaded at once, the others two days later at Newcastle¹. Other prisoners were carried to York, where the king was, tried before the constable, and executed. Montague, as a reward for his prowess, was made earl of Northumberland and endowed with the Percy estates in that county. In July Sir Ralph Grey, who had defended Alnwick against Warwick, was beheaded at Doncaster², in Edward's presence. In September bishop George Neville became archbishop of York. The point at which the fortunes of the Nevilles thus reach their zenith almost exactly coincides with the moment at which the political relations of the king and court are totally altered by his marriage. For on the 29th of September Edward proclaimed that he had been for some time married to Elizabeth, the lady Grey, or Ferrers, of Groby, a widow, and daughter of a Lancastrian lord, Richard Wydeville lord Rivers, who had been steward to the great duke of Bedford and had married Jacquetta of Luxemburg his widow.

358. Edward's marriage was signally distasteful to the Nevilles. Warwick had planned a great scheme³, according to which the king should by a fitting matrimonial alliance, connecting him with both France and Burgundy, secure the peace of Western Europe, at all events for some years. Even if that scheme failed he might fairly have looked for a politic marriage, perhaps with a daughter of his own, by which the was taken and executed (p. 224). Cf. Latin Chronicle (Camd. Soc. 1880), pp. 178, 179; Stow, and later historians. Mr. Gairdner, on the authority of the act of attainder which fixes May 8 as the day on which Somerset 'rered werre' at Hexham, places the battle on that day; Rot. Parl. v. 511.

¹ Gregory gives a synopsis of the executions: May 15, Somerset and four others at Hexham; May 17, Hungerford, Roos, and three others, at Newcastle; May 18, Sir Philip Wentworth and six others at Middleham; May 26, Sir Thomas Hussey and thirteen others at York. Sir William Taillebois, the old adversary of lord Cromwell (above, p. 150), was beheaded at Newcastle; Chr. pp. 225, 226; cf. Warkworth, notes, pp. 39, 40.

² W. Worc. p. 782; Warkworth, notes, p. 38.

³ On Warwick's policy see Kirk, Charles the Bold, i. 415, ii. 15, where it is shown that negotiations were on foot for the king's marriage with a sister of the queen of France, by which a final peace was to be secured, in 1463 and 1464, on the principle on which Suffolk had negotiated in 1444. See also Hall, Chr. p. 263; Rymer, xi. 518 sq.; Warkworth, p. 3.

newly-founded dynasty might be strengthened against the risks of a counter-restoration. All such hopes were rendered futile by the art of a woman or the infatuation of a boy. But the earl knew that he must endure his disappointment, and continued to support Edward with his counsels until his own position became intolerable. The failure of his foreign scheme did not prevent the king from securing the expulsion of the Lancastrians from France. This was one of the conditions of a truce with Lewis XI in 1465¹; they were too much disheartened to move again yet. The year 1465 passed away without disturbance; in July the unfortunate Henry was arrested whilst wandering about among his secret friends in Lancashire². The Scots had already forsaken him, and in 1464 concluded a truce for fifteen years with Edward³. He was committed to the Tower, only for a few months again to be restored to light and liberty. His mind, never strong, was probably weakened by suffering, and it is only very occasionally that a gleam of light is cast on his desolate existence. He was allowed now and then to receive visitors in the Tower. When pressed by some impertinent person to justify his usurpation, he used to answer, 'My father had been king of England, possessing his crown in peace all through his reign; and his father my grandfather had been king of the same realm. And I, when a boy in the cradle, had been without any interval crowned in peace and approved as king by the whole realm, and wore the crown for wellnigh forty years, every lord doing royal homage to me, and swearing fealty as they had done to my forefathers; so I may say with the Psalmist, "The lines are fallen unto me in a pleasant place, yea I have a goodly heritage;" "My help cometh of God, who preserveth them that are true of heart"⁴.'

Warwick continues to support him.

Capture of king Henry.

His imprisonment in the Tower.

From this moment began the contest between the earl of Warwick and the Wydvilles; a struggle which in some degree resembles the former struggle with the Beauforts, but which Rivalry between the Nevilles and the Wydvilles.

¹ W. Worc. p. 785; cf. Rymer, xi. 566, 568. The chronicler refers the truce to 1465, but the documents belong to 1466.

² W. Worc. p. 785; Warkworth, p. 5.

³ Rymer, xi. 525.

⁴ Blakman, pp. 303, 305.

Advancement of the queen's relations.

Warwick plans a marriage for his daughter with Clarence.

Conflicting foreign policy.

involves fewer points of political principle and more of mere personal rivalry. Edward was tired of the domination of the Nevilles, who, like the Percies sixty years before, seemed to be overvaluing their services and undervaluing their rewards. Warwick, like Hotspur, was a man of jealous temper and high spirit. The king, unwilling to sink into the position of a pupil or a tool, had perhaps conceived the notion, common to Edward II and Richard II, of raising up a counterpoise to the Nevilles in a circle of friends devoted to himself. From the time of the declaration of his marriage he seems to have laboured incessantly for the promotion of his wife's relations. Her father, a man of years and experience, already a baron, became in March 1466 lord treasurer¹, in the following May an earl, and in 1467 high constable of England; his eldest son Antony was already a baron in right of his wife, the heiress of lord Scales; another, John, was married in 1465 to the aged duchess of Norfolk. Of the daughters, one was married in 1464 to the heir of the Arundels, another in 1466 to the duke of Buckingham, another to the lord Grey of Ruthyn, and another to the heir of lord Herbert, the king's most confidential friend². The same year the queen's son, by her first husband, was betrothed to the heiress of the duke of Exeter, the king's niece. These marriages, especially those which connected the upstart house with the near kindred of the royal family, the Staffords and the Hollands, were very offensive to Warwick, who did not scruple to show his displeasure, and began a counter-intrigue for the marriage of one of his daughters with the duke of Clarence, the heir-presumptive to the throne³. The appointment of lord Rivers as treasurer was even more offensive, since he had been a warm partisan of the Lancastrian cause, for which also the queen's first husband had fallen. In foreign policy too the aims of Edward and Warwick were now diverging, the king making approaches to Burgundy, the earl trying to negotiate an alliance with France. On this errand Warwick was absent when Edward next met the parliament, in June 1467.

¹ W. Worc. p. 785.

² Ib. pp. 783, 785, 786.

³ Ib. p. 788.

The session was opened on the 3rd with a discourse from the bishop of Lincoln, in the absence of the chancellor¹. On the 6th the king made a declaration of his intention 'to live of his own,' and only in case of great necessity to ask the estates for an aid; and the declaration was followed up with an act of resumption, in which, although provision was made for Clarence and Warwick, archbishop Neville was not spared². On the 8th the absence of the chancellor was explained; the king and lord Herbert visited archbishop Neville in his house at Westminster, and took from him the great seal³; it was given the next day to Robert Stillington, bishop of Bath. On the day of Warwick's return, July 1, the parliament was prorogued, and did not meet again till the 12th of May, 1468⁴. Before that time Warwick's influence over the king's mind was entirely lost and his own position seriously imperilled.

Parliament
meets in June 1467.

Neville removed from the Chancery.

Prorogation
to 1468.

The French ambassadors whom he brought over in July 1467 were treated by the king with scant civility; the negotiations with Burgundy, where duke Charles had in June succeeded his father Philip, were busily pressed; and in a great council held in October it was agreed that Charles should marry the king's sister, Margaret of York⁵. Warwick, perhaps as a counter-move, urged on the project for Clarence's marriage with his daughter. Just at the same time a courier of queen Margaret was arrested by lord Herbert, and to save himself laid information against several persons as favouring the intrigues of his mistress⁶. Warwick's name was in the list, possibly placed there by Herbert and the Wydviles; although it was possible, and indeed not improbable, that in the disappointment of his foreign policy he had opened communication through Lewis XI with Margaret. Having declined to accept an invitation from the king, he was examined at Middleham by a royal messenger, and the charge was declared frivolous. But the accusation, whether based on fact or not, sank deep into his soul. Edward, feeling that there was cause for mistrust, surrounded himself

Alliance of Edward with Burgundy.

Warwick charged with intrigue with the Lancas-trians.

He is acquitted, but offended.

¹ Rot. Parl. v. 571.

² Rot. Parl. v. 572-613; W. Worc. p. 786.

³ W. Worc. p. 786; Rymer, xi. 578, 579; Warkworth, p. 3.

⁴ Rot. Parl. v. 618; W. Worc. p. 787.

⁵ W. Worc. p. 788.

⁶ W. Worc. p. 788.

Clarence adheres to Warwick.

General pacification at Coventry
in 1467.

Session of parliament in 1468.

Proposed war with France.

Money
grants.

The war delayed.

Margaret's continued efforts.

with a paid body-guard. Clarence drew off from his brother, and, following the policy of heirs-presumptive, took on every possible occasion a line opposed to that of the king. The widening of the breach was not stopped by a formal reconciliation which took place at Coventry at Christmas¹. Archbishop Neville and lord Rivers, having first adjusted their own differences, acted as mediators, and brought the king and Warwick together; Herbert and the Wydvilles were included in the pacification.

In the following spring Edward conceived himself strong enough to declare his hostility to France; and the chancellor², in opening the parliamentary session at Reading on the 12th of May, was able to announce the conclusion of treaties with Spain, Denmark, Scotland, and Brittany; the close alliance with Burgundy, which was to be cemented by the marriage of Margaret of York; and the king's intention and hopes of recovering the inheritance of his forefathers across the Channel. Edward himself spoke his mind to the lords³; if he could secure sufficient supplies he would lead his army in person. The commons welcomed the idea of a foreign war, which might, as in the days of Henry V, result in internal peace; they voted two tenths and fifteenths⁴. This done, the parliament, on the 7th of June, was dissolved. The next month the Burgundian marriage was completed⁵, and the alarm of treason and civil war revived. Seven years were to elapse before Edward could fulfil his undertaking; and before the end of the year 1468 duke Charles and king Lewis had concluded a truce⁶.

The spirits of the Lancastrians were now reviving, notwithstanding the fact that the seizure of Margaret's letters had ruined several others of her partisans, and that the lord

¹ W. Worc. p. 789.

² After several formal prorogations the parliament met at Reading, May 12; Rot. Parl. v. 622. Convocation, May 12, 1468, granted a tenth and a subsidy of the priests' noble; Wilk. Conc. iii. 606; Chron. Abbrev. p. 12.

³ W. Worc. p. 789.

⁴ Rot. Parl. v. 623; Chron. Abbrev. p. 21.

⁵ W. Worc. p. 789; Paston Letters, ii. 317-319.

⁶ W. Worc. p. 792.

Herbert, after defeating Jasper Tudor, earl of Pembroke, had succeeded at last in taking Harlech. On both occasions some few executions followed. Herbert was made earl of Pembroke in the place of the defeated Tudor. Earl Jasper's rising was probably part of a scheme in accordance with which Margaret, with the forces she had raised in France, was to land on the south coast. To repel this attack the lords Scales and Mountjoy were sent to the Isle of Wight with a fleet and five thousand men. The threat of invasion was a mere bravado; the expedition of lord Scales cost £18,000, one quarter of the grant made for the French war. Edward's devotion to the advancement of the Wydviles took this year the curious form of an attempt to force his brother-in-law Richard into the office of prior of S. John's, Clerkenwell, the head of the Knights Hospitallers of England¹.

Threatened attack on the south coast.

The next year witnessed the renewal of the civil war. The Lancastrian party in the north had been suffered to gather strength, and had been more than encouraged by the attitude of Warwick. Since 1466 the relics of earl Thomas of Lancaster had been sweating blood and working miracles². Margaret and her agents had been active abroad. The king's popularity was gradually vanishing, as the more active politicians found every prize lavished on the Wydviles, and the more apathetic mass of the nation discovered that the peace and security of life and property were no better cared for under the new dynasty than they had been under the old³. But there was not yet any concert between the two sections of the disaffected; the struggle of 1469 was carried on by the Nevilles and Clarence for their own ends; in 1470 the Lancastrians took advantage of the situation to ally themselves with them for the purpose of a restoration. The rebellion of Robin of Redesdale was an attempt to employ against Edward IV the weapons used in the Kentish rising of 1450 under Jack Cade. The insurrection had begun in Yorkshire in consequence of a quarrel about

Renewal of war in 1469.

General
discontent.

Parties in 1469.

¹ W. Worc. pp. 791, 792.

² Chron. Abbrev. (Camb. Antiq. Soc.) p. 10.

³ See Warkworth, p. 12

Rising of the commons of the north under Robin of Redesdale.

Marriage of Clarence.

Manifesto of the commons under Robin of Redesdale.

The Nevilles support the demand for reform.

tithes, and the leader, Robert Huldurn or Hilyard, had been defeated and put to death by Montague. A knight of the house of Conyers then assumed the name of Robin of Redesdale, and placed himself at the head of the discontented commons of the north. He collected forces and began to traverse the country as an agitator in the summer of 1469; possibly at the suggestion, certainly with the connivance, of Warwick. The outbreak seems to have taken the king altogether by surprise, but he was not long left in doubt as to its importance. Soon after midsummer the earl of Warwick, archbishop Neville, and Clarence, went over to Calais, and the archbishop married the duke to his niece, Isabella Neville. Early in July the commons, to the number of sixty thousand, rose under Robin of Redesdale and published a manifesto in the form of an address to the king¹. In this document, after recounting the mistakes which had proved fatal to Edward II, Richard II, and Henry VI, the alienation of the near kinsmen of the king from his councils and the promotion of favourites, the heavy taxation, and the maladministration of the law, they enumerate the great estates in the royal hands and charge the king with extravagant gifts made to the Wydviles, dishonest dealing with the coinage, excessive taxation, extortion by purveyance, and perversion of the law of treason; they add that he has by the bad advice of the same counsellors embezzled the papal dues, forbidden the due execution of the laws, and removed his wisest advisers from the council. They therefore pray for the punishment of the evil counsellors, the regulation of the royal expenditure and revenue, the prohibition of gifts of crown lands, the devotion of tunnage and poundage to the defence of the seas, and the maintenance of the laws of king Edward III. This comprehensive bill of articles was circulated among the lords; Clarence, whose marriage took place on the 11th of July, and the Nevilles with him, vouchsafed their approval, and on the 12th proclaimed that they would be at Canterbury to meet their friends on the following Sunday². The king had three days before, on the ¹ Warkworth, notes, pp. 47-51; Chronicles of the White Rose, pp. 222-224; Chron. Abbrev. p. 13.

² The manifesto of Clarence and Warwick against Edward is in the 9th of July, sent them orders from Nottingham to come to him at once¹. On the 26th of July William Herbert, earl of Pembroke, and Humfrey Stafford of Southwick, the newly-created earl of Devonshire, were beaten by Robin of Redesdale, at Edgescote, near Banbury; Pembroke was taken and sent to Northampton, where he was soon after beheaded by the order of Clarence; lord Rivers and his son John, who were captured in Gloucestershire, shared the same fate; and the earl of Devonshire, who was taken by the commons in Somersetshire, was also beheaded. Edward, left alone in the midst of a hostile country, surrendered himself as a prisoner to archbishop Neville, who carried him off first to Coventry, and then to Middleham². The victorious lords do not seem to have known what to do with their prisoner. After making some conditions with the Nevilles, he was allowed to resume his liberty, and returned to London³, where before Christmas he issued a general pardon, in which they were included⁴. The effort of the commons was only a spasmodic undertaking; like the other risings of the kind, it subsided as quickly as it had arisen, and, if Robin of Redesdale's host were to any extent composed of Lancastrians, they had risen too soon. The too sudden reconciliation of the lords was an evil sign, and, whilst Warwick and Clarence were pardoned, Robin of Redesdale vanished altogether. But the throne was not secure; and Warwick had perhaps yielded only to gain time. In March, 1470, Sir Robert Welles rose in Lincolnshire, and Edward, after cruelly and treacherously beheading lord Welles, father of the rebel chief, by a sudden display of craft and energy summarily overthrew him near

Battle of Edgescote,
July 26, 1469.

Edward a prisoner.

He makes terms with Warwick.

Pardon at Christmas, 1469.

Rebellion in Lincolnshire in March 1470.

Chronicles of the White Rose, p. 219; Warkworth, notes, p. 46. See also Chr. Abbrev. p. 13.

¹ Paston Letters, ii. 360, 361.

² The dates of these transactions are very obscure. The king's detention must have covered the month of August. On August 17 he appointed Warwick chief justice of South Wales; Rymer, xi. 648; and he was at Middleham on the 25th and 28th; on Michaelmas Day he was at York; and on the 27th of October, Henry Percy heir of Northumberland swore fealty to him at Westminster; Rymer, xi. 648; Cont. Hardyng, p. 443; Hall, p. 275; cf. Warkworth, p. 7; Cont. Croyland, p. 555.

³ Paston Letters, ii. 389; and Mr. Gairdner's notes, ib. p. xlix.

⁴ Warkworth (p. 7) states that a fifteenth was collected at the same time.

Stamford. After the battle the king found unmistakeable proof that Warwick and Clarence, whom he seems still to have trusted¹, were implicated in the transactions. Sir Robert, before he was executed, confessed that the object of the rebels was to make Clarence king². He was beheaded on the 13th of March; on the 23rd³ Edward issued a proclamation against his brother and Warwick, who, having failed to find help in Lancashire, and to effect a landing at Southampton, had fled to France. In France they were brought into communication with queen Margaret, and Warwick in all sincerity undertook to bring about a new revolution; Clarence probably contemplating his chance of recovering his brother's good-will by betraying his father-in-law.

Warwick
and Clarence fly to France.

Design of Margaret and Warwick.

Warwick
lands, Sept.
1470.

Flight of Edward and restoration of Henry VI.

Henry's
parliament, November
1470.

The design was rapidly ripened. On the 13th of September Warwick landed at Dartmouth; Edward, finding himself forsaken by the marquess of Montague, Warwick's brother⁴, fled to Flanders on the 3rd of October; on the 5th archbishop Neville and bishop Waynflete took Henry VI from the Tower; queen Elizabeth took sanctuary at Westminster; the earl of Worcester, Edward's constable and the minister of his cruelties, was taken and beheaded⁵. The nation without regret and without enthusiasm recognised the Lancastrian restoration. On the 9th of October writs for the election of coroners and verderers, and on the 15th the summons for parliament, were issued in Henry's name⁶. On the 26th of November Henry was made to hold his parliament; no formal record of its proceedings is preserved, but the writs of summons show that

¹ Paston Letters, ii. 394, 395; Rymer, xi. 652.

² The confession of Sir Robert Welles is printed in the Excerpta Historica, pp. 283 sq.

³ Rymer, xi. 654; Warkworth, notes, pp. 53-56; see also Rot. Parl. vi. 233.

⁴ John Neville, who had been made earl of Northumberland in 1465, had had to restore the Percy estates in 1470, and was then made marquess of Montague.

⁵ Paston Letters, ii. 412. Tiptoft hanged the prisoners taken at Southampton in 1470, and impaled their bodies; Leland, Coll. ii. 502; cf. Warkworth, p. 9.

⁶ Lords' Report, iv. 976; Rymer, xi. 661 sq. The period of restoration, 'readeptio regiae potestatis,' or forty-ninth year of Henry VI, extended from October 9, 1470, to the beginning of April 1471.

thirty-four lords were called to it, and one historian has preserved the text of the opening sermon. Archbishop Neville, who had been made chancellor, preached on the words, 'Turn, O backsliding children¹.' The crown was again settled on Henry and his son, with remainder, in case of the extinction of the house of Lancaster, to the duke of Clarence². The supreme power was lodged in the hands of Warwick, who according to contemporary writers was made lieutenant or governor of the realm, with Clarence as his associate³. The attainders passed in Edward's parliaments were then repealed, and in consequence, early in 1471, the dukes of Somerset and Exeter and the earls of Pembroke and Richmond returned to England.

*Acts of the parliament
of 1470.*

The collapse of Edward's power was so complete, that for some weeks neither he nor his enemies contemplated the chance of a restoration. The Nevilles disbanded their forces, and Edward scarcely hoped for more than the recovery of his paternal estates. For Henry it was impossible to excite any enthusiasm; he had never been popular: five years of captivity, calumny, squalour, and neglect had made him an object of contempt. Yet the royal name had great authority, and whoever claimed it seemed to have the power of calling large forces into the field; and men fought as if to preserve their own lives or to satiate their thirst for blood, with little regard to the banner under which they were marshalled. As for the maintenance of the common weal, the nation was now fully persuaded that there was little to choose between the weak government of Henry and the strong government of Edward; both alike allowed the real exercise of power to become a mere prize for contending factions among the nobles: the laws were no better administered, the taxes were no lighter, under the one than under the other. They accepted Henry as their king

No great enthusiasm for either king.

¹ Warkworth, p. 12. No returns to the Commons are found.

² This act of the parliament is known only by the rehearsal in the act of 1478 which repealed it; Rot. Parl. vi. 191-193.

³ Hall, p. 286. The writer of the account of Edward's return (White Rose, p. 36) speaks of him as 'calling himself lieutenant of England by pretended authority of the usurper Henry and his accomplices.'

at Warwick's behest; they would accept Edward again the moment he proved himself the stronger. There were local attachments and personal antipathies no doubt, but the body politic was utterly exhausted, or, if beginning to recover from exhaustion, was too weak and tender to withstand the slightest blast or to endure the gentlest pressure. Margaret and her son too were absent, and did not arrive until the chances were decided against them.

Edward's return in March, 1471.

In March 1471 Edward, who had obtained a small force from his brother-in-law of Burgundy, sailed for England and, after being repulsed from the coast of Norfolk, landed in Yorkshire on the 14th, at the very port at which Henry IV had landed in 1399. As if the name of the place suggested the politic course, he followed the example of Henry IV, solemnly declaring that he was come to reclaim his duchy only. At York he acknowledged the right of Henry VI and the prince of Wales¹. But at Nottingham he proclaimed himself king; he then moved on by Leicester to Coventry, where Warwick and Montague were. Deceived by a letter from Clarence², they allowed him to pass by without a battle, and he advanced, gathering strength at every step, to Warwick, where Clarence joined him. On the 11th of April he reached London. Henry, under the guidance of Archbishop Neville, had attempted to rouse the citizens to resistance, but had completely failed. Edward, on the other hand, was received with open arms by archbishop Bourchier and the faithful Yorkists. On the 13th he marched out of London, with Henry in his train, to meet Warwick. He encountered him at Barnet the next day, Easter day, and totally defeated him. Warwick himself and Montague were killed in the battle or in the rout.

He gains
London.

Battle of Barnet,
April 14, 1471.

Margaret lands.

The same day Margaret and her son landed at Weymouth, and, as soon as the fate of Warwick was known, she gathered the remnant of her party round her and marched towards the north. On the 4th of May Edward encountered her ill-disciplined army at Tewkesbury, and routed them with great ¹ Warkworth, p. 14; Fleetwood, Chr. White Rose, pp. 40-42.

² Paston Letters, ii. 423; Warkworth, p. 15; Fleetwood, p. 50.

slaughter. No longer checked by the more politic influence of Warwick, the king both in the battle and after it gave full play to his lust for revenge. The young prince, Thomas Courtenay the loyal earl of Devonshire, and lord Wenlock were killed on the field; the duke of Somerset, the prior of the Hospitallers, and a large number of knights were beheaded after the battle, in spite of a promise of pardon. Queen Margaret, the princess of Wales, and Sir John Fortescue were among the prisoners¹.

Battle of Tewkesbury,
May 4. 1471.

Edward's danger was not yet quite over. On the 5th of May the bastard of Fauconberg, Thomas Neville, Warwick's cousin and vice-admiral, who had landed in Kent, reached London, and, having failed to force an entrance, passed on to cut the king off on his return. But his force, although large, was disheartened by the news from Tewkesbury; and, persuaded by the promises of immunity, he deserted them and fled. Edward, with thirty thousand men under his command, on the 21st of May re-entered London in triumph². The same night king Henry died in the Tower, where he had been replaced after the battle of Barnet. Both at the time and after, the duke of Gloucester was regarded as his murderer; and, although nothing certain is known of the circumstances of his death, it is most probable that he was slain secretly. So long as his son lived, his life was valuable to his foes; the young Edward might, as claimant of the crown, have obtained from the commons an amount of support which they would not give to his father, whom they had tried and found wanting. Now that the son was gone, Henry himself was worse than useless, and he died. On Wednesday, the 22nd of May, his body lay in state at S. Paul's and Blackfriars, and on Ascension day he was carried off to be buried at Chertsey³. Almost immediately he began to be regarded as a saint and martyr⁴. In Yorkshire especially, where he had wandered in his desolation, and where

The bastard of Fauconberg.

Death of Henry VI.

Honour shown to him after death.

¹ Warkworth, pp. 18, 19.

² Warkworth, p. 21; Fleetwood, pp. 86-92.

³ Warkworth, p. 21; Fleetwood, pp. 93 sq.

⁴ 'Unde et agens tyranni, patiensque gloriosi martyris titulum mereatur;' Cont. Croyl. p. 566.

the house of Lancaster was immemorially regarded as the guardian of national liberties, he was revered with signal devotion, a devotion stimulated not a little by the misrule that followed the crowning victory of Edward. For this was the last important attempt made during Edward's life to unseat the new dynasty. The seizure of St. Michael's Mount by the earl of Oxford in September 1473 was a gallant exploit, but led to nothing; he had to surrender in February 1474. In 1475 Margaret was ransomed by her father and went home. The existence of the son of Margaret Beaufort, the destined restorer of the greatness of England, was the solitary speck that clouded the future of the dynasty, and, although Edward saw the importance of getting him into his power, he was too young and insignificant to be a present danger. The birth of a son, born to queen Elizabeth in the Sanctuary in 1470, was an element of new promise. Edward had no more to fear and everything to hope.

Exploit of the earl of Oxford.

Present security of Edward IV.

Character of Warwick.

Warwick, whose death afforded the real security for these anticipations of better times, has always occupied a great place in the view of history; and his character, although in some respects only an exaggeration of the common baronial type, certainly contained some elements of greatness. He was greedy of power, wealth and influence; jealous of all competitors, and unscrupulous in the measures he took to gain these ends. He was magnificent in his expenditure, and popular in consequence. He was a skilful warrior both by land and by sea, and good-fortune in battle gave him another claim to be a national favourite. He was a far-seeing politician too, and probably, if Edward had suffered him, would have secured such a settlement of the foreign relations of England as might have anticipated the period of national recovery of which Henry VII obtained the credit. He was unrelenting in his enmities, but not wantonly blood-thirsty or faithless: from the beginning of the struggle, when he was a very young man and altogether under his father's influence, he had taken up with ardour the cause of duke Richard, and his final defection was the result of a profound conviction that Edward, influenced by the Wydviles, was bent on his ruin. He filled however for many years, and not altogether unworthily, a place which never before or after was filled by a subject, and his title of King-maker was not given without reason. But it is his own singular force of character, decision and energy, that mark him off from the men of his time. He is no constitutional hero; he comes perhaps hardly within the ken of constitutional history, but he had in him the makings of a great king.

359. The cruelties and extortions which followed Edward's victory need not detain us, although they fill up the records of the following years. By executions and exactions he made the nation feel the burdens of undivided and indivisible allegiance. 'The rich were hanged by the purse and the poor by the neck.' What forfeiture failed to secure was won by extorted ransoms. In April 1472 archbishop Neville, who had made his peace after the battle of Barnet, was despoiled of his wealth; he spent the rest of his life in captivity or mortified retirement. The estates, which were not called together until October 1472¹, were in too great awe of the king to venture on any resistance to his commands. They granted him a force of thirteen thousand archers, to be paid at the rate of sixpence a day for a year; and the commons and lords, in two separate indentures, directed that a new and complete tenth of all existing property and income should be collected to defray the cost². In 1473, when they met again after a prorogation, they found that the tax could not be easily got in, and voted a fifteenth and tenth of the old kind, on account³. The same year Edward began to collect the contributions which were so long and painfully familiar under the inappropriate name of Benevolences⁴; a triumph.

Results of Edward's

Fate of archbishop Neville.

Parliamentary history.

Benevo-
lences.

¹ Parliament met Oct. 6, and sat till Nov. 30; sat again Feb. 8, 1473, to April 8; Oct. 6 to Dec. 13; in 1474, Jan. 20 to Feb. 1; May 9 to May 28; June 6 to July 18; and in 1475, Jan. 23 to March 14; when it was dissolved. William Alyngton was speaker; Rot. Parl. vi. 1-166. See Cont. Croyl. pp. 557, 558.

² Rot. Parl. vi. 4-8.

³ Ib. vi. 39-41.

⁴ Cont. Croyl. p. 558; 'nova et inaudita impositio muneris ut per benevolentiam quilibet daret id quod vellet, immo verius quod nollet.' 'This year the king asked of the people, great goods of their benevolence;' Chr. Lond. p. 145: 'he conceived a new device in his imagination;' Hall, p. 308, where an amusing account is given of Edward's selling his kisses for a benevolence of twenty pounds.

Large grants in parliament.

Mercantile legislation.

Fortescue and Morton.

Jealousy of Clarence and Gloucester.

The chancellor and treasurer.

method of extortion worse than even the forced loans and blank charters of Richard II. In the following October an act of resumption was passed¹; in July 1474 the same parliament, still sitting by prorogation, voted a tenth and fifteenth, with an additional sum of £51,147 4s. 7 $\frac{3}{4}$ d., to be raised from the sources from which the tenth and fifteenth were levied²; the payment was accelerated in the following January; and in March 1475, after another grant of a tenth and fifteenth, this long parliament was dissolved³. Besides the details of taxation, the parliamentary records have little to show but mercantile enactments, private petitions, acts of settlement of estates, attainders and reversals of attainders, and a few points of parliamentary privilege. Of the restorations the most significant are that of Sir John Fortescue⁴, who was pardoned in 1473 on condition that he should refute his own arguments for the title of the Lancastrian kings, and that of Dr. John Morton⁵, a faithful Lancastrian partisan who had been attainted in 1461, and who in 1472 obtained not only the annulment of his sentence but the office of master of the rolls, and in 1473 was even made keeper of the great seal. The court was disturbed by the jealousies of the king's brothers, who were scarcely more jealous of the Wydvilles than of each other; Richard with great difficulty obtained the hand and part of the inheritance of the lady Anne Neville, Warwick's daughter and prince Edward's widow. The great seal, after some unimportant changes, rested in the hands of Thomas Rotherham, afterwards archbishop of York⁶; in the treasury the earl of Essex, Henry Bourchier, retained his position from 1471 until the close of the reign. The period is otherwise obscure; the national restoration was impeded by a severe visitation of the plague;

¹ Rot. Parl. vi. 71 sq.; Cont. Croyl. p. 559.

² Rot. Parl. vi. 111-119; Warkworth, p. 23.

³ Rot. Parl. vi. 120, 149-153.

⁵ Ib. vi. 26.

⁴ Ib. vi. 69.

⁶ Bishop Stillington was chancellor from 1467 to 1473; Morton and the earl of Essex were keepers in June and July, 1473; Lawrence Booth, bishop of Durham, July 27, 1473, to May 25, 1474; after which date Thomas Rotherham became chancellor, and held the seal until the end of the reign. See Cont. Croyl. p. 557; Rymer, xi. 782.

and the king's attention, so far as it was not engaged by his own pleasures and the quarrels of his brothers, was devoted to the preparation for his great adventure, the expedition to France in 1475.

This expedition, which had been contemplated so long and came to so little, was intended to vindicate the claim of the king of England to the crown of France,—the worn-out claim of course which had been invented by Edward III. The policy of alliance with Burgundy had culminated in July 1474 in a league for the deposition of Lewis XI. In July 1475 Edward and his army landed at Calais. It was the finest army that England had ever sent to France, but it found the French better prepared than they had ever been to receive it. The duke of Burgundy was engaged in war on the Rhine; Lewis knew an easier way of securing France than fighting battles. Instead of a struggle, a truce for seven years was the result; this was concluded on the 29th of August. The two kings met, with a grating of trellis-work between them, on the bridge of Pecquigny¹; and Edward returned home richer by a sum of 75,000 crowns and a promised pension of 50,000. And England, which had allowed a dynasty to be overthrown because of the loss of Maine and Anjou, bore the shame without a blush or a pang².

Expedition to France, July, 1475.

Lewis buys off Edward.

The history of 1476 is nearly a blank; the jealousy of Clarence and Gloucester probably increased; the king failed to obtain the surrender of the earl of Richmond by the duke of Brittany; the duke of Burgundy was ruining himself in his attack on the Swiss³. In 1477 Clarence, unable to endure Behaviour of Clarence.

¹ Cont. Croyl. p. 558; Rymer, xii. 14-20. The prince of Wales was left at home as custos.

² The Crowland annalist attributes to Edward a great show of vigorous justice at this time, adding that but for his severity there would have been a rebellion, so great was the discontent felt at the waste of treasure: 'tantus crevisset numerus populorum conquerentium super male dispensatis regni divitiis, et abrasso de omnium scriniis tanto thesauro tam inutiliter consumpto, ut nesciretur quorum consiliariorum capita incolumia remanerent, eorum praesertim qui familiaritate muneribusve Gallici regis inducti pacem modis supradictis initam persuasissent;' p. 559. See Davies, Municipal Records of York, pp. 50-52.

³ Charles the Bold fell at Nancy, Jan. 5, 1477. There was a great council, 'to whyche alle the astats off the londe shall com to,' begun the ascendancy of Gloucester, quitted the court. He had lost his wife in 1476, as he suspected, by poison, and had gone beyond the rights of his legal position in exacting punishment from the suspected culprits¹. A series of petty squabbles ended in a determination of the ruling party at court to get rid of him. In a parliament which met on the 16th of January, 1478², Edward himself acting as the accuser, he was attainted, chiefly on the ground of his complicity with the Lancastrians in 1470³; the bill was approved by the commons; and on the 7th of February order was given for his execution, the duke of Buckingham being appointed high steward for the occasion⁴. How he actually perished is uncertain, but he was dead before the end of the month, and the Wydevilles received a large share of the forfeitures. Clarence was a weak, vain, and faithless man; he had succeeded to some part of Warwick's popularity, and had, in the minds of those who regarded as valid the acts of the Lancastrian parliament of 1470, a claim to be the constitutional king. If his acts condemn him, it is just to remember that the men with whom he was matched were Edward IV and Richard III. The particular question of his final guilt affects his character as little and as much as it affects theirs.

The parliament had probably been called for this express purpose; the chancellor, who had opened it with a discourse on the first verse of the twenty-third Psalm, had illustrated his thesis with examples, drawn from both Testaments, of the punishments due to broken fealty. Besides the formal declaration, which was now made, of the nullity of the acts of the Lancastrian parliament⁵, two or three exchanges of estates were ratified, and some few attainders reversed. George

Feb. 13, 1477; it seems to have been employed on foreign affairs; Paston Letters, iii. 173.

¹ Rot. Parl. vi. 173.

² Ib. vi. 167. The chancellor's text was 'The Lord is my shepherd;' the application 'He beareth not the sword in vain.' William Alyngton was again speaker. We learn from the York records that this parliament sat from Jan. 16 to Feb. 26; the representatives of that city receiving wages for forty-two days of session and twelve more going and returning; Davies, York Records, p. 66.

³ Rot. Parl. vi. 193-195; Cont. Croyl. p. 560.

⁴ Rot. Parl. v. 195.

⁵ Ib. vi. 191, 192.

Clarence accused and attainted
in 1478.

His death.

Parliament
of 1478.

Neville, son of the marquess of Montague, who had been created duke of Bedford, and had been intended to marry the king's eldest daughter, was deprived of his titles on the ground that he had no fortune to maintain them¹; his father's estates had been secured to the king's brothers. The statutes which were passed were of the usual commercial type. The session must have been a very short one, and no money was asked for. The convocation, which under the influence of archbishop Bourchier was more amenable to royal pressure, was made to bestow a tenth in the following April². Edward was growing rich by mercantile speculations of his own; and, complaisant as the parliament might have proved, there was a chance that the military failure of 1475 might be subjected to too close inspection if any large demand were made from the assembled estates³. No parliament was called for the next five years, and the intervening period, so far as constitutional history is concerned, is absolutely without incident. The quarrels of the court did not extend beyond the inner circle around the king. He continued to heap favours on the Wydviles, and to throw military and administrative work on Gloucester. Considerable efforts were made during the time to enforce the measures necessary for internal peace; frequent assizes were held, and as of old, when the sword of justice was sharpened⁴, the receipts of the Treasury increased; obsolete statutes and customs were made to produce a harvest of fines, and ancient debts were recovered. But neither the rigour of the courts nor the extortions, which the rising prosperity of the country was well able to bear, seem to have damaged Edward's popularity. He remained until his death a favourite with the people of London and the great towns; and his reign, full as its early days had been of violence and oppression, drew to its close with no unfavourable omens for his successor. The troubled state of

Edward grows rich.

Edward's judicial activity.

He retains his popularity.

¹ Rot. Parl. vi. 173. ² Wilkins, Conc. iii. 612. ³ Cont. Croyl. p. 559.

⁴ In his nineteenth year Edward 'began, more than he was before accustomed, to search out the penal offences, as well of the chief of his nobility as of other gentlemen . . . by reason whereof it was of all men adjudged . . . that he would prove hereafter a sore and an extreme prince amongst his subjects . . . he should say, that all men should stand and live in fear of him and he to be unbridled and in doubt of no man;' Hall, p. 329.

Gloucester engaged in Scottish warfare.

Lewis cajoles and disappoints the king.

Edward's last parliament, in 1483.

Scotland furnished employment for Gloucester from 1480 onwards; Edward had undertaken the cause of the duke of Albany against his nephew James III; and Albany had promised, if he were successful, to hold Scotland as a fief of the English crown¹. The great exploit of the war, the seizure of Edinburgh in 1482, was the joint work of Gloucester and Albany; the funds were raised by recourse to benevolences²; the establishment of relays of couriers to carry dispatches between the king and his brother is regarded as the first attempt at a postal system in England, and as one of the main benefits which entitle the house of York to the gratitude of posterity³. With France the king's relations continued to be friendly, but the cordiality of the newly-formed alliance quickly cooled; Lewis found that he did not need Edward; Edward tried hard to think that he was not duped. Towards the close of 1482 the marriage between the king's daughter Elizabeth and the dauphin, which had been one of the articles of the peace of Pecquigny, was broken off by Lewis himself; who on the 22nd of January 1483⁴ ratified the contract for the betrothal of his son to Margaret of Austria. Edward felt this as a personal insult, and the failure of all his negotiations for the marriage of his children with foreign princes contributed no doubt to his mortification, if it did not suggest that, great as his power and prosperity were, he was regarded by the kings of Europe as somewhat of an outlaw. It was probably with some intention of avenging himself on Lewis XI that on the 15th of November 1482 he called together his last parliament. It met on the 20th of the following January⁵. The chancellor's

¹ Rymer, xii. 156-158.

² Cont. Croyl. p. 562. The York records furnish some indications that other methods of exaction were practised. The king had issued letters for the collection of a force to join in the expedition to Scotland; forty persons were to be maintained by the Ainsty, eighty by the city; the money required was to be collected in each parish by the constables, the portion unspent to be returned; Davies, pp. 115, 116, 128. This seems very like the worst form of commission of array. See also Rymer, xii. 117.

³ Cont. Croyl. p. 571.

⁴ Ib. p. 563; Communes, liv. 6. c. 9.

⁵ Rot. Parl. vi. 196; John Wood was the speaker. See Davies, York Records, p. 138; Cont. Croyl. p. 563.

sermon, the text of which was 'Dominus illuminatio mea et salus mea,' has not been preserved; so that it is impossible to say whether the renewal of the war with France was distinctly proposed to the estates. The truce of 1475 had been in 1477 changed into a truce for life¹; but both the amount and character of the money grants now made in parliament prove that a speedy outbreak was expected. For the hasty and necessary defence of the realm, the commons voted a fifteenth and a tenth², and on the 15th of February, three days later, they re-imposed the tax on aliens³. In the expectation of war the commons seem to have attempted to make their voices heard; they prayed for the enforcement of the statutes which maintained the public peace, the statutes of Westminster and Winchester, and the legislation on liveries, labourers and beggars⁴. It was possibly to disarm opposition, possibly to secure the provision for his sons and brother and the Wydvilles, that the king agreed to pass an act of resumption⁵ and to accept an assignment of £11,000 for the maintenance of the household. A few months however were to show how little foresight he possessed, and to break up all his schemes. His constitution was ruined with debauchery: whether the failure of his foreign policy, as foreign writers believed, or the natural consequences of dissipation, as the English thought, finally broke him down, he died somewhat suddenly on the 9th of April, leaving his young family to be the prey of the contending factions which had long divided the court.

Preparation for war.

Petitions for maintenance of order.

Death of the king April 1483.

Edward IV was not perhaps quite so bad a man or so bad a king as his enemies have represented: but even those writers who have laboured hardest to rehabilitate him, have failed to

Character of Edward IV.

¹ Rymer, xii. 46. The truce was to last during the joint lives of Edward and Lewis and for a year after the death of the one who died first.

² Rot. Parl. vi. 197. The Crowland historian says, 'nihil adhuc tamen a communitate subsidii pecuniarii expetere ausus, erga praelatos necessitates suas non dissimulat, blande exigendo ab eis prae manibus decimas quae proximo concedentur, quasi, semel comparentibus praelatis et clero in convocatione, quicquid rex petit id fieri debeat;' p. 563. A tenth was granted by the clergy in 1481, and another in April, 1483, after the king's death; Wilk. Conc. iii. 614; Wake, pp. 380, 381.

³ Rot. Parl. vi. 197.

⁴ Ib. vi. 198.

⁵ Ib. vi. 198, 199.

discover any conspicuous merits. With great personal courage he may be freely credited; he was moreover eloquent, affable, and fairly well educated. He had a definite plan of foreign policy, and, although he was both lavish in expenditure and extortionate in procuring money, he was a skilful merchant. He had, or professed to have, some love of justice in the abstract, which led him to enforce the due execution of law where it did not interfere with the fortunes of his favourites or his own likes and dislikes. He was to some extent a favourer of learned men; he made some small benefactions to houses of religion and devotion, and he did not entirely root up the collegiate foundations of his predecessors of the house of Lancaster. But that is all: he was as a man vicious far beyond any king that England had seen since the days of John; and more cruel and bloodthirsty than any king she had ever known: he had too a conspicuous talent for extortion¹. There had been fierce deeds of bloodshed under Edward II and Edward III; cruel and secret murder under Richard II and Henry IV; the hand of Henry V had been heavy and unrelenting against the conspirators of Southampton; and at S. Alban's the house of York, and at Wakefield the house of Lancaster, had sown fresh seeds for a fatal harvest. But Edward IV far outdid all that his forefathers and his enemies together had done. The death of Clarence was but the summing up and crowning act of an unparalleled list of judicial and extra-judicial cruelties which those of the next reign supplement but do not surpass.

Cruelties and bloodshed.

360. Edward IV, by the strength of his popularity, the force of his will, and his ruthless extinction of every kind of resistance, had been able for the last few years to keep his court at peace. The Wydvilles were not more beloved by the elder nobility than they had been by the Nevilles, and had done little to secure the position to which Edward had raised them. The queen's brothers, Antony Earl of Rivers, Lionel bishop of Salisbury, and Edward and Richard

State of the court at the time of Edward's
death.

¹ 'Tantum omnium memoriam esse ut omnium pene hominum per comitatus regni dispersorum, si in patriis ubi degebant etiam in conditione vincti alicujus compoti erant, nomina et fortunae sibi tanquam eos quotidie prospicienti innotescerent;' Cont. Croyl. p. 564.

Wydville, with her sons, Thomas Grey marquess of Dorset, The Wyd-villes and Greys. and Sir Richard Grey, formed a little phalanx, strong in union and fidelity, in the support of the queen and in the influence which Edward's favour had won for them; but to any cause that might depend on them alone they were a source of danger rather than a safeguard. The lords of the council, The council. among whom the chief were the lords Hastings, Stanley and Howard, were personally faithful to the king and the house of York, but were kept on friendly terms with the Wydvilles only by the king's influence. Somewhat outside The great officers of state. these parties were the duke of Gloucester, whose interests up to this point had been one with Edward's; Henry Stafford duke of Buckingham, the head of the line which represented Thomas of Woodstock; and the duke of Suffolk, who had married the king's sister. Of these lord Hastings was the The ministers. captain of Calais, lord Stanley steward of the household, the duke of Gloucester great chamberlain and lord high admiral, Dorset constable of the Tower. Archbishop Rotherham was chancellor; the Earl of Essex the treasurer died a few days before the king¹. There was at the time of Edward's death no great public question dividing the nation; the treasury was well filled, and, as against France and Scotland, England was of one mind. The king's death at once broke up the unity of the court, the peace of the country, and the fortunes of the house of York.

The young Edward was keeping court at Ludlow, sur- The young king. rounded by his mother's kinsfolk, and the council which his father had assigned him as prince of Wales²; the queen was at Westminster in the midst of the jealous council of ¹ April 4. Sir John Wood was appointed treasurer of the Exchequer, May 16; Nichols, Grants &c. p. 13.

² His governor was lord Rivers, appointed Sept. 27, 1473; bishop Alcock of Worcester was the president of his council; bishop Martin of S. David's his chancellor; Sir Thomas Vaughan chamberlain; Sir William Stanley steward; Sir Richard Croft treasurer; Richard Hunt controller; Nichols, Grants of Edw. V, p. viii. Lord Rivers was an accomplished man and the patron of Caxton; and the boy's education was carefully attended to. Ordinances were drawn up by Edward IV for his son's household in 1473, which are printed among the Ordinances of the Household, pp. 25-33; and others were issued as late as 1482; Nichols, Grants &c., pp. vii, viii.

Question of guardianship.

the king; the duke of Gloucester in Yorkshire. At once the critical question arose, into whose hands the guardianship of the king and supreme influence in the kingdom should fall. The queen naturally but unwisely claimed it for herself; her son, the marquess of Dorset, seized the treasure in the Tower¹, and her brother Sir Edward Wydville attempted to secure the fleet². The council, led by lord Hastings and supported by the influence of the duke of Buckingham, would have preferred to adopt the system which had been adopted in the early days of Henry VI, and to have governed the kingdom in the king's name, with Gloucester as president or protector. The course of the deliberations is obscure, but the action of the

The king and Gloucester go to London.

parties was rapid and decisive. The king from Ludlow, the duke of Gloucester from York, set out for London; the council, knowing that Edward was in the hands of the Wydviles, forbade him to bring up with him more than two thousand men; he was to be crowned on the first Sunday in May². When Gloucester reached Northampton he met the duke of Buckingham and concerted with him the means of overthrowing the Wydviles. Fortune played into their hands; lord Rivers and Sir Richard Grey, who had been sent to them by the king, accompanied them as far as Stony Stratford where they were to meet the king; but before they entered the town they were arrested and sent into the north⁴. The news travelled rapidly, and the queen on the 1st May fled into sanctuary. Dorset and Edward Wydville took to flight. On the 4th the king and the dukes entered London. After a long session of the council, in which Hastings vainly flattered himself that he was securing the safety of the realm by supporting the claim of Gloucester, duke Richard was proclaimed

Rivers and Grey arrested.

Richard made protector,
May, 1483.

¹ On the 27th commissions were issued for collecting the alien tax; the marquess of Dorset being among the commissioners, but not Gloucester. See the 9th Report of the Deputy Keeper, App. ii. p. 7.

² Nichols, Grants &c. pp. ix, 2, 3. Orders were given to take Sir Edward and to receive all who would come in, except him and the marquess, on May 14.

³ Cont. Croyl. p. 565.

⁴ Ib.; More's Edward V (Kennett, Complete History, vol. i), p. 482.

protector of the kingdom¹. On the 13th of May, a summons was issued for Parliament to meet on June 25²; on the 16th the duke of Buckingham was made chief justice of Wales. About the same time, archbishop Rotherham was made to surrender the great seal, which was entrusted to bishop Russell of Lincoln. The coronation had already been deferred to the 22nd of June³. Parliament called.
Russell chancellor.

Whether Richard had been long laying his schemes for a usurpation, or yielded to the temptation which was suddenly put before him, and how he won over the duke of Buckingham to support him, are among the obscure questions of the time. Buckingham, when on the 16th of May he was made justiciar of Wales⁴, must even then have placed himself at Gloucester's disposal. Some time elapsed before the plot, if it were a plot, reached completeness. During this time, most probably, was concocted the claim which Richard was about to advance, and the petition on which he grounded his acceptance of the crown. A writ of supersedeas was issued to prevent the meeting of parliament⁵, and the city was filled with the armed followers of the duke⁶. When all was ready, on the 13th of June, he seized lord Hastings, who had been Richard wins the duke of Buckingham to his plans.
Parliament deferred.
Hastings beheaded.

¹ On the 14th of May the commissions of justices of the peace were issued, one of them addressed to Richard as protector. See the 9th Report of the Dep. Keeper of the Records, App. ii. p. 3; Nichols, Grants &c. p. xiii; Cont. Croyl. p. 566.

² The writ to the archbishop of Canterbury, dated May 13, is in Bouchier's Register at Lambeth and printed in Nichols, Royal Wills, p. 347. York was ordered to elect four citizens, who were chosen on the 6th of June. The writ for convocation was issued on the 16th; see Nichols, Grants &c. p. 13; on the 20th the abbot of S. Mary's, York, was excused attendance in parliament; ib. p. 18.

³ Rymer, xii. 185.

⁴ Rot. Pat. Edw. V (Report of the Deputy Keeper, ix. App. ii), p. 2. The same day he had a commission of array for the western counties; ib. p. 9; Rymer, xii. 180. The grant was renewed July 15; Rot. Pat. Ric. III, p. 12.

⁵ Davies, York Records, p. 154; the writ of supersedeas was received at York on the 21st of June. It is quite clear that the parliament was never held. See Nichols, Grants &c. pp. 12, 13. But before the writ was issued the new chancellor had prepared his speech, which is printed by Nichols, pp. xxxix-1.

⁶ Twenty thousand of Gloucester's and Buckingham's men were expected in London on the 21st of June; Exc. Hist. p. 17. See also Paston Letters, iii. 306.

summoned to the Tower to attend the king, and beheaded him at once. The two strongest prelates in the council, Rotherham and Morton¹, were then arrested and committed to the Tower, whence Morton was soon after sent off to prison in Wales. Archbishop Bourchier, now nearly eighty, proved once more his faithfulness to the stronger party, by inducing the queen to allow her younger son to join his brother in the Tower, on the 16th. On the 22nd, Richard's right to the crown was publicly declared by a preacher at S. Paul's Cross, and on the 24th the duke of Buckingham propounded the same doctrine at Guildhall². On the 25th, at Baynard's Castle, the protector received a body of lords and others, 'many and diverse lords spiritual and temporal, and other nobles and notable persons of the commons,' who in the name of the three estates presented to him a roll of parchment, with the contents of which he was no doubt already familiar. The roll contained an invitation to accept the crown; it rehearsed the ancient prosperity of England, its decay and imminent ruin owing to the influence of false counsellors; since the pretended marriage of Edward IV the constitution had been in abeyance, laws divine and human, customs, liberties and life, had been subjected to arbitrary rule, and the noble blood of the land had been destroyed; the marriage was the result of sorcery, was informally celebrated, and was illegal, Edward being already bound by a pre-contract of marriage to the lady Eleanor Butler: the children of the adulterous pair were illegitimate; the offspring of the duke of Clarence were disabled by their father's attainder from claiming the succession; the protector himself was the undoubted heir of duke Richard of York and

Richard's claim to the throne.

The crown is offered to Richard, June 25, 1483.

Illegitimacy of Edward's children.

Clarence's had suffered attaint.

¹ Exc. Hist. p. 17. Sir Thomas More (p. 485) says that Rotherham left the Great Seal in the queen's hands in the sanctuary at Westminster, and had to demand it again owing to the disturbances in London before the king's arrival.

² More gives, among many other speeches composed for this eventful drama of history, the speech of the duke of Buckingham, which contains several interesting points against Edward IV: e.g. the hanging of Burdett for a jesting word, and the deprivation of the judge who refused to sentence him; the ill-treatment of alderman Cook; the influence of Jane Shore, &c. But the speech, although worthy of study as a composition of More, is not historical.

of the crown of England; by birth and character too he was entitled to the proffered dignity. Accordingly, the petitioners proceed, they had chosen him king, they prayed him to accept the election, promised to be faithful to him and implored the divine blessing upon the undertaking¹. The petition was favourably received; resistance, if it were thought of, was impossible, for the city was full of armed men brought up from the north in Gloucester's interest. On the 26th he appeared in Westminster Hall, sat down in the marble chair, and declared his right as hereditary and elected king². Edward V ended his reign on the 25th, and, with his brother Richard, then disappears from authentic history. How long the boys lived in captivity and how they died is a matter on which legend and conjecture have been rife with no approach to certainty. Most men believed, and still believe, that they died a violent death by their uncle's order. The earl of Rivers³ and Sir Richard Grey had been executed at Pomfret a few days after the usurpation, and the new king was not strong enough to afford to be merciful.

Richard III declares himself king,
May 26, 1483.

Execution of Rivers, June.

361. It is unnecessary to attempt now anything like a sketch of Richard's character; the materials for a clear delineation are very scanty, and it has long been a favourite topic for theory and for paradox. There can however be little doubt of his great ability, of his clear knowledge of the policy which under ordinary circumstances would have secured his throne, and of the force and energy of will which, put to a righteous use, might have made for him a great name. The popularity which he had won before his accession, in Yorkshire especially, where there was no love for the house of York before, proves that he was not without the gifts which gained for Edward IV the lifelong support of the nation. The craft and unscrupulousness with which he carried into effect his great adventure, are not more remarkable than the policy and the constitutional inventiveness with character for ability.

Richard's

His popularity,

and political craft.

¹ See Rot. Parl. vi. 238, 239.

² Cont. Croyl. p. 566; Letters of Rich. III, i. 12.

³ Lord Rivers made his will on the 23rd of June; Excerpta Historica, p. 245: his obit was kept on the 25th; ib. p. 244.

Hatred of his memory.

which he concealed the several steps of his progress. Brave, cunning, resolute, clear-sighted, bound by no ties of love or gratitude, amenable to no instincts of mercy or kindness, Richard III yet owes the general condemnation, with which his life and reign have been visited, to the fact that he left none behind him whose duty or whose care it was to attempt his vindication. The house of Lancaster, to be revived only in a bastard branch, loathed him as the destroyer of the sainted king and his innocent son. The house of York had scarcely less grievance against him as the destroyer of Clarence, the oppressor of the queen, the murderer, as men said, of her sons. England, taken by surprise at the usurpation, never fully accepted the yoke. The accomplices of the crime mistrusted him from the moment they placed him on the throne. Yet viewed beside Edward IV he seems to differ rather in fortune than in desert. He might have reigned well if he could have rid himself of the entanglements under which he began to reign, or have cleared his conscience from the stain which his usurpation and its accompanying cruelties brought upon him.

Distrusted and suspected in his lifetime.

Coronation of Richard III, July 6, 1483.

The story is not a long one, for the shadows begin from the moment of his accession to deepen round the last king of the great house of Anjou. He was crowned with his wife, the surviving daughter of the King-maker, on the 6th of July¹. Archbishop Bouchier, who was to crown his successor, placed the diadem on his head. Rotherham too had already submitted and been released. Of his chief advisers, Buckingham had received his reward, and was made on the 15th of July lord high constable; Howard on the 28th of June had been made duke of Norfolk and earl marshal², the earldom of Nottingham being bestowed on lord Berkeley, another of the coheirs of Mowbray; the earl of Northumberland had been made warden of the Scottish marches³; Edward the

His adherents promoted.

¹ Cont. Croyl. p. 567; Exc. Hist. pp. 379-383.

² John Howard was made duke of Norfolk and earl marshal June 28, and had a commission of array for the eastern counties July 16; he was made admiral of England, Ireland, and Aquitaine, July 25; Rot. Pat. pp. 12, 13.

³ Northumberland's commission was issued May 20; Nichols, Grants, p. 20: it was renewed July 24, 1484; Rot. Pat. p. 85.

king's only son was made lieutenant of Ireland, earl of Chester, and prince of Wales. Bishop Russell of Lincoln had been made chancellor on the 27th of June¹. The royal party made a grand progress during harvest, and at York on the 8th of September the heir to the crown was knighted with great pomp². That event seems to have been the last glimpse of sunshine. The next month the duke of Buckingham was in open rebellion, and Henry of Richmond the heir of the elder line of Beaufort was threatening an invasion.

The duke of Buckingham was but a degenerate representative of the peace-making duke who fell at Northampton. He had betrayed his great position and become a tool of Richard; but his position was still too great to suffer his ambition or Richard's suspicions to sleep. The house of Lancaster and its share in the house of Bohun being extinguished, the heir of the Staffords was sole heir of the earldom of Hereford. This, under the crafty advice, it was said, of bishop Morton³, he ventured to claim, and Richard did not hesitate to refuse. Whilst the king was in the north, Buckingham was planning treason; the Wydvilles and the Greys were helping; three bishops, Wydville of Salisbury, Courtenay of Exeter, and Morton of Ely⁴, were active in promoting the rising: negotiations were opened with the earl of Richmond, and he was promised in case of success the hand of the lady Elizabeth, eldest daughter of the late king, and the succession to the crown. The design was premature; Richard was not yet unpopular, and the conspirators were not in full concert with one another. The struggle accordingly was short: on the 18th of October the conspirators rose in Kent, Berkshire, Wiltshire, and Devonshire. Richard was already on the watch; a week before this, on the 11th, whilst at Lincoln, he had announced the traitorous proceedings of Buckingham to the

Rebellion
of Buckingham.

Extent of the conspiracy.

Its failure.

¹ Rymer, xii. 189: he had, according to More, p. 486, been appointed to the same office under Edward V early in the month.

² Ross, p. 217; Fabric Rolls of York, p. 212: on the story of a second coronation see Davies, York Records, pp. 282 sq.; Cont. Croyl. p. 567.

³ More, ap. Kennett, i. 502.

⁴ Cont. Croyl. p. 568; Rot. Parl. vi. 250.

citizens of York¹; and he had taken precautions to prevent Buckingham, whose head-quarters were at Brecon, from crossing the Severn. On the 23rd from Leicester he proclaimed pardon to the commons, and set a price on the heads of the leaders². When the duke arrived at Weobly he found that the game was lost, and fled in disguise. He was taken, brought to the king at Salisbury on November 2, and beheaded forthwith³. The three bishops escaped to the continent. Many of the minor conspirators were taken and put to death, among them Sir Thomas Saint Leger, the king's brother-in-law, who had married the duchess of Exeter. The attempt of Henry of Richmond to land at Plymouth was delayed by weather, until the chances of success were over. The extent of the danger may be estimated by the great exertions which Richard made to obviate it, and by the fact that the expense of the army which he had on foot made a very heavy drain on the great treasure that Edward IV had left behind him.

Buckingham taken and beheaded.

Executions.

Great danger avoided.

Richard's parliament, January, 1484.

After Christmas Richard held his first parliament; it assembled on the 23rd of January⁴: preparations had been made for an earlier meeting, but this had been prevented by the outbreak of the revolt⁵. Two dukes, seven earls, two viscounts, and twenty-six barons were summoned. The ¹ On the 11th of October Richard wrote from Lincoln announcing Buckingham's treason and asking for men; Davies, York Records, pp. 177-181.

² The proclamations against the rebels are dated Oct. 23; Rot. Pat. p. 31; Rymer, xii. 204.

³ Cont. Croyl. p. 568. Lord Stanley was appointed constable in his place Nov. 18, and Dec. 16; Rot. Pat. pp. 16, 36; Sir William Stanley justice of North Wales, Nov. 12; and the earl of Northumberland great chamberlain, Nov. 12; ib.

⁴ Rot. Parl. vi. 237; Cont. Croyl. p. 570.

⁵ On the 22nd of September summons was issued for Nov. 6; Wake, State of the Church, p. 382. On the 24th of October the election of members of parliament was held at York; Davies, pp. 181, 182. As the chancellor's speech prepared for the occasion has for its text a portion of the gospel for S. Martin's day, there can be little doubt that the parliament was to have been opened on that day. See Nichols, Grants of Edward V, p. liv. Another summons was issued Dec. 9; Wake, p. 382. The election for the parliament of January 1484 was held at York on the 16th of January, the members started on the 24th, and returned February 26; Davies, pp. 184, 185.

chancellor preached on the text 'We have many members in one body,' and especially exhorted the estates to search diligently for the piece of silver that was lost, to secure that perfection in government which was the one thing wanted to make England safe and happy. On the 26th William Catesby, one of Richard's most unscrupulous servants, was presented and approved as speaker¹. One of the first matters which was discussed was the king's title. The bill which was introduced on the subject rehearsed the proceedings by which Richard had been induced to assume the crown, and contained a copy of the petition of invitation, all the statements of which it was proposed to ratify, enrol, record, approve, and authorise, in such a way as to give them the force of an act of the full parliament. The title of the king was, the bill continues, perfect in itself, as grounded on the law of God and nature, the customs of the realm and the opinion of the wise; yet, in condescension to the ignorance of the people, and because they are of such nature and disposition that the declaration of any truth or right made by the three estates of the realm in parliament, and by authority of the same, 'maketh before all other things most faith and certainty,' it is decreed that Richard is king as well by right of consanguinity and inheritance as by lawful election, consecration and coronation. The crown is accordingly secured to him and the heirs of his body. The bill, having been introduced before the lords in the king's presence, was carried down to the commons, and received their approval, after which, with the assent of the lords, all the statements contained in it were pronounced to be true and undoubted, and the king gave his assent². By such an extraordinary and clumsy expedient was the action of the June council made the law of the land, and the parliament bound to the truth of certain historical statements which many of the members, if not all, must have known to be false.

Proceedings touching the king's title.

Completeness of his right alleged.

Next in importance as a matter of deliberation was the punishment of the conspirators in the late revolt. An act of attainder was passed against the duke of Buckingham, the Punishment of the recent offenders.

¹ Rot. Parl. vi. 238.

² Ib. vi. 240-242.

earls of Richmond and Pembroke, the marquess of Dorset, and an immense number of knights and gentlemen, who were condemned to the penalties of treason¹. Another act for the punishment of the three bishops declared them worthy of the same sentence, but from respect to their holy office contented itself with confiscating their temporalities². The lady Margaret of Richmond³ was attainted in a separate act, the grants made to the duke and duchess of Exeter were resumed, and the king was empowered to make grants from the property of the attainted⁴. On the 20th of February, the last day of the session, the king obtained a grant of tunnage, poundage, and the subsidy on wool for his life⁵.

Grant of revenue for life.

Legislation of this parliament.

The statutes of this parliament, fifteen in number, and many of them enacted on petitions of the commons, are of great significance, and have been understood to indicate, more certainly than any other part of Richard's policy, the line which he would have taken if he had ever found himself secure on the throne. With one exception, however, they are of small constitutional importance, and, unless more were known about the influence under which they were passed, it would be rash to suppose that Richard had any definite scheme of policy in assenting to them. Six of them concern trade and commercial relations: by one the grants made to queen Elizabeth are annulled⁶; another exempts the collectors of the clerical tenths from vexatious proceedings in secular courts⁷; four are intended to remedy or regulate legal proceedings in the matters of bail, juries, fines⁸, and the action of the court of pie-powder; by another legal chapter the king is divested of the property in lands of which he is enfeoffed or seized to uses, and the estate is vested in the co-feoffees or in the cestui que use⁹—a piece of legislation which anticipates the general action of the statutes of uses; by another, secret feoffments, a natural

¹ Rot. Parl. vi. 244-248. ² Ib. vi. 250. ³ Ib. ⁴ Ib. vi. 242, 249.

⁵ Ib. vi. 238-240.

⁶ 1 Ric. III, c. 15; Statutes, ii. 498.

⁷ 1 Ric. III, c. 14; Statutes, ii. 497.

⁸ 1 Ric. III, c. 7. On Richard's Statute of Fines see Hallam, Const. Hist. i. 11-13.

⁹ 1 Ric. III, c. 5; Statutes, ii. 480.

and necessary outgrowth of the civil wars, are forbidden¹. The great act of the session is the second chapter of the statute², which abolishes the unconstitutional practice of exacting benevolences, stigmatising them as new and unlawful inventions, and dilating on the hardships to which many worshipful men had been subjected by them. One or two private acts were passed, and, after a solemn oath taken to insure the succession of the prince of Wales, the parliament was dissolved. On the 23rd of February the king by charter confirmed the privileges secured by Edward IV to the clergy in 1462. The gratitude of convocation was shown by liberal votes of money³.

Abolition of benevo-lences.

Management of convocation.

The rest of Richard's reign was employed in attempts, made by way of diplomacy, police, and warlike preparations, to detect, anticipate and thwart the machinations which his enemies at home and abroad were planning against him. To this end he negotiated in September a truce for three years with Scotland, throwing over the duke of Albany, and promising one of his nieces as wife to the king⁴. With the duke of Brittany, whose court afforded a refuge for the remnant of the Lancastrian party, he concluded an armistice to last until April 1485; he even undertook to send over a force to defend the duke against his neighbours, and finally prolonged the truce to Michaelmas, 1492⁵. To secure the papal recognition he empowered the bishops of Durham and S. David's to perform that 'filial and catholic obedience which was of old due and accustomed to be paid by the kings of England to the Roman pontiffs⁶.' These measures had a certain success; Henry of Richmond quitted Brittany, and sought for refuge in other parts of France less amenable to Richard's influence. The king devoted much

Richard's precautions against attack.

Foreign negotiations
of Richard.

¹ 1 Ric. III, c. 1; Statutes, ii. 477.

² 1 Ric. III, c. 2; Statutes, ii. 478; Cont. Croyl. p. 571.

³ Wilkins, Conc. iii. 616; 4th Rep. Dep. Keeper, App. ii. p. 45. The convocation sat from Feb. 3 to Feb. 24, 1484, and from February 10 to March 11, 1485. A tenth was granted in 1484, and two tenths in 1485.

⁴ Rymer, xii. 230, 232, 235-247; Gairdner, Letters of Richard III, i. 51 sq., 55. Some fragments of the deliberations of the council on Scottish affairs are preserved; ib. pp. 63-67.

⁵ Rymer, xii. 226, 229, 255, 261, 262; Letters of Richard III, i. 37 sq.

⁶ Rymer, xii. 253, 254: a similar act of Henry VI in 1459 is in Rymer, xi. 422.

III. policy
at home.

Death of the prince of Wales, 1484.

Threatened invasion by Richmond.

Proposed marriage of Richard and his niece.

attention also to the improvement of the fleet, with which, notwithstanding some mishaps, he secured the final superiority of the English over the Scots at sea. By disafforesting certain lands which Edward IV had enclosed, he gained some local popularity¹; and in the north of England he was certainly strong in the affection of the people². Calamity, however, never deserted the royal house; the prince of Wales died on the 9th of April, 1484, and the queen fell into ill health, which ended in her death in March 1485. Richard had to recognise as his heir-presumptive John de la Pole, earl of Lincoln, his nephew, son of the duke of Suffolk³.

Notwithstanding the constant exertions of the king, the submissive conduct of his parliament, and the success of his foreign negotiations, the alarm of invasion from abroad never for an instant subsided. At Christmas, 1484, it was known that the earl of Richmond was preparing for an invasion at Whitsuntide, and the king without hesitation betook himself to the collection of benevolences⁴, notwithstanding the recent act by which such exactions were prescribed. As soon as the queen died—and her death was, according to Richard's enemies, the result of his own cruel policy—he began to negotiate for a marriage with his own niece, whose hand the queen Elizabeth had held out as a prize for Richmond. He even succeeded in inducing that vain and fickle woman to agree to the incestuous bargain⁵. This proposition was opposed by his most faithful advisers, and, under a threat that they would desert him, he was obliged, in a council held before Easter, to

¹ Ross, Hist. Reg. Ang. p. 216.

² The number of Yorkshiremen employed by Richard, and the immunities bestowed on towns and churches in the north, are a sufficient proof of this.

³ The prince had been appointed lieutenant of Ireland July 19, 1483; the earl of Lincoln was nominated to succeed him Aug. 21, 1484; Rot. Pat. pp. 50, 96.

⁴ Cont. Croyl. p. 572. Fabyan (p. 672) says that the king gave pledges for the loans borrowed in the city of London. Orders issued for the more hasty levy of money are in Gairdner's Letters of Rich. III. i. 81–85; but they contain nothing that bears on this point. Another set of instructions however (ib. pp. 85–87) shows that the commissions of array were again used as an instrument of taxation as in 1482. See above, p. 224.

⁵ Cont. Croyl. p. 572; Hall, pp. 406, 407.

renounce it¹. But the very rumour had served to promote union among the opposing parties, and to inspirit the earl of Richmond to greater exertions. The earl of Oxford had escaped from Hammes and joined him. He had no doubt promises of aid from England, and secret as well as open help afforded him abroad. But it must ever remain a problem how he was enabled to maintain his position on the continent so long as he did; the extent and permanence of his resources seem even a greater mystery than his subsequent success.

Richmond's preparations.

362. The time was come at last: on the 1st of August Henry of Richmond, now twenty-seven years old, but a man of experience and caution far beyond his years, sailed from Harfleur²; having eluded the fleet which Richard had sent to intercept him, he landed at Milford Haven on the 7th³. He had with him at the most two thousand men, but he depended chiefly on the promises of assistance from the Welsh, among whom his father's family had taken pains to strengthen his interest, and he himself roused a good deal of patriotic feeling. The lord Stanley, the present husband of Henry's mother, was indeed one of Richard's trusted servants, and Sir William Stanley his brother was in command in Wales; but the king had alienated them by his mistrust, and had confined the lord Strange, son of lord Stanley, as a hostage for his father's fidelity. Scarcely believing the formidable news of Henry's progress, the king moved to Nottingham, where he expected to be able to crush the rebellion as soon as it came to a head. Henry marched on, gathering forces as he went, and securing fresh promises of adhesion. As he came nearer, the king removed to Leicester, whence he marched out to meet the invader at Market Bosworth, on the 21st of August. On the 22nd the battle of Bosworth was fought. The Stanleys and the Earl of Northumberland went over to Henry, and Richard was killed. Treachery, on which he could not have counted, and which nothing but his own mistrust, his tyranny

He lands at Milford Haven, Aug. 7, 1485.

Advance of Richmond.

Battle of Bosworth,
Aug. 22, 1485.

¹ Hall, p. 407.

² Cont. Croyl. p. 573.

³ Richard's Proclamation against 'Henry Tydder,' dated June 23, 1485, is in the Paston Letters, iii. 316-320.

and vindictiveness could palliate, closed the long contest¹. The crown was left for the successful invader to claim on a shadowy title, and to secure by a marriage of convenience. By a strange coincidence the heir of the Beauforts was to be wedded to the heiress of the houses of York and Clarence; the grandson of Queen Katharine to the granddaughter of the duchess Jacquetta. The result reveals at once the permanence of the old family jealousies, and the gulf in which all the intervening representatives of the house of Plantagenet had been submerged.

Mark of an epoch.

With the battle of Bosworth the medieval history of England is understood to end. It is not, however, the distinct end of an old period, so much as the distinct beginning of a new one. The old dividing influences subsist for half a century longer, but the newer and more lasting consolidating influences come from this time to the front of the stage. The student of constitutional history need not go twice over the same ground; he may be content to wait for the complete wearing out of the old forms, whilst he takes up the quest of the new, and dwells more steadily on the more permanent and vital elements that underlie them both.

Comparison of the constitutional position of the Lancaster and York dynasties.

363. Any attempt to balance or to contrast the constitutional claims and position of the houses of Lancaster and York, is embarrassed by the complications of moral, legal, and personal questions which intrude at every point. The most earnest supporter of the constitutional right of the Lancastrian kings cannot deny the utter incompetency of Henry VI; the most ardent champion of the divine right of hereditary succession must allow that the rule of Edward IV and Richard III was unconstitutional, arbitrary, and sanguinary. Henry VI was not deposed for incompetency; and the unconstitutional rule of the house of York was but a minor cause of its difficulties and final fall. England learned a lesson from both, and owes a sort of debt to both: the rule of the house of Lancaster proved that the nation was not ready for the efficient use of the liberties it had won, and that of the house of York proved that the nation was too full grown to be fettered again with the bonds from which it had escaped. The circumstances too by which the legal position of the two dynasties was determined, have points of likeness and unlikeness which have struck and continue to strike the readers of history in different ways. It may fairly be asked what there was in the usurpation of Edward IV that made it differ in kind from the usurpation of Henry IV; whether the misgovernment of Richard II and the misgovernment of Henry VI differed in nature or only in degree; what force the legal weakness of the Lancastrian title gave to the allegation of its incompetency, to what extent the dynastic position of the house of York may be made to palliate the charges of cruelty and tyranny from which it cannot be cleared.

¹ Cont. Croyl. pp. 573, 574.

Such questions will be answered differently by men who approach the subject from different points. The survey which has been taken of the events of the period in the present chapter, rapid and brief as it appears, renders it unnecessary to recapitulate here the particulars from which the general impression must either way be drawn. The student who approaches the story from the point of view at which these pages have been written, will recognise the constitutional claim of the house of Lancaster, as based on a solemn national act, strengthened by the adherence of three generations to a constitutional form of government, and not forfeited by any distinct breach of the understanding upon which Henry IV originally received the crown. He will recognise in the successful claim of the house of York a retrogressive step, which was made possible by the weakness of Henry VI, but could be justified constitutionally only by a theory of succession which neither on the principles of law nor on the precedents of history could be consistently maintained.

Constitutional character of the Lancaster rule.

The Yorkist usurpation.

But he may accept these conclusions generally without shutting his eyes to the reality of the difficulties which from almost every side beset the subject—difficulties which were recognised by the wisest men of the time, and knots which could be untied only by the sword. There are personal ques-

Complication of personal and political questions.

Relations of the three estates.

Local parties.

Domestic divisions.

Ebb and flow in national life.

tions of allegiance and fealty, broken faith and stained honour; allegations and denials of incapacity and misgovernment; a national voice possessing strength that makes it decisive for the moment, but not enough to enable it to resist the dictation of the stronger; giving an uncertain sound from year to year; attainting and rehabilitating in alternate parliaments; claiming a cogency and infallibility which every change of policy belies. The baronage is divided so narrowly that the summons or exclusion of half a dozen members changes the fate of a ministry or of a dynasty; the representation of the commons is liable to the manipulation of local agencies with which constitutional right weighs little in comparison with territorial partisanship: the clergy are either, like the baronage, narrowly divided, or, in the earnest desire of peace, ready to acquiesce in the supremacy of the party which is for the moment the stronger. Even the great mass of the nation does not know its own mind: the northern counties are strong on one side, the southern on the other: a weak government can bring a great force into the field, and a strong government cannot be secured against a bewildering surprise: the weakness of Henry VI and the strength of Richard III alike succumb to a single defeat: the people are weary of both, and yet fight for either. The history contains paradoxes which confused the steadiest heads of the time, and strained the strongest consciences. Hence every house was divided against itself, and few except the chief actors in the drama sustained their part with honesty and consistency. Oaths too were taken only to be broken; reconciliations concluded only that time might be gained to prepare for new battles. The older laws of religion and honour are waning away before the newer laws are strong enough to take their place. Even the material prosperity and growth of the nation are complicated in the same way; rapid exhaustion and rapid development seem to go on side by side; the old order changes, the inherent forces of national life renew themselves in divers ways; and the man who chooses to place himself in the position of a judge must, under the confusion of testimony, and the impossibility of comparing incommensurable influences, allow that on many, perhaps most, of the disputed points, no absolute decision can be attempted.

Without then trying to estimate the exact debt which England owes to either, it will be enough, as it is perhaps indispensable, to compare the two dynasties on the level ground of constitutional practice, and to collect the points on which is based the conclusion, already more than sufficiently indicated, that the rule of the house of Lancaster was in the main constitutional, and that of the house of York in the main unconstitutional. It might be sufficient to say that the rule of the house of Lancaster was most constitutional when it was strongest; and that of the house of York when it was weakest:
that the former contravened the constitution only when it was itself in its decrepitude, the latter did so when in its fullest vigour. Such a generalisation may be misconstrued; the administration of Henry V may be regarded as constitutional because he was strong enough to use the constitutional machinery in his own way, and that of Edward IV as unconstitutional because he was strong enough to dispense with it.
If however it be granted, as for our purpose and from our point of view it must, that the decision of the quarrel was not directly affected by constitutional questions at all,—if it be admitted, that is, that the claim of York and the Nevilles to deliver the king and kingdom from evil counsellors was neither raised nor prosecuted in a constitutional way, and was in reality both raised and resisted on grounds of dynastic right,— there is no great difficulty in forming a general conclusion.
Nor need any misgivings be suggested by the mere forensic difficulty that the claim of the house of York, based on hereditary right of succession, is in itself incompatible with the claim of the baronage, or of the nation which it represented, to use force in order to compel the king to dismiss his unpopular advisers.

Proposed treatment of the question.

Possible
generalisation.

Dynastic forces decide the struggle.

364. The first point upon which a comparison can be taken is that of parliamentary action. The reign of Henry IV is one long struggle on points of administrative difference between a king and a parliament that on all vital points are at one:

The three Lancaster kings in relation to their parliaments.

Henry V leads and impersonates national spirit, and so leads the action of parliament; Henry VI throughout the earlier and happier part of his reign is ruled by a council which to a great extent represents the parliament; and during the later years he retains such a hold on the parliament as to foil the attempt made by the duke of York to supplant him; nor is his deposition recognised by the parliament until Edward has claimed, won, and worn the crown. We may set aside, however, the question of the constitutional title, the reality of which was more completely recognised in later times than in the age in which it was practically vindicated, and which, as we have seen, was imperfectly realised by Henry IV himself, in consequence of the oaths by which he was bound to Richard, and the conviction which compelled him to advance a factitious hereditary claim. The questions that arise upon this subject will always be answered more or less from opposite points of view. It will be more instructive if we attempt first to collect and arrange the particular instances in which the theory of parliamentary institutions was advanced and accepted by the different factors in the government, then to show that that theory was acted upon to a very great extent throughout the first half at least of the fifteenth century, and to note as we proceed the points in which the accepted theory went even beyond the practice of the times, and anticipated some of the later forms of parliamentary government. This view will enable us summarily to describe the character of the legislative, economical, and administrative policy pursued by the two rival houses, and so to strike the balance between them upon a material as well as a formal issue.

Archbishop Arundel's declaration, made on behalf of Henry IV in his first parliament, was a distinct undertaking that the new king would reign constitutionally. Richard II had declared himself possessed of a prerogative practically unlimited, and had enunciated the doctrine that the law was in the heart and mouth of the king, that the goods of his subjects were his own¹. Henry wished to be governed and counselled by the wise and

The question of their title always debatable.

Their professions of constitutional rule.

Statements of the kings and ministers, as to their wish to rule with consent of the nation.

¹ Rot. Parl. iii. 419.

ancient of the kingdom for the aid and comfort of himself and of the whole realm; by their common counsel and consent he would do the best for the governance of himself and his kingdom, not wishing to be governed according to his proper will, or of his voluntary purpose and singular opinion, 'but by the common advice, counsel, and consent,' and according to the sense and spirit of the coronation oath¹. Again, when in the same parliament the commons 'of their own good grace and will trusting in the nobility, high discretion, and gracious governance' of the king, granted to him 'that they would that he should be in the same royal liberty as his noble progenitors had been,' the king of his royal grace and tender conscience vouchsafed to declare in full parliament 'that it was not his intent or will to change the laws, statutes, or good usages, or to take any other advantage by the said grant, but to guard the ancient laws and statutes ordained and used in the time of his noble progenitors, and to do right to all people, in mercy and truth according to his cath².' Nor did this avowal stand alone. In the commission of inquiry into false rumours, issued in 1402, Henry ordered that the counties should be assured 'that it always has been, is, and will be, our intention that the republic and common weal, and the laws and customs of our kingdom be observed and kept from time to time,' and that the violators of the same should be punished according to their deserts, 'for to this end we believe that we have come by God's will to our kingdom³.' It is true that these and many similar declarations owe some part of their force to the fact that they presented a strong contrast to Richard's rash utterances, and that they were at the time prompted by a desire to set such a contrast before the eyes of the people. But as time went on and the alarm of reaction passed away, they were repeated in equally strong and even more elaborate language. Sir Arnold Savage in 1401 told the king that he possessed what was the greatest treasure and riches of the whole world, the heart of his people; and the king in his answer prayed the parliament to counsel him how that treasure might be kept longest and best spent to

Declarations of constitutional theory.

¹ Above, p. 15. ² Rot. Parl. iii. 434; above, p. 24. ³ Rymer, viii. 255.

Ministerial announcements.

the honour of God and the realm, and he would follow it ¹. In 1404 bishop Beaufort, in his address to parliament, compared the kingdom to the body of a man; the right side answered to the church, the left to the baronage, and the other members to the commons ². Archbishop Arundel declared the royal will to the same assembly, that the laws should be kept and guarded, that equal right and justice should be done as well to poor as to rich, and that by no letters of privy seal, or other mandates, should the common law be disturbed, or the people any way be delayed in the pursuit of justice; that the royal household should be regulated by the advice of the lords, and the grants made in parliament should be administered by treasurers ordained in parliament ³. In 1406 bishop Longley announced that the king would conform to the precept of the son of Sirach, and do nothing without advice ⁴. In 1410 bishop Beaufort quoted the apocryphal answer of Aristotle to Alexander on the surest defence of states: 'The supreme security and safeguard of every kingdom and city is to have the entire and cordial love of the people, and to keep them in their laws and rights ⁵.' The same sound principle pervades even the most pedantic effusions of the successive chancellors in the following reigns; everywhere the welfare of the realm is, conjointly with the glory of God, recognised as the great end of government; the king's duty is to rule lawfully, the duty of the people to obey honestly; the share of the three estates in all deliberations is fully recognised; the duty as well as the right to counsel, the limitations and responsibilities, as well as the prerogatives, of royal power. In all these may be traced not merely a reaction against the arbitrary government of former reigns, but the existence of a theory more or less definite, of a permanent character of government. Not to multiply however verbal illustrations of what, so long as they are confined to mere words, may seem mere arguments ad captandum, it is more interesting to refer to the language of Sir John Fortescue, the great Lancastrian lawyer, in whose hands Henry VI seems to have placed the legal

¹ Rot. Parl. iii. 456.

² Ib. iii. 522.

³ Ib. iii. 529.

⁴ Eccus. xxxii. 24; Rot. Parl. iii. 567.

⁵ Rot. Parl. iii. 622.

education of his son. Fortescue, in drawing up his account of the English constitution¹, had in his eye by way of contrast, not the usurpations of Richard II, but the more legal and the not less absolute governments of the continent, especially that of France; and, although in some passages it is possible that he glanced at the arbitrary measures of Edward IV, the general object of his writing was didactic rather than controversial; one moreover of the most interesting of his treatises was written after his reconciliation with Edward. Taken all together, his writings represent the view of the English constitution which was adopted as the Lancastrian programme and on which the Lancastrian kings had ruled.

Illustrations to be found in the works of Sir John Fortescue.

365. Fortescue, taking as the basis of his definition the distinction drawn by the medieval publicists under the guidance of S. Thomas Aquinas and his followers², divides governments into three classes, characterised as dominium regale, dominium politicum, and *dominium regale et politicum*³. These institutions differ in origin; the first was established by the aggressions of individuals, the other two by the institution of the nations⁴. England belongs to the third class. The king of England is a 'rex politicus⁵;' the maxim of the civil law, 'what has pleased the prince has the force of law,' has no place in English jurisprudence⁶; the king exists for the sake of the kingdom, not the kingdom for the sake of the king⁷; 'for the Fortescue's division of governments.

Statements of Fortescue as to the nature of the royal power.

¹ The new edition of Fortescue on 'The Governance of England,' by Mr. Plummer, contains a great deal of important illustrative matter, and a preface and notes which in some points are opposed to my conclusions expressed in the text.

² The tract used by Fortescue was the 'De Regimine Principum' of which Thomas Aquinas wrote only the first and part of the second book. The distinction of governments is drawn in the third book, which was probably written by Ptolemaeus Lucensis.

³ Fortescue, de Natura Legis Naturae, i. 16; Opp. (ed. Clermont) i. 77; Monarchy, c. i; ib. p. 449, Plummer, p. 109. The division is primarily between the dominium regale and the dominium politicum, to which England belongs.

⁴ De Nat. Leg. Nat. i. 16, quoting Aegidius Romanus de Regimine Principum; see Lord Carlingford's note, p. 360*; De Laudibus Legum Angliae, cc. 12, 13, pp. 345, 346.

⁵ De Nat. Leg. Nat. i. 16, p. 77.

⁶ Ib. i. 28, p. 90; De Laudibus Legum Angliae, c. 9, p. 344; c. 35, p. 365.

⁷ De Nat. Leg. Nat. i. 25, p. 86; ii. 4, quoting the De Regimine, lib. iii; Opp. i. 118.

preservation of the laws of his subjects, of their persons and goods, he is set up, and for this purpose he has power derived from the people, so that he may not govern his people by any other power¹: he cannot change the laws or impose taxes without the consent of the whole nation given in parliament. That parliament, including a senate of more than three hundred chosen counsellors, represents the three estates of the realm². Such a government deserves in the highest sense the title of 'politic,' because it is regulated by administration of many; and the title of 'royal' because the authority of the sovereign is required for the making of new laws, and the right of hereditary succession is conserved³. The righteous king maintains his sway not from the desire of power, but because it is his duty to take care of others⁴. But the politic king has a right to use exceptional means to repress rebellion or to resist invasion⁵; he has likewise prerogative powers which are not shared with his people, the right, for instance, of pardon and the whole domain of equity⁶. The judgments of the courts of justice are his, but he does not sit personally in judgment⁷. The limitations of his power are a glory rather than a humiliation to him, for there is no degradation deeper than that of wrongdoing⁸. Although the origin of politic kingship is in the will of the people, and its conservation is secured by hereditary succession, righteous judgment is its true sustaining power and justification. 'If justice be banished,' says S. Augustine, 'what are kingdoms but great robberies or nests of robbers?' Yet kingdoms acquired by conquest may be established by four things,

Politic government.

Statements of Fortescue as to the excellence of the English system.

¹ De Laudibus, c. 13, p. 347: 'Ad tutelam namque legis subditorum ac eorum corporum et bonorum rex hujusmodi erectus est, et hanc potestatem a populo effluxam ipse habet, quo ei non licet potestate alia suo populo dominari.'

² De Nat. Leg. Nat. i. c. 16, p. 77; De Laudibus, c. 18, Opp. p. 350.

³ De Nat. Leg. Nat. i. c. 16, p. 77.

⁴ Ib. i. c. 34, p. 97, quoting Aug. de Civitate Dei, xix. c. 14.

⁵ De Nat. Leg. Nat. i. c. 25, p. 86.

⁶ Ib. i. c. 24, p. 85.

⁷ De Laudibus, c. 8, p. 344.

⁸ De Nat. Leg. Nat. i. c. 26, p. 88. 'Non jugum sed libertas est politice regere populum, securitas quoque maxima nedum plebis sed et ipsi regi, allevatio etiam non minima sollicitudinis suae;' De Laudibus, c. 34, p. 363.

'acceptation of God, approving of the church, long continuance of possession, and the assent of the people¹.' The proof of the excellence of politic royalty is seen in the comparison of England with France, where, although kings like S. Lewis could make good laws and administer sound justice by God's special grace, bad government under absolute sovereignty had produced general impoverishment, oppression, and degradation². Not only were the laws of England better than the laws of France, as was shown by the absence of any legal system of torture³, by the institution of trial by jury⁴, by the careful provisions for provincial administration of justice⁵, and other points in which the English law excels the civil; but the financial system of government was better. There were no such oppressions of the nature of purveyance, forced impressments, taxes on salt, octroi on wine, levies of money for wages and for a force of archers at the king's will⁶: the administration of justice was better, there were no secret executions done without form of law, nor any like abuses by which the rich were crushed and the poor trampled on⁷. And still more distinct was the result in the happiness of the English, as a nation in which property was not concentrated in a few hands, but the commons as well as the baronage were rich, and had a great stake in public welfare⁸. Nothing was so great security to England as the wealth of the commons; if they were impoverished, they would at once lay the blame on the government and rise in revolt. But their very boldness in rising was a point of superiority; for the French had lost the spirit to rise: in England there were it was true many robbers, in France many thieves; but

Comparison of England with France.

The excellent results.

Spirit of the commons.

¹ Of the Title of the House of York, Opp. i. 501. S. Augustine's words are, 'Remota itaque justitia quid sunt regna nisi magna latrocinia?' De Civitate Dei, iv. c. 4.

² On the Monarchy of England, c. 3; Opp. i. 451; ed. Plummer, p. 113.

³ De Laudibus, c. 22, p. 352.

⁴ Ib. c. 20, p. 350; cc. 29-32, pp. 359-363.

⁵ Ib. cc. 24 sq., pp. 354 sq.

⁶ Ib. c. 35, p. 364.

⁷ Ib. c. 29, p. 359; c. 35, pp. 364, 365; Monarchy, c. 3, p. 452; ed. Pl. p. 114.

⁸ De Laudibus, c. 29, p. 359: 'In ea (sc. Anglia) villula tam parva reperiri non poterit in qua non est miles armiger vel paterfamilias qualis ibidem Frankelays vulgariter nuncupatur, magnis dilatus possessionibus, nec non libere tenentes alii et valecti plurimi suis patrimoniiis sufficientes ad faciendum juratam.' Cf. Monarchy, c. 12, p. 465.

there is more spirit and a better heart in a robber than in a thief¹.

Fortescue's scheme of Reform.

England, notwithstanding the advantages of politic royalty, had fallen into trouble, as Fortescue was obliged to allow, and in one of the latest of his works he sketches, perhaps as advice to Edward IV, a system of reform, many points of which are a mere restoration of the system that was in use under the Lancastrian kings. Some of these may be noticed as illustrating the preceding sections of this chapter as well as tending to a general conclusion. The politic royalty of England, distinguished from the government of absolute kingdoms by the fact that it is rooted in the desire and institution of the nation, has its work set in the task of defence against foreign foes and in the maintenance of internal peace². Such a work is very costly; the king is poor; royal poverty is a very dangerous thing, for the king can contract loans only on heavy interest; he is liable to be defamed for misgovernance; he is driven to make ruinous assignments of revenue and to give extravagant gifts of land, and he is tempted or compelled to use oppressive means for raising funds³. His expenses are of two sorts: ordinary charges are those of the household and wardrobes, the wages of public functionaries, the keeping of the marches and of Calais, and the maintenance of public works. The expenses of the navy are not counted here, for they are provided for by tunnage and poundage⁴. The extraordinary charges are those for the maintenance and reception of embassies, the rewarding of old servants, the provision for royal buildings, for the stock of jewels and plate, for special commissions of judges, royal progresses for the sustentation of peace and justice, and above all the resistance of sudden invasion⁵. The nation is bound to support the king in all things necessary to his estate and dignity; his ordinary

The king's poverty and great expenses.

¹ Monarchy, c. 12, p. 464; ed. Pl. p. 140.

² Ib. c. 4, p. 453: 'A king's office stondith in two things, one to defend his realme ageyn their ennemyes outward by sword, another that he defendith his people ageyn wrong doars inwarde.' Plummer, p. 116.

³ Ib. c. 5, pp. 454, 455; Pl. p. 119.

⁴ Ib. c. 6, pp. 455, 456; Pl. p. 122.

⁵ Ib. c. 7, pp. 457, 458; Pl. p. 123.

revenue may suffice for the household, but the king is not only a sovereign lord, but a public servant; the royal estate is an office of administration, the king not less than the pope is *servus servorum Dei*¹. He should for his extraordinary charges have a revenue not less than twice that of one of his great lords². The question is how can such a revenue be raised. There are among the expedients of French finance some that might with parliamentary authority be adopted in England³, but the real source of relief must be sought in the retention and resumption of the lands which the kings were so often tempted to alienate. The king had once possessed a fifth part of the land of England; this had been diminished by the restoration of forfeited estates, by the recognition of entails and other titles, by gifts to servants of the crown, by provision for the younger sons of the king, and most of all by grants to importunate suitors. The further diminution of the crown estates might be prevented; the king might content himself with bestowing estates for life; if he were economical the commons would be ready to grant subsidies⁴. If however he wished to restore national prosperity and to live of his own, he must be prepared to go further; a general resumption of gifts of land made since a certain period must be enforced⁵. To do this and to secure that for the future only due and proper grants should be made, it was necessary to constitute or reform the royal council⁶. This important body, before which all questions of difficulty might be brought, should not henceforth consist, as it had done, of great lords who were prone to devote themselves to their own business more than to the king's, but of twelve spiritual and twelve temporal men, who were to swear to observe certain rules, and constitute a permanent council, none of whom was to be removed without consent of the majority. To these should be added four Obligation of the nation to help the king.

Diminution of the royal estates to be stopped.

A resumption of gifts of lands to be enforced.

Fortescue proposes the remodelling of the privy council.

¹ Monarchy, c. 8, pp. 458, 459; Pl. p. 127.

² Ib. c. 9, p. 459; Pl. pp. 128, 254. ³ Ib. c. 10, p. 461; Pl. p. 131.

⁴ Ib. cc. 10, 11, pp. 462-464; Pl. pp. 131, 135.

⁵ Ib. c. 14, p. 467; Pl. p. 143.

⁶ In the Rules of Council drawn up in 1390, Ord. i. 18, the business of the king and kingdom is made to take precedence of all other matters.

A chosen
council.

spiritual and four temporal lords to serve for a year; the king should appoint the president or chief councillor. The wages of the members should be moderate, especially those of the lords and the spiritual councillors; if the charges were very great the number might be reduced. This body might entertain all questions of state policy, the control of bullion, the fixing of prices, the maintenance of the navy, the proposed amendments of the law, and the preparation of business for parliament. The great officers of state, especially the chancellor, should attend on its deliberations, and the judges if necessary; and a register of its proceedings should be kept¹. Chosen counsellors were much better than volunteers². One of the first things to be done after the resumption was to consolidate and render inalienable or, so to speak, amortize the crown lands, a measure which would entitle the king who should enact it to the confidence of his subjects and the gratitude of posterity. Then from lands otherwise accruing, gifts might be made; grants for a term of years might be given with consent of council, life estates and greater gifts only with the consent of parliament³. Except the exact determination of the selection and number of the councillors, Fortescue's scheme contains nothing which had not been in principle or in practice adopted under Henry IV and Henry V. The example for 'amortizing' the crown lands had been given in the consolidation of the estates of the duchy of Lancaster; the scheme of resumption broached so often, and accepted in principle by Henry IV, had been put into force under Henry VI. The powers of the council had been freely exercised during all the three reigns, and, although the direct influence of parliament on the council had been less under

Business allotted to it.

Fortescue's plan had been in use under the Lancastrian
kings.

¹ Monarchy, c. 15, pp. 468-470; Pl. p. 145. The office of chief or president of the council had been held by William of Wykeham under Edward III; Rot. Parl. iii. 388: but the post was not a fixed one, and the title of consiliarius principalis had belonged to Gloucester and Bedford as a part of the protectorship. Coke says (4 Inst. p. 54), that John Russell, bishop of Lincoln, was praesidens consilii in the 13th Edward IV. He was then keeper of the privy seal.

² 'Good Counsaile,' Opp. pp. 475, 476.

³ Monarchy, c. 19, p. 473; Pl. p. 155; see Rot. Parl. iii. 479, 579.

Henry VI than under Henry IV, the theory of the relation of the two bodies subsisted in its integrity; it is only in the latter years of the last Lancastrian reign that the king attempts to maintain his council in opposition to the parliament, and then only in the firm belief that his council was faithful to him, his parliament actuated by hostile motives or prompted by dangerous men.

366. It is true that neither in the vague promises of Henry IV nor in the definite recommendations of Sir John Fortescue are to be found enunciations of the clear principles or details of the practice of the English constitution. But the constitution did not now require definitions. The discipline of the fourteenth century, culminating in the grand lesson of revolution, had left the nation in no ignorance of its rights and wrongs. The great law of custom, written in the hearts and lives and memories of Englishmen, had been so far developed as to include everything material that had been won in the direction of popular liberties and even of parliamentary freedom. The nation knew that the king was not an arbitrary despot, but a sovereign bound by oaths, laws, policies, and necessities, over which they had some control. They knew that he could not break his oath without God's curse; he could not alter the laws or impose a tax without their consent given through their representatives chosen in their county courts. They knew how, when, and where those courts were held, and that the mass of the nation had the right and privilege of attending them; and they were jealously on the watch against royal interference in their elections. And so far there was nothing very complex about constitutional practice: there was little danger of dispute between lords and commons; the privilege of members needed only to be asserted and it was admitted; there was no restriction on the declaration of gravamina, or on the impeachment of ministers or others who were suspected of exercising a malign influence on the government. When the king promised to observe their liberties, men in general knew what he meant, and watched how he kept his promise. They saw the ancient abuses disappear; complaints

National consciousness of the king's position.

The constitution as understood by the nation.

were no more heard of money raised without consent of parliament, or of illegal exaction by means of commissions of array; the abuses of purveyance were mentioned only to be redressed and punished, and, if legal decisions were left unexecuted, it was for want of power rather than from want of will¹.

Previous illustration of Lancas-trian rule.

367. To recapitulate then the points in which the Lancastrian kings maintained the constitution as they found it, would be simply to repeat the whole of the parliamentary history, which from a different point of view we have surveyed in this chapter. It will be sufficient to mark the particulars in which constitutional practice gains clearness and definiteness under their sway. And of these also most have been noticed already.

Importance of the privy council.

Perhaps the feature of the constitution which gains most in clearness and definiteness during the period is the institution of the royal council, the origin and varying conditions of which have been already traced down to the close of the fourteenth century². That body, however constituted at the time, has been seen, from the minority of Henry III onwards, constantly increasing its power and multiplying its functions; retiring into the background under strong kings, coming prominently forward when the sovereign was weak, unpopular, or a child.

Its growth and development.

At last, under the nominal rule of Richard II, but really under the influence of the men who led the great parties in the parliament and in the country, it has become a power rather coordinate with the king than subordinate to him, joining with him in all business of the state, and not merely assisting but restricting his action. And as the council has multiplied its functions and increased its powers, the parliament has endeavoured to increase the national hold over the council by insisting that the king should nominate its members in parliament, and by more than once taking the nomination of the consultative body out of his hands, superseding for a time by commissions of reform both the royal council and the royal power itself. Such an act it was which, in 1386, brought about the crisis of the reign and the subsequent reactions which ended in Richard's fall³.

¹ See below, p. 276. ² Vol. ii. pp. 267-274. ³ Vol. ii. pp. 495-507.

Henry IV accepted the constitution of the council : Henry V The council. acted consistently upon the same principle ; it forms the key to guide us in reading the reign of his son ; the manipulation of the system by Edward IV supplies one of the leading influences of the Tudor politics ; and the council of the Lancastrian kings is the real, though perhaps not strictly the historical, germ of the cabinet ministries of modern times. When in 1406 Vote of confidence in 1406. the house of commons told the king that they were induced to make their grants, not only by the fear of God and love for the king, but by the great confidence which they had in the lords then chosen and ordained to be of the king's continual council ¹, they seem to have caught the spirit and anticipated the language of a much later period.

The demand that the members of the king's continual council should be nominated in parliament and should take certain oaths and accept certain articles for their guidance, was one which was sure to be made whenever a feeling of distrust arose between the king and the estates ². It was accordingly one of the first signs of the waning popularity of Henry IV after Hotspur's rebellion. In the parliament of 1404, at the urgent and special request of the commons, the king named six bishops, a duke, two earls, six lords, including the treasurer and privy seal, and seven commoners to be his great and continual council ³. In 1406, under similar pressure, he named three bishops, a duke, an earl, four barons, three commoners, the chancellor, treasurer, privy seal, steward, and chamberlain ⁴. In 1410 the king was requested to nominate the most valiant, wise, and discreet of the lords, spiritual and temporal, to be of his council, in aid and support of good and substantial government ; after a good deal of discussion the request was granted on the last day of the session ⁵. Council nominated in parliament. During the reign of Henry V Concord of council and parliament under Henry V. the perfect accord existing between the king and parliament made any question of the composition of the council super-

¹ Rot. Parl. iii. 568 ; above, p. 56.

² Vol. ii. pp. 360, 387, &c.

³ Rot. Parl. iii. 530 ; Ordinances, i. 237, 243 ; above, p. 45.

⁴ Rot. Parl. iii. 572 ; Ordinances, i. 295.

⁵ Rot. Parl. iii. 623, 632.

Under Henry VI the council increases in power.

It acts as a council of regency.

The parliament loses its connexion with council after 1437.

Council holds executive power during one of the York regencies.

fluous; but the minority of Henry VI gave the council at once a commanding position in the government. In the first year of his reign it was constituted, not by a mere nomination, but by a solemn act of the parliament; the king, at the request of the commons and by the advice and assent of the lords, elected certain persons of state as well spiritual as temporal to be counsellors assisting in government¹. This council consisted of the protector and the duke of Exeter, five bishops, five earls, two barons, and three knights; a few names were added in 1423, and again in 1430². In addition to its ordinary functions, this council was a real council of regency, and by no means a mere consultative body in attendance on the protector. It defined its own power in the statement that upon it during the king's minority devolved the exercise and execution of all the powers of sovereignty³. It may therefore be regarded as superseding or merging in its own higher functions the ordinary powers of the continual council; but it was really the same body. The result, however, of the union of the two functions seems to have been that, after Henry came of age and the executive power of the council ceased, the parliament either forgot or did not care to exercise any influence in the selection of the council; as early as 1437 the king had begun to nominate absolutely⁴; it became again a mere instrument in the hands of the king or the court, and was often in opposition to the parliament or to the men by whom the parliament was led. The removal of the old council then became a measure of reform, and Henry's promise to nominate a sad and grave council was one of the means by which he proposed to strengthen a general pacification⁵. During the protectorship of the duke of York, the council again assumed the character of a regency for a short time, the king, although he admitted

¹ Rot. Parl. iv. 175.

² Ib. iv. 201, 344.

³ Above, p. 108.

⁴ Nov. 12, 1437, at S. John's, Clerkenwell, the lords of the council were reappointed and new names added; 'and the king wol that after the fourme as power was gyve by King Henry IV to his counsaillers, that the kyng's counsaillers that now be, that they so do, after a cedula that was rade there the which passed in the parlement tyme of K. H. the iiij;,' Ordinances, &c. v. 71; Rot. Parl. v. 438.

⁵ See above, p. 162; Rot. Parl. v. 240.

the authority of a protector, preferring to lodge the executive power in the council¹. No thorough reconstitution of the council was however made during the reign, and to the last it contained only the great lords who were on Henry's side, with the great officers of state and other nominees of the court.

Edward IV, following perhaps the advice of Sir John Fortescue, or the plan adopted by Michael de la Pole under Richard II, mingled with the baronial element in the council a number of new men on whom he could personally rely, and who were in close connexion with the Wydviles. It may be questioned whether the position which the privy council henceforth occupied was directly the result of an arbitrary policy on the part of the crown, or of the weakness of the parliament; but, however it gained that position, it retained it during the Tudor period, and became under Henry VII and Henry VIII an irresponsible committee of government, through the agency of which the constitutional changes of that period were forced on the nation, were retarded or accelerated.

Change in the character of council under Edward IV and the Tudors.

Not content with securing such a public nomination of the privy council as gave the estates a practical veto on the appointment of unpopular members, the parliament attempted, by the imposition of oaths or rules of proceeding and by regulating the payments made to the councillors, to retain a control of their behaviour. In 1406 the commons prayed that the lords of the council might be reasonably rewarded for their labour and diligence²; in 1410 the prince of Wales, for himself and his fellow-councillors, prayed to be excused from serving unless means could be found for enabling them to support the necessary charges³; in the minority of Henry VI the salaries of the members were very high; in 1431 they were secured to them according to a regular tariff⁴; and in 1433 the self-denying policy of the duke of Bedford enabled him, by obtaining a Parliament imposes oaths on the council and regulates the wages of councillors.

Payments to councillors.

¹ Above, p. 179; Rot. Parl. v. 289, 290.

² Rot. Parl. iii. 577.

³ Ib. iii. 634.

⁴ Ib. iv. 374. The archbishops and cardinal Beaufort had 300 marks; other bishops 200; the treasurer 200; earls 200; barons and bannerets £100; esquires £40. Cf. Ordinances, iii. 155-158, 202, 222, 266.

reduction of this item of account, to secure a considerable economy¹. The duke of York, when he accepted the protectorship in 1455, insisted on the payment of the council². The provision for the wages of the permanent council was one of the particular points of Fortescue's scheme; but by that time the parliament had ceased to possess or claim any direct control over the payment.

Rules and regulations for the councillors.

It was not so with the rules which were prescribed for the conduct or management of business, and the oaths and charges by which those rules were enforced. Several codes of articles, running back to the days of Edward I, still existed³; and various attempts were made throughout the fifteenth century to improve upon them. The rolls of parliament for 1406, 1424, and 1430 contain such regulations, which are constantly illustrated by the proceedings of the council. Those of 1406 were enacted in parliament and enrolled as an act⁴; those of 1424 were contained in a schedule annexed to the act of nomination⁵; those of 1430 were drawn up in the council itself, approved by the lords and read in the presence of the three estates, after which they were subscribed by the councillors⁶. Copies of these documents are preserved also among the records of the privy council; especially one drawn up at Reading in December 1426⁷. The object of these regulations was in general to prevent the councillors from accepting or sanctioning gifts of land, from prosecuting or maintaining private suits, from revealing the secrets of the body, or neglecting the king's business⁸. Others prescribe rules for the removal of unworthy members, and guard against the usurpations of individuals by fixing a quorum⁹. The anxiety of the councillors to avoid the oath and to be released from it after the expiration of their

Object of these rules.

¹ Rot. Parl. iv. 446; above, p. 122.

² Rot. Parl. v. 286.

³ See vol. ii. p. 270; Foed. i. 1009; Fleta, i. c. 17; Coke, 4 Inst. p. 54; Rot. Parl. i. 218, iii. 246, iv. 423; Ordinances (1390), i. 18.

⁴ Rot. Parl. iii. 585-589; Ordinances, i. 297.

⁵ Rot. Parl. iv. 201 sq.; Ordinances, iii. 148-152.

⁶ Rot. Parl. iv. 343, 344; Ordinances, iv. 59-66.

⁷ Rot. Parl. v. 407; Ordinances, iii. 213-221. See also one of 1425; Ordinances, iii. 175; and Lambard, Archeion, pp. 141-147.

⁸ Ordinances, i. 18.

⁹ Rot. Parl. iv. 343, v. 408.

term of office¹, and the strict conditions² on which they insist before accepting office, seem to show that the method adopted was sufficiently stringent to be effectual. There can be little doubt that the council thus nominated, regulated, and watched by the parliament was a substantive and most valuable feature of the Lancastrian system of government: not new, not uniform in its composition, powers, or policy at different times, but always forming a link between the king and the parliament, responsible to both, and, during at least fifty years, maintaining the balance of force between the two.

Valid exercise of parliamentary influence over the council.

The powers of the council thus formed and guided were very great; and the definition which was laid down in 1427, by which they claim to have the execution of all the powers of the crown during the king's minority, needs perhaps but a slight alteration to make it applicable to their perpetual functions. Their work was to counsel and assist the king in the execution of every power of the crown which was not exercised through the machinery of the common law. It was in the matter of judicial proceedings only that their action was restricted; and, as the king had long ceased to act as judge in person in the courts, his council had no place there. The petitions against their assumption of jurisdiction in matters cognisable at common law, which had been frequent under Richard II³, did not wholly cease under his successor⁴; but few cases, if any, of judicial oppression by the council can be adduced during the period; and in the year 1453 by an act of parliament the chancellor was empowered to enforce the attendance of all persons summoned by writ of privy seal before the king and his council in all cases not determinable by common law⁵. Beyond the region of the common law the Powers of the council defined.

Objections to their judicial acts.

¹ Rot. Parl. iv. 176, 423. See also the important articles addressed to Richard II by the council, protesting against his interference; Ordinances, i. 84 sq.

² Rot. Parl. iii. 609, 632.

³ See above, vol. ii. pp. 634 sq.

⁴ Rot. Parl. iii. 471.

⁵ 31 Hen. VI, c. 2; Statutes, ii. 361, 362. The court of Star Chamber, as the judicature of the council in special cases, was organised by the Act 3 Hen. VII, c. 1, which appointed the chancellor, treasurer, privy seal, a bishop, a lord temporal of the council, and the two chief justices, as judges. The privy councillors however retained their places: hence the Powers of the council.

Legislative authority.

Financial authority.

Variety of financial expedients.

Council empowered to give security for loans.

council retained the right of advising the king in knotty cases and appeals, in which the opinion of the judges was likewise asked. As to powers of legislation and taxation, the parliament was more liberal; the power of ordaining relaxations of the statutes of the staple or of provisors was formally intrusted to the king and council¹; they were watched, and, when the result was bad, were requested to abstain from or suspend proceedings. Financial business was also expressly intrusted to them, almost from the beginning of the Lancastrian reigns; a fact which, while it shows the confidence felt by the nation in the honesty of the king and his ministers, proves unmistakably the great difficulty of obtaining supplies, the poverty of the crown, and the scarcity of money. To go through the particular expedients adopted by the council itself would be to write the whole financial history of the time; it was by the advice of the council that the king was able to borrow money by writs of privy seal²; more than once the members contributed gifts or loans from their private purses to meet an emergency³, or gave personal security, or wrote letters of personal application to lords or merchants⁴. In the most important junctures, however, they received power from parliament, either to stop the outgoings of money⁵, or to give security for the large loans by which the accruing taxes were anticipated. In the year 1421 the lords of the council were empowered by parliament to give security for the king's debts incurred in the proposed expedition to France⁶. Up to this time the loans had generally been obtained by assigning to the creditor certain portions of the revenue⁷; thus bishop Beaufort's great loans had been recovered by him from the customs⁸; sometimes the credit of the lords was pledged, as dispute whether this was a new court or an old one: Coke, 4 Inst. p. 61; Lambard, Archeion, pp. 163 sq.

¹ Rot. Parl. iii. 428, 491.

² Ordinances, ii. 31, 280, 281.

³ As in 1400, see above, p. 28; Ordinances, i. 104, 105; in 1425, ib. iii. 167.

⁴ See Ordinances, i. 200 sq. (1403); 343, 347 (1410).

⁵ Ordinances, iii. 348.

⁶ Rot. Parl. iv. 130.

⁷ Ib. iv. 95, 96; Ordinances, ii. 170.

⁸ Rot. Parl. iv. 111, 132, 210, 275, &c., 496.

in 1419¹. From 1421, however, the mere prudent practice was followed with some regularity; the sums for which the council were authorised to give security increased from £20,000 in 1425² to £40,000 in 1426, £24,000 in 1427³, £50,000 in 1429 and 1431⁴, 100,000 marks in 1433⁵, and £100,000 in 1435, 1437, 1439, 1442, and 1447⁶. After the death of cardinal Beaufort these acts of security disappear, and other expedients were adopted, which illustrate both the exigencies of the court and the waning confidence placed by the country in the privy council.

The office of the council in hearing petitions addressed to the king continues during the period before us much the same as it had been under Edward III and Richard; the chamberlain being the officer to whose care such documents were intrusted. The jealousy of the commons was not aroused by the quasi-judicial character of the proceedings, as it was against the summons by letter of privy seal and the writ of subpoena. The diversity of petitions which appear on the rolls of parliament, variously addressed to the king, the lords, the commons, the king and the lords, the lords and the commons, or the council, must have given employment to a large class of lawyers, whose action in the parliament itself was occasionally deprecated. It could only be after much urgency that such petitions reached either king or council. Nor was the correspondence of the council at all confined to petitions and their answers; letters, reports from every department of state, and applications for money, were addressed to them as commonly and as freely as to the king himself⁷.

Petitions heard in council.

Variety of forms of petition.

Correspondence of council.

It is hardly possible to specify particularly the less definite functions of the council; they are coextensive on the one hand

¹ Rot. Parl. iv. 95, 96, 117; and in 1434, Ordinances, iv. 202. So too in 1423 the feoffees of the duchy of Lancaster lent the king £1000 on the personal security of the lords of the council; Ordinances, iii. 135.

² Rot. Parl. iv. 277.

³ Ib. iv. 300, 317.

⁴ Ib. iv. 339, 374.

⁵ Ib. iv. 426.

⁶ Ib. iv. 482, 504; v. 7, 39, 135.

⁷ On the minute points of practice in matters of petitions, see besides the Rolls of Parliament, passim, and the Proceedings of the Privy Council, the remarks of Sir Harry Nicolas in the prefaces to the latter work; i. p. xxv; ii. pp. xii, xxxi; vi. pp. xc sq.

Large share of the council in executive business.

with royal prerogative, all exercise of which was a matter for advice in this assembly; every sort of ordinance, pardon, licence, and the like, which the king could authorise, was passed through the council; and where, on the other hand, special powers were, as we have seen, vested in the king by parliament, they were exercised with the advice of the council.

Relation of the privy council to the great councils.

Besides its relation to the king and the parliament, the privy council had a direct relation to the great councils which were often called by the Lancastrian kings on occasions on which it was not necessary or desirable to call a parliament. These great councils, the constitution of which was very indefinite, were essentially deliberative rather than executive, but they very often appear rather as enlarged and 'afforced' sessions of the privy council, than as separate assemblies. It is probable that the theory which gives to all the peers of the realm the right of approaching the king with advice was thus reduced to practice; and that, as volunteer advisers, any of the lords who chose might occasionally attend the council. But the more formal sessions of the great council were attended by persons summoned by writs of privy seal, sometimes in large numbers¹; and thus was formed an assembly of notables whose advice, though welcome, was not conclusive. As these assemblies had no regular constitution or place in the parliamentary system, it is only now and then that a record of their proceedings has been preserved. They may however, on all important occasions of their sitting, be regarded either as extra-parliamentary sessions of the house of lords or as enlarged meetings of the royal council. In both characters they are found acting, as we have seen, in questions of the regency after the death of Henry V, in the disputes between Beaufort and Gloucester, and in the preliminary work of parliament, as had been usual before parliament became a full representation of the three estates.

Loose constitution of the great
council.

368. The relations of the council to the king and the parliament had thus gained definiteness and recognition. Scarcely less was this the case with the direct relations between the crown and the parliament. The period before us witnessed some very important exemplifications of the matured action of the constitution in this respect also. The house of lords, for so the baronage may be now called, underwent under the Lancastrian kings none but personal changes, and such formal modifications as the institution of marquessates and viscounties; their powers remain the same as before, and in matters where they attempt a separate action, as for instance in the arrangement of the regency or protectorate, their action, which is in itself as much the action of the great council as of the baronage eo nomine, is generally confirmed by an act of the whole parliament. Such minor particulars as are worth recording may be noted in another chapter, in which the antiquities of parliament may be examined in regular order. The history of the house of commons, on the other hand, furnishes some valuable illustrations of constitutional practice. These illustrations, many of which have been noted already, and many of which must be recapitulated again, may be for our present purpose arranged in their natural order under the heads of organisation of the house of commons, including election, privilege, freedom of conference and freedom of debate, and the powers of the house of commons as a part of the collective parliament, exercised in general deliberation, legislative action, taxation, and control of the national administration.

¹ See for example the list of persons summoned in 1401, Ordinances, i. 155 sq.; and others, ib. 179, 180; ii. 73, 80, 85; iii. 322; iv. 191; v. 237, 238; vi. 163, 206, &c. Most of the great councils here indicated have been noticed already.

Relations between the crown and the parliament.

The house of lords.

Questions touching the house of commons.

The regulation of the county elections with a view to securing not merely a fair representation but the choice of competent counsellors for the national senate, was a point upon which some consideration had been spent under Edward III, whom we have seen rejecting all propositions made for limiting the electoral body and diminishing the powers of the old county courts¹. Much jealousy of the right of the full county court to elect had been evinced on more than one occasion; Edward's ordinance against the choice of lawyers had remained a dead letter²; Richard had been obliged to withdraw from his writs in 1388

County elections.

Maintenance of the right of the county court to elect knights of the shire;

¹ Vol. ii. pp. 445, 453.

² Vol. ii. p. 445.

evaded by the sheriffs or great men.

Regulations enacted in 1406.

Penalties for infringement of these.

Residents to be chosen.

the words which directed the election of persons who had taken no part in the recent quarrels¹; his interference in the elections of 1397 was one of the grounds of his deposition², and Henry IV had been taken to task for excluding lawyers from the parliament of Coventry in 1404³. Yet there can be little doubt that the right, however jealously watched, was sparingly exercised; that, under the influence of the crown or of the great lords, the sheriffs often returned their own nominees; and that neither the composition of the county court, the regularity of its proceedings, nor the way of ascertaining its decisions, was very definitely fixed. Sometimes a few great men settled the elections, sometimes a noisy crowd failed to arrive at any definite choice, sometimes the sheriff returned whom he pleased. It was to remedy this uncertainty that Henry IV in 1406 enacted on the petition of the commons that, in the first county court held after the reception of the writ, proclamation should be made of the day and place of parliament, and that all persons present, whether suitors duly summoned for the purpose or others, should attend the election; they should then proceed to the election freely and indifferently, notwithstanding any request or command to the contrary, and the names of the persons chosen should be written in an indenture under the seals of the persons choosing them: this indenture should be tacked to the writ and considered to be the sheriff's return⁴. This act, so far as the electoral body was concerned, only declared the existing custom; but the notice, the prohibition of undue influence and the institution of the indenture, took from the sheriff all opportunity of making a false return. An act of 1410 vested in the justices of assize the power of inquiring into the returns, fining the sheriffs in the sum of £100 where the law had been broken, and condemning the members unduly returned to forfeit their wages⁵. The first parliament of Henry V restricted both the electoral vote and the choice of the electors to residents within the county, city, or borough for which they were to elect

¹ Lords' Report, iv. 727.

² Rot. Parl. iii. 420.

³ Above, p. 51.

⁴ 7 Hen. IV, c. 15; Stat. ii. 156.

⁵ 11 Hen. IV, c. 1; Stat. ii. 162.

members¹. In 1427 the effect of the act of 1406 was so far modified as to allow the accused sheriffs and knights to make answer and traverse before any justices of assize, so that they should not be fined unless they had been duly convicted². Three years afterwards, in the eighth year of Henry VI, was passed the restrictive act which, in consequence of the tumults made in the county courts 'by great attendance of people of small substance and no value, whereof every of them pretended a voice equivalent, as to such elections, with the most worthy knights and squires resident,' established the rule that only resident persons possessed of a freehold worth forty shillings a year should be allowed to vote, and that the majority of such votes should decide the election³. In 1432 it was ordered that the qualifying freehold should be within the county⁴. These regulations received further authority by an act of the twenty-third year of the same king, which, after recounting several abuses that had recently revived, gave minute rules for the enforcement of these and the preceding statutes, and prescribed that the representatives of the shires, henceforth to be chosen, should be notable knights, esquires, or gentlemen able to be knights, and not of the degree of yeomen or under⁵. The restriction of the electoral franchise to the class which was qualified to serve on juries commended itself to moderate politicians of the fifteenth century. There is no evidence to show that the allegations of the statute with respect to the disorders of the county court are untrue. But the history of the particular years in which the changes were made throws no light upon the special circumstances that called for legislation, and, what is more curious, the acts seem to have produced no change whatever in the character or standing of the persons returned; they were all, however, passed at the request of the commons and in orderly times. Henry V had not the will, and the council of Henry VI had not the power, to reject a proposal of amended practice in favour of an ill-defined and abused prescription. The key to the question is Forty-shilling freeholders to elect.

Freehold to lie within the county.

Knights, not yeomen, to be chosen.

¹ 1 Hen. V, c. 1; Stat. ii. 170.

² 6 Hen. VI, c. 4; Stat. ii. 235.

³ 8 Hen. VI, c. 7; Stat. ii. 243.

⁴ 10 Hen. VI, c. 2; Stat. ii. 273.

⁵ 23 Hen. VI, c. 14; Stat. ii. 340 sq.

Result of social changes.

probably to be found in the social changes which had been at work since the days of Edward III, and which belong to another part of our subject. We have seen how during the struggle of parties in the latter years of Henry VI, especially by the returns made to the parliament of Coventry in 1459, the forms of election were evaded and dispensed with.

Freedom of action in parliament, increased under the Lancaster
kings.

369. Next to purity of election the great requisite of the national council was freedom of action; and this, whether exemplified in the maintenance of the privilege of members, of the right of conference with the lords, of the freedom of the Speaker, or of freedom of debate, was sufficiently strengthened by practice under the three Henries. The most signal examples have been noticed already; the case of the Speaker Thorpe being the most important instance of disputed privilege¹, and the discussions of Henry IV with Savage and Chaucer the most significant occasions on which the privilege of the Speaker was asserted². The right of conference with the lords, which had been conceded as a matter of grace by Edward III and Richard II, was claimed from and allowed by Henry IV, under protest, in 1402³ and 1404⁴; in 1407 the king was obliged to concede the whole question so far as money grants were concerned. The last occasion secured to the two houses perfect freedom of debate, and deserves special notice.

The increase of liberty in the commons.

Henry IV, no doubt instructed by his parliamentary experience as earl of Derby, had more than once shown irritation at the conduct of the commons, and they in return had been somewhat tedious. In 1401 they had requested that they might have good advice and deliberation without being called upon suddenly to answer on the most important matters at the end of the parliament, as had been usual. The king was affronted at the request, and commissioned the earl of Worcester to disown any such subtlety as was imputed to him. A day or two after they begged the king not to listen to any report of their proceedings before they themselves informed him of them; and Henry acquiesced⁵. In 1407 however, in the parliament of

Henry IV promises not to interfere in deliberations.

¹ Above, p. 169. ² Above, pp. 31, 69.

⁴ Ib. iii. 523; above, p. 43.

³ Rot. Parl. iii. 486; above, p. 38.

⁵ Rot. Parl. iii. 455, 456.

Gloucester, the king, without reference to the commons, inquired of the lords what aid was required for the exigencies of the moment, and, having received their answer, sent for a certain number of the commons to hear and report the opinion of the lords. Twelve members were sent, and their report greatly disturbed the house; the king saw fit to recall the impolitic measure and to recognise the rule that on money grants he should receive the determination of the two houses by the mouth of the speaker of the commons¹. The leaving of the determination of the money grant to that estate which being collectively the richest was individually the poorest of the three was consonant to common sense; where taxation fell on all in the same proportion, the commons might safely be trusted not to vote too much: sparing their own pockets, they spared those of the lords. But the importance of the event is not confined to the points thus illustrated; it contains a full recognition of freedom of deliberation.

Money grants to be declared by the speaker.

The right of the commons to consider and debate on every matter of public interest was secured to them by the recognition of their freedom of deliberation; for although in words the king acknowledged only their right to 'commune on the state of the realm and the necessary remedies,' there was no question of foreign policy or domestic administration that might not be brought under that head. The kings moreover, in the old idea of involving the third estate in a common responsibility with themselves for all national designs, did not hesitate to lay all sorts of business before them; and the commons, as before, were inclined to hang back rather than rashly to approach matters in which they saw they might have little influence and incur much blame. The care taken by Henry V in preparing for his French war is an abundant illustration of this²; but many other examples may be found. The petitions on Lollardy show that even the clergy were not jealous of the commons when they were ranged on the side of orthodoxy; the closing of the great schism was a matter on which the chancellor dilated in his opening speech and on which the commons of their own accord

Right of the commons to debate all matters of public interest.

¹ Rot. Parl. iii. 609; see above, p. 63.

² Above, pp. 85-87.

Discussion on foreign politics.

On the treaty of Troyes.

On the quarrels of the lords.

urged the king to labour¹. The treaty between Henry V and Sigismund in 1416 was read before the commons as well as the lords, and by their common advice and assent, in the parliament and by authority of the same, ratified, approved, and confirmed². The treaty of Troyes contained a provision that without the consent of the three estates of the two kingdoms peace should not be made with the dauphin; in 1446 the commons joined in the act by which the king was released from that obligation³. Nor was any great reluctance felt to allow the commons to touch the most delicate questions that came before the council: in 1426 the speaker of the commons was bold enough to express to the duke of Bedford their sorrow for the quarrels which had taken place between the great lords, referring unquestionably to Beaufort and Gloucester⁴; in 1427 they petitioned the king to intercede with the pope in favour of archbishop Chichele⁵; in 1433 they joined in taking the oath of concord by which Bedford attempted to secure union in the government and national support for it before he left England, and in the same parliament they petitioned the king that Bedford might remain in the country⁶. It is, however, unnecessary to multiply examples of a truth which is apparent in every article of the parliamentary rolls. With the single exception of the cases in which the parliament attempted to tax the spiritualities or otherwise interfere with the administration of the clergy, there is really no exception to the accepted rule, that every question of home administration or foreign policy might be canvassed in the assembly of the commons.

Share of the commons in legislation.

The share of the commons in legislation, whether expressed by the mention of their petition in the preamble of the statutes, or by their assent to measures which had been previously discussed by the lords, may be regarded as theoretically complete before Henry IV began to reign. But for several years there continues to be seen some mistrust of the honesty of the officials in the process of turning petitions into acts, or ingrossing the ¹ Rot. Parl. iii. 465, 492; iv. 70 sq. ² Ib. iv. 96, 79; Rymer, ix. 403.

³ See above, p. 138.

⁴ Rot. Parl. iv. 296.

⁵ Ib. iv. 322.

⁶ Ib. iv. 422 sq.; above, p. 122.

acts themselves. In 1401, as we have seen, the speaker had to petition that the commons might not be hurried through public business; and that the petitions which were granted might be enrolled before the justices left the parliament¹. In the same parliament they informed the king that they had been told that the permission given him in the last session to dispense with the statute of provisors had been enacted and entered in the roll in a form different from that in which it was granted. The king under protest allowed the rolls to be searched, and it was found that the commons were mistaken². In 1406 they asked that certain elected members might be appointed to view the enrolment and ingrossing of the acts of parliament; and this was granted³. But the prejudice no doubt continued to be strongly felt, and it was not until the second year of Henry V that the full security was obtained, and the king undertook that the acts when finally drawn up should correspond exactly with the petitions⁴. The plan, subsequently adopted, of initiating legislation by bill rather than by petition, completed, so far as rules could insure it, the remedy of the evil. A good instance of the careful superintendence which the commons kept up over the wording of public documents is found in the parliament of 1404, when the king submitted to them the form of the commissions of array about to be issued; the commons cancelled certain clauses and words and requested that for the future such commissions should be issued only in the corrected form. The king consulted the lords and judges, and very graciously agreed⁵.

Pains taken by the commons to secure the exact enrolment of their petitions when granted.

Henry V secures them in the right.

The attempt to bind together remedial legislation and grants of money, to make supply depend upon the redress of grievances, was directly and boldly made by the commons in 1401; the commons prayed that before they made any grant they might be informed of the answers to their petitions⁶. The king's answer, given on the last day of the session, amounted to a peremptory refusal; he said 'that this mode of proceeding had not been seen or used in the time of his progenitors or

Attempt to make supply depend on redress.

The king's refusal.

¹ Rot. Parl. iii. 455, 456.

² Ib. iii. 465.

³ Ib. iii. 585.

⁴ See above, p. 84. ⁵ Rot. Parl. iv. 526, 527.

⁶ Ib. iii. 458.

predecessors, that they should have any answer to their petitions before they had shown and done all their other business of parliament, whether it were matter of a grant or otherwise; the king would not in any way change the good customs and usages made and used of ancient times.' It is probable, however, that the point was really secured by the practice, almost immediately adopted, of delaying the grant to the last day of the session, by which time no doubt the really important petitions had received their answer, and at which time they were enrolled¹. Speedy execution, however, was a different thing, and the petition of the commons for it proves that delay was a weapon by no means idle or harmless in the hands of the servants of the law.

The object informally gained.

Share of the commons in taxation, expressed in the words of the grant.

370. That the commons should have a decisive share in the bestowal of money grants had become since the reign of Edward III an admitted principle; and the observance of the rule is illustrated by the history of every parliament. In the foregoing pages the regular votes of taxation have been noticed as they occurred; and the decision of Henry IV in 1407 has been referred to as recognising the right of the commons to originate, and, after it has received the assent of the lords, to announce the grant, generally on the last day of the session. The ordinary form of the grant expresses this; it was made by the commons with the assent of the lords spiritual and temporal. This particular form curiously enough occurs first in the grants made to Richard II in 1395, the previous votes of money having been made by the lords and commons conjointly². It was observed in 1401 and 1402, and henceforth³ became the constitutional form. It may however be questioned whether Henry's dictum in 1407 was at the time understood to recognise

¹ Sir H. Nicolas (Ordin. i. p. lxiv) mentions a case in which it was ordered that an error in the Roll should be corrected, and no such correction appears to have been made: from which he argues that the Rolls may not have been ingrossed for two or three years after the session. But this could only be exceptional.

² Rot. Parl. iii. 331.

³ Not however without exceptions. In 1404 the lords temporal for themselves and the ladies temporal and all other persons temporal granted a tax of 20s. on the £20 of land; Rot. Parl. iii. 546.

the exclusive right of the commons to originate the grant. On one occasion in the reign of Edward IV there was a marked departure from the form established by long usage. This was in 1472, when on the occasion of an act for raising a force of 13,000 archers, the commons, with the advice and assent of the lords, granted a tenth of the revenue and income not belonging to the lords of parliament; and the lords, without any reference to the advice of the commons, followed it up with a similar grant from their own property¹. It is questionable whether this was not a breach of the accepted understanding, but no objection was taken to it at the time; the grant, as a means of raising additional funds, failed of its object, and it did not become a precedent. The attempt of the commons in 1449 to tax the stipendiary clergy, an attempt perhaps made by oversight, was defeated by the king, who referred the petition which contained their proposal to the lords spiritual to be transmitted to the convocation². As however throughout this period the convocations followed, with but slight variations, the example set by the commons, the practical as well as the formal determination of the money grants may be safely regarded as having now become one of the recognised functions of the third estate.

Departure from the ordinary usage.

Attempt of the commons to tax the stipendiary clergy.

371. The power which the exercise of this function gave them was freely employed in more critical matters than those of political deliberation and legislation; and perhaps the hold which it gave them on the royal administration, both in state and household, is the point in which the growth of constitutional ideas is most signally illustrated by the history of this century. The practice of appropriating particular grants to particular purposes had been claimed under Richard II³; it was observed under Henry IV and his successors; the greater grants were almost invariably assigned to the defence of the realm; tunnage and poundage became the recognised provision for the safeguard of the sea⁴; the remnants of the ancient crown lands were set apart for the expenses of the household, for which they were obviously insufficient, and supplementary Appropriation of grants to special purposes.

¹ Rot. Parl. vi. 4-8.

³ Vol. ii. § 287.

² Ib. v. 152, 153.

⁴ See above, p. 250.

Assignments to the king,
to Calais,

to the household.

Separation of the household charges from those of the kingdom.

Increasing poverty of the crown.

Acts of resumption.

grants were made from the other sources of national income to enable the king to pay his expenses; and, even before Calais had become the only foreign possession of the crown, a certain portion or poundage of the subsidy on wool was regularly assigned to it¹. But it was the exigencies of the household which gave the commons their greatest hold on the crown, and it was a hold which the kings rarely attempted to elude or to resist. One result of their interference in this respect was the separation of the household or ordinary charges, the civil list or king's list, as Fortescue calls it, from the extraordinary charges of the crown; a point which the commons attempted to secure in 1404, by apportioning revenue to the amount of £12,100; in 1406 it was proposed to vote £10,000 for the purpose, and in 1413 the sum was assigned to the king as a payment to take precedence of all others, in consideration of the great changes of his hostel, chamber, and wardrobe. The attempts made to regulate the lavish expenditure and to relieve the poverty of Henry VI have been enumerated in our survey of the history of his reign. They show, by the diminution of the sums apportioned to him, either that the royal demesnes were alarmingly reduced and the royal estate abridged, or else that the distinction between royal and national expenditure was more clearly seen, and the different departments more independently administered. The acts of resumption which had been urged by the commons from the very beginning of the century were, first in 1450, adopted by Henry VI as a means of recruiting his treasury, but they contained invariably such a list of exceptions as must have nearly neutralised the intended effect of the acts. The crown continued very poor until Edward IV and Henry VII devised new modes of enriching themselves, and in its poverty the commons saw their great opportunity of interference.

¹ For example, in 1449, the commons petition that 20s. from each sack of wool taxed for the subsidy may be assigned to Calais, 10s. for wages, 5s. for victualling, 5s. for repairs. The king alters this, and assigns 13s. 4d. for wages and victuals, and 6s. 8d. for repairs; Rot. Parl. v. 146, 147. A similar arrangement had been made in 1423 by the Council; Ord. iii. 19, 95.

Very signal examples of such interference force themselves on our notice both early and late. The request made in 1404 that Henry IV would dismiss his confessor, was followed up with a petition for the removal of aliens from the household¹. In 1450 Henry VI was asked to send away almost all his faithful friends². He was told that his gifts were too lavish and must be resumed³. In every case he had to yield, and it was his unwillingness as well as his inability to resist that caused the nation to conceive for him a dislike and contempt, from which the goodness of his intentions might have saved him. Where the private affairs of the household were thus scrutinised, it could not be expected that the conduct of public officers could escape. The practice of impeachment directed against Michael de la Pole in 1386 was revived in 1450 for the destruction of his grandson. But the process of events during the wars of the Roses was too rapid to allow the parliaments, imperfect and one-sided as they were, to be regarded as fair tribunals. The constitution receives from such proceedings more lessons of warning than of edification. The impeached minister, like the king who is put on his trial, when he has become weak enough to be impeached, may remain too strong to be acquitted; and the majority which is strong enough to impeach is strong enough to condemn. In Suffolk's case, as we have seen, neither king nor lords had strength enough to insure a just trial; Henry's decision was an evasion of a hostile attack rather than the breach of a recognised rule. The bills of attainder, which on both sides followed the alternations of fortune in the field, illustrate political and personal vindictiveness, but contribute only a miserable series of constitutional precedents. The prohibition of appeals of treason made in parliament, which was enacted by Henry IV in 1399⁴, was a salutary act, although it did not preclude the use of the still more fatal weapons. The rejected petition of 1432⁵, in which the commons prayed that, neither in parliament nor council, should any one be put on trial for articles touching freehold and Interference of the commons with the action of the king.

Practice of impeachment.

Bills of attainder.

¹ Rot. Parl. iii. 524, 527.

⁴ Above, p. 24.

² Ib. v. 216.

³ Ib. v. 217.

⁵ Rot. Parl. iv. 403; above, p. 119.

inheritance, showed a perception of the entire unfitness of a legislative assembly for entertaining such impeachments. But the practice was too strong to be met by weak legislation, and had, with all its cruelty and unfairness, some vindication in the lesson which it could not fail to impress on unworthy ministers.

Audit of accounts insisted on.

The rule of insisting on a proper audit of accounts was a corollary from the practice of appropriating the supplies to particular purposes. It was one which was scarcely worth contesting. In 1406 the commons, who objected to making a grant until the accounts of the last grant were audited, were told by Henry that 'kings do not render accounts;' but the boast was a vain one; the accounts were in 1407 laid before the commons without being asked for; and the victory so secured was never again formally contested. The statement laid by Lord Cromwell before the parliament of 1433 shows that the time was past for any reticence on the king's part with regard to money matters¹.

Secured.

General conclusion from these facts,

In this attempt to enumerate and generalise upon the chief constitutional incidents of a long period, it is not worth while at every point to pronounce a judgment on the good faith of the crown or the honesty of the commons; or to discuss the question whether it was by compulsion or by respect to the terms of their coronation engagements that the Lancastrian kings were actuated in their overt acceptance and maintenance of constitutional rules. It is upon the fact that those rules were observed and strengthened by observance, that they were not broken when the king was strong, or disingenuously evaded when he was weak, that the practical vindication of the dynasty must turn. Henry IV, as has been said more than once, was a constitutional politician before he became king, and cannot be charged with hypocrisy because when he became king he acted on the principles which he had professed as a subject. Henry V in all that he did carried with him the heart of his people. Henry VI was honest; he had been brought up to honour and abide by the decisions of his parliament; the charge of falseness,

The rule of the house of Lancaster was constitutional.

¹ Above, pp. 55, 121.

by which the strong so often attempt to destroy the last refuge which the weak find in the pity and sympathy of mankind, is nowhere proved, and very rarely even asserted, against him. But the case in favour of these kings does not depend on technicalities. By their devotion to the work of the country, by the thorough nationality of their aims, their careful protection of the interests of trade and commerce, their maintenance of the universities, the policy of their alliances, their attention to the fleet as the strongest national arm¹, the first two Henries, Bedford, Beaufort, and in a less degree Henry VI and Gloucester, vindicated the position they claimed as national ministers, sovereign or subject.

Best side of the Lancaster rule.

372. There is another side to the question. The Lancastrian reigns were to a great extent a period of calamity. There were pestilences, famines, and wars: the incessant border warfare of the reign of Henry IV tells not only of royal poverty and weakness, but of impolicy and of disregard for human suffering. The war of Henry V in France must be condemned by the judgment of modern opinion; it was a bold, a desperate undertaking, fraught with suffering to all concerned in it; but it is as a great national enterprise, too great for the nation which undertook it to maintain, that it chiefly presents itself among the prominent features of the time. It is common and easy to exaggerate the miseries of this war; its cost to England in treasure and blood was by no means so great as the length of its duration and the extent of its operations would suggest. The French administration of Bedford was maintained in great measure by taxing the French², rather than by raising supplies

Misfortunes of the Lancaster reigns.

Mischief wrought by the long war.

¹ The Libel of English Policy, whether addressed to Cardinal Beaufort or to Kemp, Stafford, or Hungerford before 1436, in a very remarkable way presses the safeguard of the sea and the development of commerce upon the ministers; it shows however that some such pressure was needed; quoting the saying of Sigismund, that Dover and Calais were the two eyes of England, and looking back with regret on the more efficient administration of Henry V. It is printed in the Political Poems, vol. ii. pp. 157-205; and recently in Germany, edited by Hertzberg, with a preface by Pauli. There is a tract of Sir John Fortescue to the same purpose, Opp. i. p. 549. See too Capgrave, Ill. Henr. p. 134.

² £20,000 a year however was paid by Henry VI to the Duke of York as lieutenant of France; Ord. v. 171.

Exhaustion produced by the war.

from England, and the great occasions of bloodshed were few and far between. But it did produce anarchy and exhaustion in France, and over-exertion and consequent exhaustion in England; and from these combined causes arose the most prominent of the impulses that drove Henry VI from the throne. Still the war was to a certain extent felt to be a national glory, and the peace that ended it a national disgrace, which added a sense of loss and defeat over and above the consciousness that so much had been spent in vain.

These causes insufficient to account for the fall of the house of Lancaster.

But neither national exhaustion, resulting from this and other causes, nor the factious designs of the house of York, nor the misguided feeling of the nation with respect to the peace, nor the unhappy partisanship and still more unhappy leadership of Margaret of Anjou, would have sufficed to unseat the Lancastrian house, if there had not been a deeper and more penetrating source of weakness; a source of weakness that accounts for the alienation of the heart of the people, and might under other circumstances have justified even such a revolution. When the commons urged upon Henry IV the need of better and stronger governance, they touched the real, deep, and fatal evil which in the end was to wear out the patience of England. Although sound and faithful in constitutional matters, the Lancastrian kings were weak administrators at the moment when the nation required a strong government. It was so from the very beginning¹. Constitutional progress had outrun administrative order. Perhaps the very steps of constitutional progress were gained by reason of that weakness of the central power which made perfect order and thorough administration of the law impossible; perhaps the sources of mischief were inherent in the social state of the country rather than in its institutions or the administration of them; but the result is the same on either supposition; following events proved it. The Tudor government, without half the constitutional liberties of the Lancastrian reigns, possessed a force and cogency, an

Inherent weakness.

¹ See the letter addressed to Henry IV by Philip Repingdon in 1401; Beckington, i. 151; Ad. Usk, pp. 65, 66; letter of Chandler to Beckington in 1452; ib. p. 268.

energy and a decision, which was even more necessary than law itself. A parallel not altogether false might be drawn between the eleventh, or even the twelfth century, and the fifteenth. Henry VI resembled the Confessor in many ways. Henry VII brought to his task the strength of the Conqueror and the craft of his son: England under Warwick was not unlike England under Stephen, and Henry of Richmond had much in common with Henry of Anjou.

The want of 'governance' constituted the weakness of Henry IV; he inherited the disorders of the preceding reign, and the circumstances of his accession contributed additional causes of disorder. The crown was impoverished, and with impoverishment came inefficiency. The treasury was always low, the peace was never well kept, the law was never well executed; individual life and property were insecure; whole districts were in a permanent alarm of robbery and riot; the local administration was either paralysed by party faction or lodged in the hand of some great lord or some clique of courtiers. The evil of local faction struck upwards and placed the elections to parliament at the command of the leaders. The social mischief thus directly contributed to weaken the constitution. The remedy for insufficient 'governance' was sought, not in a legal dictatorship such as Edward I had attempted to assume, nor in stringent reforms which indeed without some such dictatorship must have almost certainly failed, but in admitting the houses of parliament to a greater share of influence in executive matters, in the 'afforcing' or amending of the council, and in the passing of reforming statutes.

It is curious to mark how from the very beginning of the century men saw the evils and failed to grasp the remedy. Not to multiply examples; in 1399 the commons petitioned against illegal usurpations of private property¹; the Paston Letters furnish abundant proof that this evil had not been put down at the accession of Henry VII. The same year the county of Salop was ravaged by armed bands from Cheshire².

¹ Rot. Parl. iii. 434.

² Ib. iii. 441.

Private war.

Frequent remunstrances.Statutes
against rioters.Bands of robbers.Complaints under Henry VI.

The country was infested with malefactors banded together to avoid punishment¹. In 1402 there is a petition against forcible entries by the magnates². In 1404 the war between the earls of Northumberland and Westmoreland was regarded by the parliament as a private war; and Northumberland's treason was condoned as a trespass only³. In 1406 the king had to remodel his council in order to insure better governance; but the petition for 'good and abundant governance' was immediately followed by a request for the better remuneration of the lords of the council, and the speaker had to insist on more co-operation from the lords in the work of reform⁴. In 1407 the king was told that the better and more abundant governance had not been provided, the sea had been badly watched, and the marches badly kept⁵. In 1411 a statute against rioters was passed⁶. On the accession of Henry V the cry was repeated; the late king's promises of governance had been badly kept; the marches were still in danger; the Lollards were still disturbing the peace; there were riots day by day in diverse parts of the realm⁷. The parliament of 1414 reissued the statute against rioters⁸; in 1417, according to the petitions, large bands of associated malefactors were ravaging the country, plundering the people, holding the forests, spreading Lollardy, treason, and rebellion, robbing the collectors of the revenue⁹. Matters were still worse in 1420; whole counties were infested by bandits; the scholars of Oxford were waging war on the county; the inhabitants of Tynedale, Redesdale, and Hexhamshire had become brigands; all the evils of the old feudal immunities were in full force¹⁰. Similar complaints accumulate during the early years of Henry VI, and seem to reach the highest regions of public life in the armed strife of Gloucester and Beaufort. But the general spirit of misrule was quite independent of party and faction. The quarrels of the heir male and heirs general of the house of Berkeley, carried on both by law and by arms, lasted from 1421 to 1475, through three generations¹. In 1437 lords Grey and Fanhope were at war in Bedfordshire², and in 1438 the two branches of the house of Westmoreland, one under the earl, the other under his stepmother, the sister of Cardinal Beaufort, were at open war³. In 1441 the earl of Devon and lord Bonneville contested in arms the stewardship of Cornwall⁴. The struggles of Egremont and Neville, of the duke of Exeter and lord Cromwell, were private wars. In 1441, when archbishop Kemp⁵ was one of the king's most trusted councillors, there was war between the tenants of his liberty of Ripon and the king's tenants of Knaresborough forest; and the Ripon men brought down the half-outlawed bandits from the archbishop's liberty of Tynedale to help them. By the light of these illustrations the struggle between York and Lancaster seems scarcely more than a grand and critical instance of the working of causes everywhere potent for harm. The enforcement of law under such circumstances was scarcely attempted: although it was an age of great judges⁶ the administration of the law was full of abuses; the varieties of conflicting jurisdictions, the facilities for obtaining, and cheaply obtaining, writs of all kinds, gave to the strong aggressor a legal standing-ground which they could not secure for the victim⁷; the multiplication of legal forms and functionaries was inefficient, it would seem, for any good purpose; these evils, and the absence of any determined attempt to remedy them, brought about a strong and permanent disaffection. As is ever the case, the social miseries called down upon the government an accumulation of false charges. The

¹ Rot. Parl. iii. 445.² Ib. iii. 487.³ Above, p. 43.⁴ Rot. Parl. iii. 571 sq., 576 sq., 585.⁵ Ib. iii. 609, 610.⁶ 13 Hen. IV, c. 7; Statutes, ii. 169.⁷ Rot. Parl. iv. 4.⁸ 2 Hen. V, st. i. c. 9; Statutes, ii. 186.⁹ Rot. Parl. iv. 113.¹⁰ Ib. iv. 124, 125.

Instances of public disorder.

Imperfect enforcement of law.

False charges against the government.

¹ Dugdale, Baronage, i. 362-365.

² Ordinances, v. 35.

³ Excerpta Historica, pp. 2, 3; Ordinances, v. 35-40, 173-180.

⁴ See above, p. 174.

⁵ Rymer, xi. 27; Plumpton Papers, ed. Stapleton, pp. liv. sq.

⁶ Reeves, Hist. of English Law, vol. iii. pp. 108, 109, speaks with high praise of the administration of justice during the troublous years of Henry VI. No doubt the law was ably discussed and the judges were great judges, but justice was not enforced; there was no governance.

⁷ Abundant illustration of this will be found in the Paston Letters. Even royal letters interfering with the course of justice could be easily purchased; e.g. Henry VI issues letters to the sheriff of Norfolk directing him to impanel a jury to acquit Lord Molines; Paston Letters, i. 208: such a letter might be bought for a noble; ib. p. 215.

Charges of treason, a proof of disaffection and weak governance.

nation complained of the foreign policy of Suffolk; and urged on the king the expulsion of Somerset from the council. The rebels, under Cade, almost justified on the ground of misgovernment, sought their object by charges of treason against men who, however selfish or incapable, were at all events faithful. The duke of York, who might have ruled England in strength and peace as he had governed Normandy, and might have won the wild English as he had won the wild Irish, could not push the claims of the nation for efficient justice without urging his own claim first to the foremost place in council and then to the crown itself. It was the lack of the strong hand in reform, in justice, and in police, the want of governance at home, that definitely proved the incapacity of the house of Lancaster, and that made their removal possible. It was the fatal cause of their weakness, the moral justification of their fall. The dynasty that had failed to govern, must cease to reign. And it was in the physical and moral weakness and irresolution of Henry VI, and in his divided councils, that this fatal deficiency was most fatally exemplified. Yet he was set aside and his dynasty with him on an altogether different occasion, and a widely discordant plea.

The government of the house of York, stronger but not sounder than that of Lancaster.

373. The house of Lancaster had reigned constitutionally, but had fallen by lack of governance. The house of York followed, and, although they ruled with a stronger will, failed altogether to remedy the evils to which they succeeded, and contributed in no small degree to destroy all that was destructible in the constitution. The record of the public history of the reigns of Edward IV and Richard III shows how far they were from securing internal peace or inspiring national confidence. England found no sounder governance under Edward IV than under Henry VI; the court was led by favourites, justice was perverted, strength was pitted against weakness, riots, robberies, forcible entries were prevalent as before. The house of York failed, as the house of Lancaster had failed, to justify its existence by wise administration. As to the constitutional side of the question, the case is somewhat different. One good result had followed the constitutional formalism of the three reigns; the forms of government could not be altered.

But they might be overborne and perverted; and the charge of thus wresting and warping them is shared by the house of York with the house of Tudor. Henry VII, combining the interests of the rival Roses, combines the leading characteristics of their respective policies; with Lancaster he observes the forms of the constitution, with York he manipulates them to his own ends. The case against the house of York may be briefly stated; it rests, as may be imagined, primarily on legal and moral grounds, but under these there lurks a spirit defying and ignoring constitutional restraints. Edward IV claimed the throne, not as an elected king, but as the heir of Richard II; the house of Lancaster had given three kings 'de facto non de jure' to England; their acts were only legal so far as he and his parliaments chose to ratify them. He did not then owe, on his own theory, so much regard to the constitution as they had willingly rendered. Nor did he pay it. He did not indeed rule altogether without a parliament, but he held sessions at long intervals, and brought, or allowed others to bring, before them only the most insignificant matters of business. His statute-roll contains no acts for securing or increasing public liberties; his legislation on behalf of trade and commerce contains no principles of an expanding or liberating policy. To register grants of money, resumptions of gifts, decrees and reversals of attainders, exchanges of property, private matters of business, has become the sole employment of the assembly of the estates; there is no question of difficulty between liberty and prerogative; no voice is raised for Clarence; no tax is refused or begrudged. Outside parliament misrule is more obviously apparent. The collection of benevolences, regarded even at the time as an innovation, was perhaps a resuscitated form of some of the worst measures of Edward II and Richard II, but the attention which it aroused under Edward IV shows how strange it had become, at all events under the normal rule of the intervening kings. The levies for the war with Scotland were raised under the old system of commissions of array which had been disused since the early years of Henry IV. The numerous executions which marked the earlier years of Edward's reign show that he

The house of York anticipated the policy of the Tudors.

Manipulation of parliamentary institutions.

Benevolences.

Commissions of array.

Legal
severities.

considered the country to be in a condition to which the usages of martial law were fairly applicable. Edward himself took personal part in the trials of men who had offended him. The courts of the constable and the marshal sent their victims to death on frivolous charges and with scant regard for the privilege of Englishmen. The same reign furnishes the first authoritative proofs of the use of torture in the attempt to force the accused to confession or to betray their accomplices.

A few instances of each of these abuses will suffice.

Suspension of parliamentary action.

During the twenty-five years of the York dynasty the country was only seven times called upon to elect a new parliament; the sessions of those parliaments which really met extended over a very few months; their meetings being frequently held only for the purpose of prorogation. No parliament sat between January 1465 and June 1467, or between May 1468 and October 1472; and between January 1475 and January 1483 the assembly was only called together for forty-two days in 1478 to pass the attainder of the duke of Clarence. The early parliaments had given the king an income for life. The long intermissions were acquiesced in by the nation, because they feared additional demands; but it was well known and recorded that the king avoided the summoning of parliament because he anticipated severe criticism on his impolicy and extravagance. Servile as his parliaments were, he would rather rule without any such check. The practice of the later years of Henry VI, during which elections had been as much as possible avoided, furnished him with precedents for long prorogations; Edward suspended parliamentary action for years together; and England, which had been used to speak its mind once a year at least, was thus reduced to silence.

Legislative poverty of the sessions of parliament.

The records of the sessions are so barren as to forbid any regret for their infrequency. The reign of Edward IV, as has been well said¹, is the first reign in our annals in which not a single enactment is made for increasing the liberty or security of the subject. Nor can it be alleged that such enactments were unnecessary, when frequent executions, outrageous usurpations, and local riots form the chief subject of the annals of the time. Commerce increased: and the increase of commerce attests the increase of public confidence, but by no means justifies the policy which arrests rather than invites that confidence; and commercial activity, especially in such states of society as that through which England was now passing, was to some extent a refuge for exhausted families, and a safety-valve for energies shut out of their proper sphere.

¹ Hallam, Middle Ages, iii. 198.

Commercial
legislation.

The collection of benevolences, in which the age itself recognised a new method of unlawful taxation, is an obscure point. If it were not that both the chroniclers and the statute-book assert the novel character of the abuse, we might, in the paucity of records¹, be tempted to doubt whether the charge of innova-

Taxation
by benevo-lences.

¹ There is among the Ordinances of the Privy Council, vol. v. pp. 418 sq., a set of instructions to commissioners for raising money, which is without date, but which is referred by Sir R. Cotton to the 20th, by Sir H. Nicolas to the 21st, and by another modern note to the 15th of Henry VI. They are directed to assemble the inhabitants of certain towns above the age of sixteen, and to meet an assembly of the body of the counties to which two men from each parish are to be summoned by the sheriff: the names of those present are to be entered in two books, and the commissioners are then to explain that by the law the king can call on his subjects to attend him at their own charges in any part of the land for the defence of the same against outward enemies; that he is unwilling to put them to such expense, and asks them of their own free-will to give him what they can afford; at least as much as would be required for two days' personal service. No inconvenient language or compulsion is to be used. Another undated series of instructions, for the collection of men and money for the relief of Calais, is printed from the same MS. in Ordin. iv. 352. These instructions, if the date be rightly assigned, would seem to show that the idea of a benevolence was at all events not strange under Henry VI; but there is no authority for the date, the instructions do not appear ever to have been issued, and, if any such taxation had taken place, it must have appeared among the sins laid to the charge of Henry's government. Until better information is forthcoming, it would be more reasonable to refer them to the reign of Edward IV or Henry VII. Other instances in which such a charge has been made against the Lancaster kings are these: in 1402 Henry IV wrote to a large number of lords and others accrediting Sir William Esturmyr 'pur vous declarer le busoing que nous en (monoye) avons, li quel en ce veuillez croire et faire a notre priere ce qu'il vous requerera de notre part en celle partie;' Ord. ii. 73: in 1421 seven persons were summoned before the council in default of payment of sums which they had promised to lend the king; ib. ii. 280: and in or about 1442 Henry VI wrote to the abbot of S. Edmund's asking 'that ye so tendryng thees our necessitees wol lene us . . . such a notable summe of mony to be paid in hande as our servant bearer of thees shall desire of you.' In another letter he asks for a loan of 100 marks to be secured by Exchequer tallies; Ellis, Orig. Lett. 3rd series, i. 76-81. Sets of

Novelty of the expedient.

Edward's financial ability.

tion brought against Edward IV were true, or to suspect that, among the many financial expedients adopted during the Lancastrian troubles, he might have found something like a precedent. Of this however there is no sufficient example forthcoming, and, although a treasurer like the earl of Wiltshire may not unreasonably be supposed to have now and then extorted money by violence, the popularity of Henry VI and Margaret was never so great as to enable them to become successful beggars. Such evidence as exists shows us Edward IV canvassing by word of mouth or by letter for direct gifts of money from his subjects¹. Henry III had thus begged for new year's gifts. Edward IV requested and extorted 'freewill offerings' from every one who could not say no to the pleadings of such a king. He had a wonderful memory too, and knew the name and the particular property of every man in the country who was worth taxing in this way. He had no excuse for such meanness; for the estates had shown themselves liberal, he was rich in forfeitures, and an act of resumption, passed whenever the parliament met, was enough to adjust the balance between income and necessary expenditure. He grew richer still by private enterprise. Against instructions to the same effect will be found in the Ordinances, v. 187; cf. pp. 201, 414; vi. 46-49; 236 sq.; 322 sq. But these cases, most severely interpreted, involve only the sort of loans that were sanctioned by parliament. Mr. Plummer (Fortescue, p. 13) adduces a peremptory letter of demand dated July 1453 (Ordinances, vi. 143), for the payment of money promised. I cannot allow that the instances affect the general conclusion.

¹ See above, p. 219. In the York Records (Davies, p. 130) of 1482 the name of Benevolence is applied to the contingent of armed men furnished for the Scottish expedition: 'the benivelenche graunted to the kynges highnes in the last viage his highnes purposed in his most roiall person to go ayanest his auncient enemyes the Scottes, that is to say a capitan and six score archers;' see also p. 286, note 2, below. The common form in which a benevolence was demanded from the country in general, may be seen in the letters patent of Henry VII, July 7, 1491; Rymer, xii. 446, 447. The commissioners were directed to communicate 'cum talibus nostrorum subditorum . . . prout vobis melius videbitur, eis nostrum propositum et mentem plenariam de et in praemissis et eorum singulis intimantes, eos movendo exhortando et requirendo ut nobis in hoc tam magno arduoque negotio, non solum nostrum statum verum etiam et eorum salutem concernente, juxta eorum facultates assistant et opem in personis et aliis mediis et modis, prout vobis et eis melius visum fuerit, conferant.' The promises so obtained were, by the Act 11 Hen. VII, c. 10, enforced by imprisonment; Statutes, ii. 576.

Richard III the case is equally strong, for although his exigencies were greater he acted, in collecting benevolences, in the teeth of a law which had been passed in his own parliament; and, although in this respect he had probably to bear much of the odium which ought to have fallen upon Edward, he had been the strongest man in Edward's councils. That the benevolences were any great or widely felt hardship is improbable; Edward could not have maintained his popularity if they had been. But they were unconstitutional; they were adopted with the view of enabling the sovereign to rule without that reference to parliamentary supply and audit which had become the safeguard of national liberty. A king with a life revenue and an unchecked power of exacting money from the rich is substantially an absolute sovereign: the nation, whether poor and exhausted as in the earlier days, or devoting itself to trade instead of politics, as in the last years of the dynasty, parts too readily with its birthright and awakes too late to its loss.

Richard's
benevo-lences.

A sign of absolute power.

The loss of records and the anarchy of the last years of the reign of Henry VI leave us in great doubt as to the means by which forces were raised to maintain order in the king's name throughout England, although we know that the king's name was freely used by both sides in the actual conflict. Royal letters however, analogous to, if not identical with, the commissions of array which received their final form in 1404, were no doubt the most convenient expedient for reinforcing the royal army¹; whilst the rebel force, which the duke of York and the Nevilles, until they got the upper hand, were able to bring into the field, was largely composed of their own tenants and the inhabitants of disaffected districts² serving for pay, and probably organised in much the same way as they

Maintenance of armed forces.

¹ See examples in Rymer, xii: a writ to collect the posse comitatus against the rebels, in 1457, p. 401; commission to the earl of Pembroke to take levies in 1460, p. 445, &c.

² The letter of the duke of York to the men of Shrewsbury in 1452 will serve as an illustration: 'I . . . am fully concluded to proceed in all haste against him with the help of my kindred and friends . . . praying and exhorting you to fortify, enforce, and assist me, and to come to me with all diligence wheresoever I shall be or draw, with as many goodly and likely men as ye may make to execute the entent aforesaid;' White Rose, pp. xli, xlii.

Commissions of array under Edward IV and Richard III.

would have been if marshalled under royal authority. This regularity was, it may be supposed, still further exemplified when, in the later stages of the struggle, the northern counties were pitted against the southern, and the York party, as well as queen Margaret, claimed to be acting in the king's name. In a time of civil war however it is useless to look for constitutional precedent; the prevalence of disorder is only adduced as furnishing a clue to the origin of abuses which emerge when the occasion or excuse for them is over. The commissions of array by which Edward IV and Richard III collected forces for the war with Scotland do not form a prominent article in the indictment against them; for the country had become used to fighting, and the obligation to supply men and money for their maintenance in case of invasion was a common-law obligation however jealously watched and however grudgingly fulfilled¹. These armies were not raised by authority of the parliament, nor paid by the government for the services performed beyond the limits of their native counties, nor were they required against sudden invasion². They were not a part ¹ The law as settled by 4 Hen. IV. c. 13 in 1402, and exemplified in Commissions of Array from 1404 onward, was that except in case of invasion none shall be constrained to go out of their own counties; and that men chosen to go on the king's service out of England shall be at the king's wages from the day they leave their own counties. As the Welsh and Scottish wars of Henry IV were defensive against invasion, commissions of array in which the counties must have borne the expense of the force furnished were frequently issued; Rymer, viii. 123, 273, 374, &c.; and the clergy were arrayed under the same circumstances; ib. 123; ix. 253, 601, &c. The armies collected by Henry V for his war in France consisted partly of a feudal levy, i. e. of a certain force furnished by those who had received estates from Edward III with an obligation to serve at Calais, &c. (Rymer, viii. 456, 466); but chiefly of (1) lords and leaders of forces raised by themselves who served the king by indenture; and (2) of volunteers raised by the king's officers at his wages, 'omnes qui vadia nostra . . . percipere voluerint'; ib. ix. 370. In 1443 Henry VI issued letters of privy seal for an aid of men, victuals, and ships; Ord. v. 265. In 1464, by letters close, Edward IV ordered the sheriffs to proclaim that every man from sixteen to sixty be well and defensibly arrayed, and that he so arrayed be ready to attend on his highness upon a day's warning in resistance of his enemies and rebels and the defence of this his realm; Rymer, xi. 524; cf. 624, 652, 655, 677. This was peremptory but not illegal.

² In the Commission for Array against the Scots in 1480 the Scots are regarded as invaders; Rymer, xii. 117. But the abuse of the plea is clear from the language of the York Records, in which the force furnished is termed a benevolence: the letters under which it was levied were from

of the host of archers which the parliament of 1453 granted 'to be maintained by those on whom the burden should fall,' nor of the like force voted in 1472, for the payment of which the lords and commons voted a separate tenth. They were levied by privy seal letters from the king, and were paid by the districts which supplied them irrespective of the nature of their service. The obligation was based, no doubt, on the ancient law and statute of Winchester; the abuse had abundant precedent during the reign of Edward III, but it was an abuse notwithstanding, and must be viewed as part of a general policy of irresponsible government¹.

Under such a government, whether in times of civil war or during the periods of peace that are possible in a reign of terror, judicial iniquities are quite compatible with the maintenance of the forms of law. During the troubled days of Henry VI the courts sat with regularity and the judges elaborated their decisions, when it depended altogether on the local influence of the contending parties whether the decisions should be enforced at all. In criminal trials the most infamous tyrannies may coexist with the most perfect formality, and after a regular trial and legal condemnation the guilty and the innocent alike, at least among the minor actors, may be avenged but cannot be rehabilitated. The York kings have left an evil reputation for judicial cruelties; the charge is true, although it must be shared with the men who lent themselves to such base transactions and with the age which was sufficiently demoralised to tolerate them. The wanton bloodshed of the civil the duke of Gloucester (p. 107), the number of soldiers was discussed in the city council and the captain appointed there (p. 112); it was agreed by the king's high commandment by his gracious letters that the city and liberties should furnish a captain and 120 archers, 40 of them to be furnished by the Ainsty; and that the constables in every parish should collect the money offered (assessed) in each parish, to be delivered to the captain, who was bound to return any overplus unexpended; pp. 115, 116. See also Plumpton Papers, pp. 40-42. The instructions given by Richard III to the Commissioners of Array in 1484 (Letters, i. 85) fully bear out this.

Judicial iniquities of the period.

¹ Grose, Military Antiquities, i. 71, has printed a paper presented by Sir Robert Cotton to the king, MS. Cotton Julius F. 6, on the provision of forces at the charge of the counties. The question is one of some prospective importance; Hallam, Const. History, ii. 133.

war, the earlier political executions, the long series of blood-feuds dating from the beginning of the fourteenth century, the generally inhuman savageness of the criminal judicature, all tended the same way. Edward IV and Richard III are not condemned because they shared the character of their times, but because under their influence that character, already sanguinary, took new forms of vindictive and aggressive energy. The cruel executions of persons taken in armed resistance, of which men like Tiptoft and Montague bear the immediate responsibility, may be extenuated as exceptional, as the necessary results of civil strife, or as the ordinary action of wild martial law; yet Tiptoft, the cultivated disciple of the Renaissance, has an evil pre-eminence as the man who impaled the dead bodies of his victims, and thus exceeded even the recognised legal barbarities; and Montague went beyond precedent in murdering his prisoners.

Gross cruelties.

Practice of torture.

The practice of torture for the purpose of obtaining evidence from unwilling witnesses is another mark of the time. Sir John Fortescue alleges the use of torture as a proof of the inferiority of French to English law¹; meaning thereby, as it is argued, not that the practice was unknown altogether, but that it was employed only under the prerogative authority of the crown, and not under the common law. It is under Edward IV however that we find the first recorded instances in medieval history of its use in England. In 1468 a man named Cornelius, who carried letters of Queen Margaret, was burned in the feet² to make him betray his accomplices; John Haw-

Instances of its employment.

¹ Fortescue, de Laudibus, c. 22. Sir T. Smith, strangely enough, writing in 1565, repeats the statement; Commonw. bk. ii. c. 27. That torture was not altogether unknown in England is certain. Mr. Pike, History of Crime, i. 427, adduces from the Pipe Roll, 34 Hen. II, the case of a man who was fined 'quia cepit quandam mulierem et eam tormentavit sine licentia regis';—Edward II gave leave for the application of 'quaestiones' in the trial of the Templars; Wilk. Conc. ii. 314; Foedera, ii. 118, 119. In the 22 Edw. III a commission was issued to inquire into the practice of torturing men by gaolers to compel them to become approvers; Pike, Hist. Cr. i. 481. Jardine, in his 'Reading on Torture,' concludes that the practice was allowed by royal licence, and was known to the prerogative although not to the common law. His argument that the silence of the Records proves the commonness of the usage is not conclusive.

² W. Worcester, p. 789.

kins, one of the persons whom he mentioned, was racked, and he accused Sir Thomas Cook, an alderman of London. Cook was tried by a jury before a special commission of judges, one of whom, Sir John Markham, directed the jury to find him guilty of misprision, not of treason. The jury complied and Markham was deprived of his judgeship¹. The tradition of the Tower, that the rack, which bore the name of the duke of Exeter's daughter, was introduced by John Holland, duke of Exeter and constable of the tower under Henry VI², may not be entirely unfounded: the Hollands were a cruel race, and the duke of Exeter, who was one of the bitter enemies of the Beauforts, was an unscrupulous man, who may have tortured his prisoners. Here however is the first link of a chain of horrors that run on for two centuries.

The rack in the Tower.

Another abuse which had the result of condemning its agents to perpetual infamy was the extension of the jurisdiction of the High Constable of England to cases of high treason, thus depriving the accused of the benefit of trial by jury and placing their acquittal or condemnation in the hands of a political official. When Edward IV, early in his reign, gave the office of constable to Tiptoft, he invested him with unparalleled powers; he was to take cognisance of and to proceed in all cases of high treason by whomsoever they might be initiated; to hear, examine, and conclude them, 'even summarily and plainly, without noise and show of judgment, on simple inspection of fact;' just as the ecclesiastical judges did in cases of heresy; he was to act as king's vicegerent, without appeal and with power to inflict punishment, fine, and other lawful coercion, notwithstanding any statutes, acts, ordinances, or restrictions made to the contrary³. Similar powers were con-

Jurisdiction of the constable.

Powers confided to him.

¹ Foss, Biogr. Jur. p. 435; Stow, p. 420, says that Hawkins was racked on the brake called the duke of Exeter's daughter. The factitious speech of the duke of Buckingham in 1483 (above, p. 230) implies that Cook himself was tortured.

² Coke, 3 Inst. p. 35, represents it as a part of a scheme which John Holland, duke of Exeter, and the unfortunate duke of Suffolk contrived for introducing the civil law into England; they were however personal enemies and rivals, Exeter being a close ally of duke Humfrey.

³ Edward, in the patent of Aug. 24, 1467, by which he appointed lord Rivers, rehearses that of Feb. 7, 1462, by which Tiptoft was appointed,

Instances of its exercise.

ferred on the earl Rivers in 1467, and on his death Tiptoft was again invested with them. It was by this supreme and irresponsible judicature that so many of the Lancastrians were doomed. The earl of Oxford and his son and four others were tried by the law of Padua¹, of which Tiptoft was a graduate, and beheaded in 1462. Twelve of the prisoners taken at Hexham in 1464 were condemned and executed in the same summary fashion at York². Sir Ralph Grey, the defender of Alnwick, was the same year tried by Tiptoft and beheaded in the king's presence³. Lord Rivers, from whom better things might have been hoped, disposed of two of the defenders of Harlech by the same process⁴. It was the application of martial law to ordinary cases of high treason. The military executions on both sides, the massacre of prisoners, the illegal reprisals of Warwick and Clarence in 1469 and 1470, were alike unjustifiable, but in the commission and jurisdiction of these two constables England saw a new and unconstitutional tribunal avowedly erected in contempt of statute and usage.

Constructive treasons.

But, even where the forms of the common law were followed, the crushing policy of the government made itself felt. The doctrine of constructive treason⁵ was terribly exemplified in the cases of Burdett, Stacy, and Walker. Yet these men were

and in which he vested in him all powers which the constable enjoyed in and since the reign of William the Conqueror: 'ad cognoscendum et procedendum in omnibus et singulis causis et negotiis de et super crimine laesae Majestatis seu ipsius occasione, caeterisque causis quibuscunque, per praefatum comitem ut Constabularium Angliae, seu coram eo, ex officio, seu ad instantiam partis qualitercunque motis, movendis, seu pendentibus . . . causasque et negotia praedicta, cum omnibus et singulis suis emergentibus incidentibus et connexis, audiendum, examinandum et fine debito terminandum, etiam summarie et de plano sine strepitu et figura judicii, sola facti veritate inspecta, ac etiam manu regia si opportunum visum foret, eidem Johanni, consanguineo nostro, vices nostras, appellatione remota, ex mero motu et certa scientia nostra praedicta, similiter commiserimus plenariam potestatem, cum cujuslibet poenae, mulctae et alterius cohercionis legitimae, executionisque rerum quas in ea parte decerneret, facultate, &c. . . Statutis, ordinationibus, actibus et restrictionibus in contrarium editis, caeterisque contrariis non obstantibus quibuscunque;' Rymer, xii. 581, 654. Well may Coke say that this is directly against the common law; ⁴ Inst. p. 127.

¹ 'By lawe Padowe;' Warkworth, p. 5.

² W. Worc. p. 782.

³ Ib. p. 783; Chron. White Rose, p. lxxxix.

⁴ W. Worc. p. 791.

⁵ Blackstone, Comm. iv. 79; Hale, Placita Coronae, i. 115; Reeves, Hist. Engl. Law, iv. 109; Stow, Chr. p. 430.

tried with all the ceremonies of law, and by special commissions consisting of the judges and chief men of the land¹. Clarence, when he wished to punish the suspected poisoner of his wife, had the prisoner tried before an unimpeachable tribunal, yet the act was recognised as violent and illegal². But the trial and execution of Clarence himself and the conduct of Edward in that trial were not more repugnant to English constitutional beliefs than was the treatment of the men who had fallen victims to their common and rival ambitions. The execution of lord Welles and Sir Thomas Dymock in 1470 was an extra-judicial murder³. That of Buckingham in 1483 was strictly legal. Henry IV in the beheading of Scrope and Mowbray, and Henry V in the execution of Cambridge, Scrope, and Grey, had set a fruitful example; but if they sowed the wind their posterity reaped the whirlwind.

Legal
severities.

Notwithstanding the energy which marked the earlier years of Edward's reign, and the sincere endeavour, with which on any view of his character he must be credited, to restore domestic peace and enforce the law, the country enjoyed under him scarcely more security than it had under his predecessor. The statutes of liveries and maintenance, of labourers and artificers, the enactments against rioters and breakers of truce, were very insufficiently enforced; the abuses which had sprung up in the more disturbed districts of the north were not put down by mere legislation, nor did they disappear even under the strong and crushing policy of repression; more perhaps was done by the personal influence of Richard in Yorkshire than by any administrative reforms; yet the evil remained. The surviving baronage had not learned wisdom from the extinction of its lost members, and the revived feudalism, typified by the practices of livery and maintenance, was, in all districts where the Yorkist party was supreme, allowed its full play. Thus notwithstanding Edward's attempts to maintain the law

No sound peace under the house
of York.

¹ Baga de Secretis, 3rd rep. Dep. Keeper, App. ii. p. 213. Stacy is said to have been tortured and made to betray Burdett; Cont. Croyl. p. 561; but of course before the trial.

² Baga de Secretis, p. 214: Rot. Parl. vi. 173.

³ Above, p. 213.

Edward's policy with regard to the baronage.

and to crush the nobles, scarcely a month after his death the opposing factions of the court had rallied to themselves, under new designations but in real identity, the very same elements, forces and rival influences that had been arrayed against each other in the earlier struggle of the Roses. The private warfare of the great houses continues throughout with scarcely abated vigour. The very policy of Edward with regard to those houses was novel and hazardous; for he departed from the immemorial practice of his predecessors in order to crush the offender of the moment. Since the accession of the house of Plantagenet the kings had avoided enforcing perpetual forfeitures, except in extreme cases. The Mortimers, the Despencers, the Percies, the Montacutes, had all, after long or short terms of eclipse, been restored to their estates and dignities. Edward, whose own family owed its existence to this rule, was the first king who ostentatiously disregarded it. By bestowing the Percy earldom on John Neville, that of Pembroke on William Herbert, and that of Devon on Humfrey Stafford of Southwick, he laid down a principle of extermination against political foes which was foreign to English practice, and arrayed against himself the strongest and best elements of feudal life, the attachment of the local populations to their ancient lords.

Summary of the position of the house
of York.

That these particular features of the policy of the York kings warrant us in believing that they had a definite design of assuming absolute power, it would be hazardous to affirm. They more probably imply merely that there was no price which they were not prepared to pay for power, and that they were restrained by no political principles or moral scruples from increasing their hold upon it. Edward IV in more than one point resembled Edward III, and cared more for the substance of power than for the open and ostentatious pretence of absolutism which had cost Richard II his throne and life. Of Richard III we know little more than that he was both abler and more unscrupulous than his brother: for both it may be pleaded that we have to read their history through a somewhat distorted medium. It may seem but a halting conclusion to assert that their attitude towards the constitution was opposed to that of the Lancaster kings rather as a contrary than as a contradictory. The Lancaster dynasty was not strong enough to maintain and develop the constitution; the York dynasty was strong enough to dispense with it but not to destroy it. The former acted on the hereditary traditions of the baronage, the latter on the hereditary traditions of the crown. The former conserved, without being able to reinvigorate it, all that survived of the early ennobling idea according to which the national life had thus far advanced. The latter anticipated, without definitely formulating it, much of the policy which was to mark the coming era, to grow stronger, and then to decay and vanish before the renewed force of national life; a force which had recovered strength during the compulsory rest and peace enjoyed under the Tudors, and awoke under the Stewarts to a consciousness of its identity with the earlier force which had guided the earlier development. So, to speak loosely and generally, the Lancastrian rule was a direct continuity, and the Yorkist rule was a break in the continuity, of constitutional development; both alike were stages in the discipline of national life. Neither of the two tried its experiment in good days. The better element had to work in times of decay and exhaustion; the worse element had the advantage of the new dayspring; for the revival of life which is the great mark of the Tudor period had begun under Edward IV. There was a disparity in both periods between national health and constitutional growth.

Thus then the acquittal of the house of Lancaster does not imply the condemnation of the house of York; nor do those circumstances which might mitigate our condemnation of the latter, at all affect our estimate of the general character of the former. In tracing the history of both, the personal qualifications of the rulers form a conspicuous element; and it might be an interesting question for imaginative historians to determine what would have been the result if Henry VI and Edward IV had changed places; if it had fallen to the strong unscrupulous masculine Yorkist to work the machinery of a waning constitutional life, and to the weak incompetent Lan-

Contrast of York and Lancaster.

General
conclusion.

castrian to maintain the doctrine, or to anticipate the first impulses, of personal absolutism. We need trouble ourselves with no such problem: the constitution had in its growth out-run the capacity of the nation; the nation needed rest and renewal, discipline and reformation, before it could enter into the enjoyment of its birthright. The present days were evil; we cannot look without pity and sorrow on that generation of our fathers whose virtues were exemplified in Henry of Lancaster and its strength in Edward of York.

CHAPTER XIX.

THE CLERGY, THE KING, AND THE POPE.

374. Problem of Church and State.—375. Plan of the chapter.—376. The clerical estate or spirituality.—377. Relations between the Pope and the Crown.—378. APPOINTMENT OF BISHOPS.—379. The pall.—380. Legations.—381. Papal interference in election of bishops.—382. Elections in the thirteenth century.—383. The pope's claim to confer the temporalities.—384. Papal provisions.—385. Legislation on provisions.—386. The compromise on elections.—387. Elections to abacies.—388. The ecclesiastical assemblies.—389. ECCLESIASTICAL LEGISLATION; for the clergy by the clergy.—390. By the clergy for the laity.—391. By parliament for the clergy.—392. Statute of provisors.—393. Statute of praemunire.—394. Legislation in parliament for the national church.—395. ECCLESIASTICAL TAXATION; by the pope.—396. Taxation by convocation.—397. Attempt in parliament to tax the clergy.—398. Of the clergy to tax the laity.—399. ECCLESIASTICAL JUDICATURE; of the king's courts over the clergy.—400. Of the court Christian; in temporal matters.—401. In disciplinary cases.—402. Over ecclesiastics.—403. Appeals to Rome.—404. Legislation against heresy.—405. Social importance of the clergy.—406. Intellectual and moral influence of the clergy.

374. The position of the clerical estate, and the importance of ecclesiastical influence in the development of the Constitution, have in the foregoing chapters presented themselves so prominently, that a reader who approaches medieval history from an exclusively modern starting-point may well suppose that these subjects have already received more than a due share of attention. But there still remain many points of ecclesiastical interest, which have a close bearing on national growth; and without some comprehension of these it is vain to attempt to understand the transitional period which we have now reached, or to estimate the true value of the influences which the coming Importance of the relations of the Church to the State.

age of change was to contribute to the world's history. And some of these points require rather minute treatment.

Intrinsic difficulties of the subject.

The careful study of history suggests many problems for which it supplies no solution. None of these is more easy to state, or more difficult to handle, than the great question of the proper relation between Church and State. It may be taken for granted that, between the extreme claims made by the advocates of the two, there can never be even an approximate reconciliation. The claims of both are very deeply rooted, and the roots of both lie in the best parts of human nature; neither can do violence to, or claim complete supremacy over, the other, without crushing something which is precious. Nor will any universal formula be possible so long as different nations and churches are in different stages of development, even if for the highest forms of Church and State such a formal concordat be practicable. A perfect solution of the problem involves the old question of the identity between the good man and the good citizen as well as the modern ideal of a free church within a free state. Religion, morality, and law, overlap one another in almost every region of human action; they approach their common subject-matter from different points and legislate for it with different sanctions. The idea of perfect harmony between them seems to imply an amount of subordination which is scarcely compatible with freedom; the idea of complete disjunction implies either the certainty of conflict on some if not all parts of the common field of work, or the abdication, on the one part or on the other, of some duty which according to its own ideal it is bound to fulfil. The church, for instance, cannot engross the work of education without some danger to liberty; the state cannot engross it without some danger to religion; the work of the church without liberty loses half its value; the state without religion does only half its work. And this is only an illustration of what is true throughout. The individual conscience, the spiritual aspiration, the moral system, the legal enactment, will never, in a world of mixed character, work consistently or harmoniously in all points.

For the historian, who is content to view men as they are and appear to be, not as they ought to be or are capable of becoming, it is no dereliction of duty if he declines to lay down any definition of the ideal relations between Church and State. He may honestly and perhaps wisely confess that he regards the indeterminateness and the indeterminability of those relations as one of the points in which religion teaches him to see a trial of his faith incident to a state of probation. The practical statesman too may content himself with assuming the existence of an ideal towards which he may approximate, without the hope of realising it ; trying to deal equitably, but conscious all the time that theoretical considerations will not solve the practical problem. Even the philosopher may admit that there are departments of life and action in which the working of two different laws may be traced, and yet any exact harmonising of their respective courses must be left for a distant future and altered conditions of existence.

Perfect adjustment of relations between Church and State not to be realised.

Nor does our perplexity end here. Even if it were possible that in a single state, of homogeneous population and a fair level of property and education, the relations of religion, morality and law could be adjusted, so that a perfectly national church could be organised and a system of co-operation work smoothly and harmoniously, the fact remains that religion and morality are not matters of nationality. The Christian religion is a historical and Catholic religion ; and a perfect adjustment of relations with foreign churches would seem to be a necessary adjunct to the perfect constitution of the single communion at home. In the middle ages of European history, the influence of the Roman church was directed to some such end. The claim of supremacy made for the see of Rome, a claim which its modern advocates urge as vehemently as if it were part of the Christian Creed, was a practical assertion that such an adjustment was possible. But whether it be possible or no in a changed state of society, the sober judgment of history determines that, as the world is at present moved and governed, perfect ecclesiastical unity is, like a perfect adjustment between Church and State, an ideal to be aimed at rather than to be hoped for.

Relations with foreign churches add another element of difficulty.

375. The historian who has arrived at such a conviction

Practical limitation of the subject as treated in this chapter.

cannot fairly be expected to indulge in much theorising; and he ought not to be tempted to exalt his own generalisations into the rank of laws. The scope of the present work does not admit of any disquisition upon the whole of this great subject; nor need it be attempted. This being granted, our investigation becomes limited to the practical points in which during the middle ages the national church of England, by its dealings with the crown and parliament, or by its dealings with the papacy, or by its own proper work unaffected by those influences, connected itself with the growth of national life, character, and institutions. And the arrangement of the present chapter is accordingly a simple arrangement for convenience. There are four or perhaps five regions of constitutional life in which the work of the National Church comes into contact with the work of the State, or with that of the Roman See, or with both: these are the departments of constitutional machinery or administration, of social relations, morality, spiritual liberty, and possibly also of political action. Within the first of these departments come all questions of organisation, legislation, taxation and judicature, with the subordinate points of property and patronage. The second, third and fourth will call for a brief and more speculative examination, as they affect national character and opinion, especially in relation to the period of transition and the approaching Reformation. The last department, that of political action, may be considered to have been treated in the preceding pages, not indeed completely, but in proportion to the general scale of our discussion.

The English
spirituality in the middle ages.

376. An attempt has been made in preceding chapters of this book to illustrate, as they have come into the foreground, the most important points of our early Church History. These points it is unnecessary to recapitulate; it will be sufficient to assume that, in approaching the history of the medieval church, we may regard the spirituality of England, the clergy or clerical estate, as a body completely organised, with a minutely constituted and regulated hierarchy, possessing the right of legislating for itself and taxing itself, having its recognised assemblies, judicature and executive, and, although not as a legal corporation holding common property, yet composed of a great number of persons each of whom possesses corporate property by a title which is either conferred by ecclesiastical authority, or is not to be acquired without ecclesiastical assent. Such an organisation entitles the clergy to the name of a 'communitas,' although it does not complete the legal idea of a corporation proper. The spirituality is by itself an estate of the realm; its leading members, the bishops and certain abbots, are likewise members of the estate of baronage; the inferior clergy, if they possess lay property or temporal endowments, are likewise members of the estate of the commons. The property which is held by individuals as officers and ministers of the spirituality is either temporal property, that is, lands held by ordinary legal services, or spiritual property, that is, tithes and oblations. As an estate of the realm the spirituality recognises the headship of the king, as a member of the Church Catholic it recognises, according to the medieval idea, the headship of the pope. Its own chief ministers, the bishops under their two metropolitans and under the primacy of the church of Canterbury, stand in an immediate relation to both these powers, and the inferior clergy have through the bishops a mediate relation, while as subjects and as Catholic Christians they have also an immediate relation, to both king and pope. They recognise the king as supreme in matters temporal, and the pope as supreme in matters spiritual; but there are questions as to the exact limits between the spiritual and the temporal, and most important questions touching the precise relations between the crown and the papacy. On medieval theory the king is a spiritual son of the pope; and the pope may be the king's superior in things spiritual only, or in things temporal and spiritual alike.

Its corporate character.

An estate of the realm.

Its property.

Headship in things temporal and spiritual.

377. The temporal superiority of the papacy may be held to depend upon two principles: the first is embodied in the general proposition asserted by Gregory VII and his successors that the pope is supreme over temporal sovereigns: the spiritual power is by its very nature superior to the temporal, and of that spiritual power the pope is on earth the supreme depositary

Relations between the crown and the papacy.

Questions of the special dependence of the kingdom on the pope.

This proposition may be accepted or denied, but it implies a rule equally applicable to all kingdoms. The second principle involves the claim to special superiority over a particular kingdom, such as was at different times made by the popes in reference to England, Scotland, Ireland, Naples, and the empire itself, and turns upon the special circumstances of the countries so claimed. These two principles are in English history of unequal importance: the first, resting upon a dogmatic foundation, has, so far as it is recognised at all, a perpetual and semi-religious force; the latter, resting upon legal assumptions and historical acts, has more momentary prominence, but less real significance. The claim of the pope to receive homage from William the Conqueror, on whatever it was based, was rejected by the king, and both he and William Rufus maintained their right to determine which of the two contending popes was entitled to the obedience of the English church¹. Henry II, when he received Ireland as a gift from Adrian IV, never intended to admit that the papal power over all islands, inferred from the Donation of Constantine, could be understood so as to bring England under the direct authority of Rome; nor when, after Becket's murder, he declared his adhesion to the pope, did he contemplate more than a spiritual or religious relation². John's surrender and subsequent homage first created the shadow of a feudal relation, which was respected by Henry III, but repudiated by the parliaments of Edward I and

¹ On the answer of the Conqueror to Gregory's demand of fealty see vol. i. p. 309: 'fidelitatem facere nolui nec volo, quia nec ego promisi nec antecessores meos antecessoribus tuis id fecisse comperio.'

Henry I writes to Paschal II: 'beneficium quod ab antecessoribus meis beatus Petrus habuit, vobis mitto; eosque honores et eam obedientiam, quam tempore patris mei antecessores vestri in regno Angliæ habuerunt, tempore meo ut habeatis volo, eo videlicet tenore ut dignitates usus et consuetudines quas pater meus tempore antecessorum vestrorum in regno Angliæ habuit, ego tempore vestro in eodem regno meo integre obtineam. Notumque habeat Sanctitas vestra quod me vivente, Deo auxiliante, dignitates et usus regni Angliæ non minuentur. Et si ego quod absit in tanta me dejectione ponerem, optimates mei, immo totius Angliæ populus, id nullo modo pateretur. Habita igitur, carissime pater, utiliori deliberatione, ita se erga nos moderetur benignitas vestra, ne, quod invitus faciam, a vestra me cogatis recedere obedientia;' Foed. i. 8; Bromton, c. 999; Foëx, Acts &c., ii. 163.

² See above, vol. i. p. 602, note 2.

Edward III¹, and passed away leaving scarcely a trace under the later kings.

The great assumption of universal supremacy, with the resistance which it provoked, and the evasions at which it connived, gives surpassing interest to another side of medieval history. This claim however in its direct form, that is, in the region of secular jurisdiction, the assertion that the pope is supreme, so that he can depose the king or release the subject from his oath and duty of allegiance, does not enter into this portion of our subject. The discussions which took place on the great struggle between John XXII and Lewis of Bavaria had their bearings on later history, but only affect England, in common with the Avignon papacy and the great schism, as tending to shake all belief in the dogmatic assumptions of Rome. The parliament of 1399 declared that the crown and realm of England had been in all time past so free that neither pope nor any other outside the realm had a right to meddle therewith².

The general claims of spiritual supremacy for the popedom.

The claim of spiritual supremacy, within the region of spiritual jurisdiction and property, will meet us at every turn, but the history of its origin and growth belongs to an earlier stage of ecclesiastical history.

The idea of placing in one and the same hand the direct control of all causes temporal and spiritual was not unknown in the middle ages. The pope's spiritual supremacy being granted, complete harmony might be attained not only by making the pope supreme in matters temporal, but by delegating to the king supremacy in matters spiritual. Before the struggle about investiture arose, Sylvester II had empowered the newly-made king Stephen of Hungary to act as the papal representative in regulating the churches of his kingdom³, and after that great controversy had begun, the Great Count Roger of Sicily received from Urban II⁴ a grant of hereditary ecclesi-

Theory of uniting temporal and spiritual sovereignty.

Royal legations.

¹ Vol. i. p. 561; vol. ii. pp. 159, 435.

² Rot. Parl. iii. 419.

³ 'Ecclesias Dei, una cum populis nostra vice ei ordinandas relinquimus.' See the Bull dated March 27, 1000; in Cocquelines, Bullar. i. 399; Gieseler, ii. 463.

⁴ July 5, 1098; on the great question of the 'Sicilian Monarchy' see Giannone, Hist. Naples, l. x. c. 8; Mosheim, Church Hist. ii. p. 5; Gieseler, vol. iii. p. 33. The words are 'quae per legatum acturi sumus per vestram

Sicilian monarchy.

Story of the legation offered to Henry II.

Supremacy in spirituals claimed for him.

astical jurisdiction, which, under the name of the 'Sicilian monarchy,' became, in the hands of his successors, a unique feature of the constitution of the kingdom. It is not improbable that early in the Becket controversy such a solution of the difficulties under which Alexander III was labouring might have been attempted in England: certainly the contemporary chroniclers believed that Henry II, when he was demanding the legatine office for Roger of York, received from the pope an offer of the legation for himself¹. But there were not wanting men who would try to persuade him that even without any such commission he was supreme in spiritual as well as in temporal matters. Reginald Fitz Urse, when he was disputing with Becket just before the murder, asked him from whom he had the archbishopric? Thomas replied, 'The spirituals I have from God and my lord the pope, the temporal and possessions from my lord the king.' 'Do you not,' asked Reginald, 'acknowledge that you hold the whole from the king?' 'No,' was the prelate's answer; 'we have to render to the king the things that are the king's, and to God the things that are God's'². The words of the archbishop embody the commonly received idea; the words of Reginald, although they do not represent the theory of Henry II, contain the germ of the doctrine which was formulated under Henry VIII³.

industriam legati vice exhiberi volumus, quando ad vos ex latere nostro miserimus; Muratori, Scriptores, v. 602.

¹ Hoveden, i. 223: 'ad petitionem clericorum regis concessit dominus papa ut rex ipse legatus esset totius Angliae.' Cf. Gervase, i. 181; W. Cant. ed. Robertson, i. p. 25. As a matter of fact it was the legation of the archbishop of York that was in question; see Robertson, Becket, pp. 105, 106.

² W. Fitz Stephen, S. T. C. i. 296; ed. Robertson, iii. 134.

³ On the meaning of the word spiritual, especially in connexion with the oath taken by the bishops to the crown, see an essay by Mr. J. W. Lea, published in 1875; 'The Bishops' Oath of Homage.' Under spiritualia are really included three distinct things, which may be described as (1) spiritualia characteris vel ordinis—the powers bestowed at consecration; (2) spiritualia ministerii vel jurisdictionis, the powers which a bishop receives at his confirmation and in virtue of which he is supposed to act as the servant or representative of his church, which guards these spiritualities during the vacancy; (3) spiritualia beneficii; the ecclesiastical revenue arising from other sources than land; which 'spiritualia' he acquires together with the temporalities on doing homage. These last are the only spiritualia which he holds of the crown, the first and second never being in the royal hands to bestow. And these are often both in legal and common language included under the term temporalities.

378. Whatever was the precise nature of the papal supremacy, the highest dignity in the hierarchy of the national church was understood to belong to the church of Canterbury, of which the archbishop was the head and minister; he was 'alterius orbis papa;' he was likewise, and in consequence, the first constitutional adviser of the crown. The archbishop of York and the bishops shared, in a somewhat lower degree, both his spiritual and his temporal authority; like him they had large estates which they held of the king, seats in the national council, preeminence in the national synod, and places in the general councils of the church. The right of appointing the bishops and of regulating their powers was thus one of the first points upon which the national church, the crown, and the papacy were likely to come into collision.

Dignity of archbishop and bishop.

Right of appointment to sees.

The co-operation of clergy and laity in the election of bishops before the Conquest has been already illustrated¹. The struggle between Henry I and Anselm on the question of investiture terminated in a compromise: the king gave up his claim to invest with staff and ring; the archbishop undertook that no bishop elect should be disqualified for consecration by the fact that he had done homage to the king². Although Henry retained the power of nominating to the vacant sees³, the compact resulted in a shadowy recognition of the right of canonical election claimed by the chapters of the cathedrals, and exercised occasionally under the royal dictation: to the metropolitan of course belonged consecration and the bestowal of the spiritualities; temporal property and authority were received from the royal hands. Stephen at his accession more distinctly recognised the rule of canonical substitution⁴, and in his reign the clergy contended with some success for their right. Henry II and Richard observed the form of election under strict supervision, and John, shortly before he granted the great charter, issued as Struggle and compromise of Anselm.

Canonical right confirmed by Stephen and John.

¹ Vol. i. pp. 149, 150.

² Flor. Wig. A.D. 1107; Eadmer, lib. iv. p. 91; see above, vol. i. pp. 342, 343.

³ 'Retento electionis privilegio;' W. Malmesb. G. R. § 417; cf. Liebermann, Hugo von Lyon, p. 46; and see above vol. i. § 125, pp. 342, 343.

⁴ Select Charters (ed. 3), pp. 115, 121; Statutes, i. 3; cf. vol. i. p. 347.

a bribe to the bishops a shorter charter confirming the right of free election, subject to the royal licence and approval, neither of which was to be withheld without just cause¹. This charter of John may be regarded as the fullest and final recognition of the canonical right which had been maintained as the common law of the church ever since the Conquest; which had been ostensibly respected since the reign of Henry I²; and which the crown, however often it evaded it, did not henceforth attempt to override. The earlier practice, recorded in the Constitutions of Clarendon³, according to which the election was made in the Curia Regis, in a national council, or in the royal chapel before the justiciar, a relic perhaps of the custom of nominating the prelates in the Witenagemot, was superseded by this enactment: the election took place in the chapter-house of the cathedral, and the king's wishes were signified by letter or message, not as before by direct dictation. When the elected prelate had obtained the royal assent to his promotion, the election was examined and confirmed by the metropolitan; and the ceremony of consecration completed the spiritual character of the bishop. On his confirmation the elected prelate received the spiritualities of his see, the right of ecclesiastical jurisdiction in his diocese, which during the vacancy had been in the hands of the archbishop or of the chapter⁴; and at his consecration he made a profession of obedience to the archbishop and the metropolitan church. From the crown, before or after consecration, he received the temporalities of his see, and thereupon made to the king a promise of fealty answering to the homage and fealty of a temporal lord⁵.

Method of elections.

Restitution of spiritualities and temporalities.

Profession and fealty.

¹ Select Charters (ed. 3), p. 288; Statutes, i. 5; Foed. i. 126, 127: this charter was confirmed by Innocent III and also by Gregory IX.

² Bishop Roger of Salisbury is said to have been the first prelate canonically elected since the Conquest.

³ Select Charters, p. 140.

⁴ The question to whom the custody of the spiritualities belonged during the vacancy of the see was disputed between the archbishop and the chapters, and was settled in the course of the thirteenth century by separate agreement with the several cathedral bodies. The archbishops moreover regarded the restitution of spiritualities before consecration as an act of grace; see Gibson, Codex, p. 133.

⁵ See above, vol. i. p. 386, and the forms of oath given by Mr. Lea in his essay mentioned above, p. 302.

379. It was not until the thirteenth century that the popes began to interfere directly in the appointment to the suffragan sees. Over the metropolitans they had long before attempted to exercise a controlling influence, in two ways: by the gift of the pall, and by the institution of legations. The pall was a sort of collar of white wool, with pendant stripes before and behind, embroidered with four purple crosses¹. The lambs from whose wool it was made were annually presented by the nuns of S. Agnes, blessed by the pope, and kept under the care of the apostolic subdeacons; and the pall, when it was ready for use, was again blessed at the tomb of S. Peter and left there all night. It was presented to the newly-appointed metropolitans at first as a compliment, but it soon began to be regarded as an emblem of metropolitan power, and by and by to be accepted as the vehicle by which metropolitan power was conveyed. The bestowal of the pall was in its origin Byzantine, the right to wear some such portion of the imperial dress having been bestowed by the emperor on his patriarchs: in the newer form it had become a regular institution before the foundation of the English church; S. Gregory sent a pall to Augustine, and so important was the matter that, even after the breach with Rome, archbishop Holdegate of York in 1545 went through the form of receiving one from Cranmer². Until he received the pall the archbishop did not, except under very peculiar circumstances, venture to consecrate bishops³. On the occasion of its reception

Papal interference with the appointment of metropolitans.

The pall.

Origin of the pall.

Its importance.

¹ See Maskell, Monumenta Ritualia, iii. p. cxxxv; Alban Butler, Lives of the Saints, Jan. 21, and June 8; Decr. p. i. dist. 100; Greg. IX. lib. i. tit. 6. c. 4.

² The ceremony used on the occasion is printed from Cranmer's Register in the Gentleman's Magazine for November 1860, p. 523. The oath taken by Holdegate on the occasion is printed in the Concilia. The oath taken by Cranmer and his protest at the same time are given in Strype's Memorials of Cranmer, Appendix, nos. v. and vi.

³ Thus in 1382 archbishop Courtenay was present at the consecration of the bishops of London and Durham, but did not lay on his hands, because he had not received the pall; Ang. Sac. i. 121. It did not prevent the suffragans from acting; Greg. IX. lib. i. tit. 6. c. 11. It was a question whether the archbishop of Canterbury might carry his cross before he received the pall. It was ruled that if he were a bishop when elected, he might not, as his translation would require papal confirmation: if he were not a bishop at the time of election, he might carry his cross as soon as he was consecrated to the archiepiscopal see. See Gervase, i. 521. The

he had to swear obedience to the pope in a form which gradually became more stringent¹; in early times he undertook a journey to Rome for the purpose; but after the time of Lanfranc the pall was generally brought by special envoys from the apostolic see, and a great ceremony took place on the occasion of the investiture. This transaction formed a very close link between the archbishop and the pope, and, although the pall was never refused to a duly qualified candidate, the claim of a discretion to give or refuse in fact attributed to the pope a power of veto on the elections made by national churches and sovereigns.

The legation.
Rarity of legations to England before the Norman Conquest.

380. The bestowal of legatine authority on the archbishops came into use much later. England before the Conquest had been singularly exempt from direct interference. The visits of the archbishops to Rome, to receive the pall in person, seem to have been regarded as a sufficient recognition of the dignity of the apostolic see; there were no heresies to require castigation from the central court, and the local and political quarrels of the kingdom were too remote from papal interests to be worth the trouble of a legation. In the earlier days an occasional envoy appeared, either to strengthen the missionary efforts of the native church, or to obtain the assent of the English prelates to the enactments of Roman councils; and in the reign of the Confessor a legation had been sent by Alexander II probably with a view of remedying the evils caused by the adhesion of Stigand to the antipope Benedict X. The visitatorial jurisdiction which Gregory VII attempted to exercise had been resisted by the Conqueror, who, although in 1070 he availed himself of the presence of the legates to displace the hostile bishops, had formally laid down the rule that no legate should be allowed to land in England unless he had been appointed at the request of the king and the church². Nor was the arrival of such an officer

Resistance to legatine authority.

several dates of the occasions on which the archbishops received the pall will be found in my Registrum Sacrum Anglicanum, pp. 140, 141.

¹ The custom is said by Gieseler to appear first in 1073; see Eccl. Hist. (ed. Hull), vol. iii. p. 168, where several forms are given. The oath taken by archbishop Neville of York in 1374 is printed in the Registrum Palatinum, iii. 524-528. See also Foxe, Acts and Monuments, ii. 261.

² See Eadmer, lib. v. p. 118; where the legation of abbot Anselm is rejected by the clergy and magnates; and lib. vi. p. 138, where Henry I more welcome to the clergy. Anselm had to remonstrate with Paschal II for giving to the archbishop of Vienne legatine power over England, and in doing so to assert that such authority belonged by prescriptive right to the see of Canterbury¹. The visit of John of Crema, who held a legatine council at London in 1125, was regarded as an insult to the church of Canterbury, and as soon as he had departed the archbishop, William of Corbeil, went to Rome, where he obtained for himself a commission as legate with jurisdiction over the whole island of Britain².

The precedent thus set was an important one: the placing of the legatine power, that is, the visitatorial jurisdiction of the Roman see as then defined, in the hand of the metropolitan of Canterbury, at once forced the kings, who had refused to receive the legate a latere, to admit the supreme jurisdiction of the pope when vested in one of their own counsellors; it also had the effect of giving to the ordinary metropolitan jurisdiction the appearance of a delegated authority from Rome³. On the death of William of Corbeil, bishop Alberic of Ostia was sent on a mission of reform, and on his departure Henry of Blois, bishop of Winchester, obtained the office of legate in preference to the newly-elected archbishop Theobald⁴. The death of pope Innocent II brought bishop Henry's legation to an end, and the influence of Theobald prevented the succeeding popes from renewing

The legation committed to the archbishop of Canterbury.

Henry of Blois, Theobald, and Thomas Becket.

declares that he will not part with the privileges which his father had obtained from the holy see, 'in quibus haec, et de maximis una, erat quae regnum Angliae liberum ab omni legati ditione constituerat.' Cf. Flor. Wig. ii. 70. Lanfranc received authority from Alexander II to settle two causes left undetermined by the legates in 1070; 'nostrae et apostolicae auctoritatis vicem;' Wilk. Conc. i. 326; Foed. i. 1. See Gieseler, Eccl. Hist. (ed. Hull), iii. 184.

¹ See Eadmer, lib. iii. p. 58; Anselm, Epistt. iv. 2. Anselm says, 'Quando Romae fui ostendi praefato domino papae de legatione Romana super regnum Angliae, quam ipsius regni homines asseverant ab antiquis temporibus usque ad nostrum tempus ecclesiam Cantuariensem habuisse . . . Legationem vero quam usque ad nostrum tempus, secundum praedictum testimonium Ecclesia tenuerat, mihi dominus papa non abstulit.'

² See the Bull of Honorius II, dated Jan. 25, 1126; Ang. Sac. i. 792; cf. Cont. Fl. Wig. ii. 84.

³ In 1439 the clergy had to petition that the acts of the spiritual courts might not be so construed as to bring them under the statute of praemunire; Wilk. Conc. iii. 534.

⁴ March 1, 1139; W. Malmesb. Hist. Nov. ii. § 22; John Salisb. ep. 89.

it. In 1150 Eugenius III ventured to bestow the office on Theobald, who retained it as long as he lived. Thomas Becket, who succeeded him, had not obtained the commission before he quarreled with the king; and Henry, in consequence of that quarrel, exerted himself to such purpose that the pope nominated as legate archbishop Roger of York¹. But two years later, when the pope was stronger and Henry had put himself in the wrong, Thomas received the commission², under which he proceeded to anathematise his opponents. The next two archbishops, Richard and Baldwin, were made legates as matter of course. When Baldwin went to the Crusade, William Longchamp obtained the office, which he retained until the death of the pontiff who appointed him³. Hubert Walter, two years after his appointment as archbishop, was made legate⁴, and had to drop the title on the death of Celestine III. Langton was formally appointed by Innocent III, but was hampered in the exercise of his duty by Gualo and Pandulf, until in 1221 he obtained a promise from Honorius III that as long as he lived no other legate should be sent. From that date the archbishops seem to have received the ordinary legatine commission as soon as their election was recognised at Rome; they were 'legati nati'⁵; and the title of legate of the apostolic see was regularly given to them in all formal documents. But this was not understood as precluding the mission of special legates, or legates a latere, who represented the pope himself and superseded the authority of the resident legates. Such were, in the thirteenth century, Otho and Othobon and that cardinal Guy Foulquois who assisted Henry III against Simon de Montfort⁶. Their visits were either prompted by the king when he wanted support against the nation, or forced on king and nation alike by the necessities of foreign politics.

Legation of William Longchamp, 1190.

Legation of Langton.

Regular legation of the archbishops.

Occasional
legates.

¹ Feb. 27, 1164.

² Apr. 24, 1166.

³ Vol. i. p. 536.

⁴ March 18, 1195; Hoveden, iii. 290. See Gervase, i. 551.

⁵ See Wilk. Conc. iii. 484.

⁶ The full list of papal legations sent to England during the middle ages would be a very long one. It is necessary to distinguish carefully between the mission of mere occasional envoys such as troubled England in the reign of Henry III and the regular plenipotentiary legates such as Otho and Othobon.

The history of the fifteenth century gave a renewed prominence to the office. Martin V had revived the policy of Gregory VII, and, relying on the doctrine that all bishops are but servants of the see of Rome, had insisted that Chichele should procure the repeal of the Statutes of Provisors¹. Chichele had not the power to effect this, and the pope, notwithstanding his professions of obedience, believed that he had not the will. He issued letters therefore in which he suspended the archbishop from his legatine office; but Chichele protested, appealing to the decision of a general council, and the bulls were seized by royal order². Henry Beaufort, bishop of Winchester, was made legate for the Bohemian war, and his presence in England during the continuance of the commission was resented by Chichele as an assumption of dangerous power, whilst Gloucester protested in the king's name against his reception as legate³. But his legation did not supersede the ordinary jurisdiction. After the death of Chichele the old rule was observed, and the archbishop of Canterbury, being generally a cardinal, fulfilled in some measure the functions of a legate a latere as well. Stafford, Dene, and Warham were not cardinals, but ordinary legates. It was the legatine commission of Wolsey, unexampled in its fulness and importance, which, under the disingenuous dealing of Henry VIII, who had applied for the commission and granted licence to accept it, was made the pretext of his downfall, and which, after Chichele threatened with suspension from his legation.

The legatine office in the fifteenth century.

Its importance in the case of Wolsey.

¹ The long correspondence on this point and other questions in dispute is printed by Wilkins in the Concilia, iii. 471-486. There was some underhand work going on at the time, probably connected with the Beaufort and Gloucester quarrel.

² Wilk. Conc. iii. 484, 485. The archbishop appealed against the papal suspension to the decision of a general council, March 22, 1427; and royal orders for seizing the bulls were issued March 1; ib. p. 486. The suspension does not seem to have taken effect.

³ The protest of Richard Caudray, the king's proctor, against Beaufort's visit to England as legate in 1428 is printed in Foxe, Acts and Monuments, iii. 717; Brown, Fasc. Rer. Expetend., ii. 618 sq. He asserts that the kings of England 'tam speciali privilegio quam consuetudine laudabili legitimeque praescripta, necnon a tempore et per tempus cujus contrarii memoria hominum non existit pacifice et inconcusse observata, sufficienter dotati legitimeque muniti, quod nullus apostolicae sedis legatus venire debeat in regnum suum Angliae aut alias suas terras et dominia nisi ad regis Angliae pro tempore existentis vocationem, requisitionem, invitationem, seu rogatum.' See above, p. 112.

threatening to involve the whole English church in the penalties of praemunire, resulted in the great act of recognition which declared the king to be, 'so far as is allowed by the law of Christ,' supreme head on earth of the Church of England. The combination of the ordinary metropolitan authority with the extraordinary legatine authority, having thus for ages answered its purpose of giving supreme power to the pope, and substituting an adventitious source of strength for the spontaneous action of the national church, brought about a crisis which overthrew the papal power in England, and altered for all time to come the relations of Church and State.

Legation of the archbishops of York.

The dignity of the pall and the ordinary commission of legate were of course given only to the primates; the archbishops of York, from the time of Thoresby, who was made legate in the year 1352, down to the reformation, received the legatine commission as well as the pall¹.

Interference of the popes in episcopal appointments.

381. The attempts of the pope, parallel with the attempts of the king, to obtain a decisive voice in the appointment of suffragan bishops, have a history which brings out other points of interest, some of which are common to the archiepiscopal sees also. The papal interference in these appointments might be justified either by supposing the confirmation of an undisputed election to be needed, or by the judicial character of the apostolic see in cases of dispute or appeal. If we set aside the instances of papal interference which belong to the missionary stage of Anglo-Saxon church history, the first cases in which direct recourse to Rome was adopted for the appointment of bishops were those of Giso of Wells and Walter of Hereford. These two prelates, having doubts about the canonical competency of archbishop Stigand, went to Nicolas II in 1061, and received consecration at his hands². In this case the actual nomination had been made at home, and the question at issue was one which might fairly be referred to the arbitration of the apostolic see.

Origin in disputed cases.

¹ The legatine commission of the archbishop of York was perhaps a result of the settlement of the great dispute between the two primates as to the right to bear their crosses erect in each other's province; see Raine, Lives of the Archbishops of York, i. 456, 457.

² Chron. Sax. A.D. 1061.

In 1119 Calixtus II, taking advantage of the dispute between archbishop Ralph and the king on one side, and Thurstan the archbishop elect of York on the other, relative to the obedience due by York to Canterbury, consecrated Thurstan in opposition to both king and primate¹; but here the pope believed himself to be asserting the cause of justice, and, after some delay, the opposing parties acquiesced in the decision: there was no question as to the appointment, only as to the conditions of consecration.

As soon however as the clergy under Stephen had obtained a recognised voice in the election of the bishops, questions were raised which had the effect of referring numberless cases to the determination of the pope as supreme judge. The king's right of licencing, and of assenting or withholding assent to, the election, was backed up by his power of influencing the opinion of the electors. In every chapter he had a party who would vote for his nominee, if he cared to press one upon them; the shadowy freedom of election left room for other competition besides; the overt exercise of such royal influence, the frequent suspicion of simony, and the various methods of election by inspiration, by compromise, or by scrutiny², were fruitful in occasions for appeal. The metropolitan could quash a disputed election, but his power of confirming such a one was limited by this right of appeal³. Under Stephen, who was seldom strong enough to force his candidate on the chapters⁴, the royal influence was sometimes set aside in favour of the papal, and was more than once a matter of barter. The election of archbishop Theobald was transacted under the eye of the legate Alberic, who consecrated him⁵; the election of Anselm, abbot of S. Edmund's, to the see of London, was opposed by the dean of S. Paul's and his kinsmen, and, after being discussed at Rome, was quashed by the same legate⁶; archbishop William of York, the king's

Multiplication of disputes.

Causes of dispute.

Disputed cases carried to Rome.

¹ Ord. Vit. lib. xii. c. 21.

² See vol. i. p. 679.

³ This was ruled by Alexander IV in 1256; Ang. Sac. i. 637.

⁴ In 1136 Stephen restored the possessions of the see of Bath to the bishop elect, 'canonica prius electione praeecedente;' Foed. i. 16.

⁵ R. Diceto, i. 252.

⁶ Ib. i. 250, 251.

nephew, was after consecration deposed by Eugenius III, and Henry Murdac, abbot of Fountains, appointed in his stead¹; Gilbert Foliot, bishop of Hereford, was consecrated by the archbishop when in exile, on the nomination of the Angevin party opposed to Stephen²; Richard de Belmeis was confirmed in the see of London by the pope, but, in order to obtain royal recognition, hampered himself with debt which hurried him to his grave³; Hugh de Puiset, whose election to Durham was quashed by his metropolitan, sought and found consecration at Rome⁴. Matters were different under Henry II, who failed however in his attempts to prevent appeals to Rome on this point; the election of Thomas Becket to Canterbury was effected without opposition, the papal confirmation and gift of the pall being apparently a matter of course quite as much as the consent of the monks and the bishops; but after Becket's death and the confusion which his long struggle had caused, Henry found himself obliged to seek at Rome a decision of the critical questions which arose as to the episcopate. To the consecration of the prelates chosen in 1173 objections were raised in every quarter; the canonical competency and the formal completeness of the election were denied on the clerical side; the young king Henry opposed his father's acts of licence and assent⁵; and, although Alexander III confirmed the elections, neither king nor chapters gained strength by the decision. At the end however of the twelfth century the relations of the three parties were sufficiently well ascertained. The royal licence and assent were indispensable; the elective right of the chapters and the archiepiscopal confirmation were formally admitted; and the power of the pope to determine all causes which arose upon disputed questions was too strongly founded in practice to be controverted by the crown. This power was however, in the case of the suffragans, an appellate jurisdiction only. It was the archbishops alone who required

Case of the election of Becket.

Appeals carried to Rome.

Position of affairs at the close of the twelfth century.

¹ John of Hexham (ed. Raine), p. 154. William was deposed because he had been elected 'ex ore regis' and had been consecrated in defiance of an appeal; ib. p. 142.

² Gervase, i. 135.

⁴ Gervase, i. 157.

³ See R. Diceto, vol. i. pref. pp. xxiv, xxv.

⁵ R. Diceto, i. 368, 369; Gervase, i. 245.

papal confirmation and recognition by the gift of the pall; nor, although Paschal II had claimed a right to take cognisance of and to confirm all elections, was the metropolitan authority of Canterbury and York as yet overruled. The claim of the bishops to take part in the election of the archbishops, which was occasionally enforced during the twelfth century, was rejected by Innocent III, and was never raised afterwards¹.

382. The history of the thirteenth century is a long record of disputes, beginning with the critical struggle for Canterbury after the death of Hubert Walter. But even before this Innocent III had asserted, in the case of a suffragan see, a new principle of justice². In 1204, when the see of Winchester was vacant, the chapter was divided between the dean of Salisbury and the precentor of Lincoln; the pope at the king's request consecrated Peter des Roches, and laid down the rule that where the electors have knowingly elected an unworthy person they lose the right of making the next election. The appointment of Langton to Canterbury was not brought under this rule, but had its special importance in this: hitherto the pope had done no more than reject unfit candidates or determine the validity of elections; now he himself proposed a candidate, pushed him through the process of election, and confirmed the promotion of Innocent III.

Proceedings

Important point in the case of Langton.

¹ Of the early archbishops after the Conquest, Lanfranc and Anselm were nominated by the kings with some show of acceptance in the national council; Ralph was chosen by the prior and monks and accepted by the king and bishops; William of Corbeil was chosen by the monks out of four proposed by the bishops to the king against the wish of the monks; Theobald was chosen by the bishops and the monks in national council; Becket by the bishops, monks, and clergy of the province, in the presence of the Justiciar. After Becket's death, Roger abbot of Bec was chosen by both parties, but declined the election; after some delay the monks chose two candidates, Odo their prior and Richard prior of Dover; the bishops selected the latter, and he was confirmed by the pope. Baldwin, his successor, was chosen first by the bishops, Dec. 2, 1184, and then by the monks, Dec. 16, in separate elections, both under royal pressure. Reginald Fitz Jocelin was chosen by the monks in opposition to the bishops and to the king's nomination; Hubert Walter by the monks on Saturday, May 29, 1193, and by the bishops on the following Sunday, each party claiming the right and shutting their eyes to the act of the other. On Hubert's death the bishops acting with the king chose John de Gray, the monks their subprior. At Langton's appointment the strife ended; see vol. i. p. 559.

² Decr. Greg. IX, lib. i. tit. 6. c. 25.

Case of Richard le Grand.

Case of Edmund.

Cases of Kilwardby and Peckham.

although the royal assent was withheld. It was seen to be an extreme measure, but it served as a precedent. On Langton's death the king, by promising a large grant of money to the pope, prevailed on him to quash the election made by the monks, to keep the appointment to himself, and to nominate the person whom the king recommended¹. This Gregory IX did 'ex plenitudine potestatis,' and thus by Henry's connivance reasserted the principle laid down by Innocent in 1204, that, in case of an election quashed upon appeal, the judge has an absolute right of appointment. Archbishop Edmund was appointed in 1234 in the same summary way in which Langton had been chosen in 1207²; Boniface was elected by the chapter at the earnest petition of the king³; but, as his election required papal confirmation, the pope took the opportunity of committing to him the administration of his see in temporals as well as spirituals⁴; Kilwardby and Peckham⁵ were nominated by the pope 'ex plenitudine potestatis,' the king exacting, in the former case at least, an acknowledgment, on the restitution of the temporalities, that the recognition was a matter of special favour and not to be construed as a precedent⁶. In the ¹ Vol. ii. p. 43; M. Paris, iii. 169, 187.

² The pope quashed three elections made by the monks and then empowered them to elect Edmund; M. Paris, iii. 243, 244.

³ M. Paris, iv. 104. Boniface was elected by the convent, Feb. 1, 1241. They petitioned that the election might be confirmed, or if not that the pope would 'præficere' him: and this petition was repeated, June 10, 1241. The bull was dated 16 Kal. Oct. 1243. See the details in Cont. Gerv. ii. 190-193.

⁴ Cont. Gerv. ii. 200.

⁵ On the death of Boniface, William Chillenden, prior of Canterbury, was elected, and renounced the election, whereupon the pope nominated Kilwardby by provision; Ann. Winton. p. 112; Waverl. p. 379. Kilwardby was made a cardinal in 1278; the monks thereupon elected bishop Burnell the chancellor. The pope provided Peckham, and Burnell, whose election was quashed, did not further contest the point. See Frynne, Records, iii. 214.

⁶ The words are very important: 'Cum, ecclesiis cathedralibus in regno Angliæ viduatis, et de jure debeat et solet de consuetudine provideri per electionem canonicam ab hiis potissime celebrandam collegiis, capitulis et personis ad quas jus pertinet eligendi, petita tamen prius ab illustri rege Angliæ super hoc licentia et optenta; et demum celebrata electione persona electi eidem regi debeat præsentari, ut idem rex contra personam ipsam possit proponere si quid rationabile habeat contra eam, videtur eidem domino regi et suo consilio quod sibi et ecclesiæ, cujus ipse patronus est pariter et defensor, fiat præjudicium in hac parte, præcipue si res case of Peckham, as the pope had used words closely resembling those employed in that of Boniface, the king introduced into the writ of restitution a clause saving his own rights¹. Robert Winchelsey was appointed with the unanimous consent of all parties². Case of Winchelsey.

Whilst the primacy was thus made the prize of the stronger and more pertinacious claimant, the appointments to the bishoprics were a constant matter of dispute. The freedom of election promised by John had resulted in a freedom of litigation and little more. The attempts of Henry III to influence the chapters were undignified and unsuccessful; his candidates were seldom chosen; the pope had a plentiful harvest of appeals. Between 1215 and 1264 there were not fewer than thirty disputed elections carried to Rome for decision³. On the last of these occasions, a contested election to Winchester in 1262, the pope, wearied with discussion, adopted the plan which Innocent III and Gregory IX had followed, rejected both candidates, declared the elective power to be forfeited, and put in his own nominee⁴. This bold measure had the effect of stopping appeals for a time; only one case more occurred during the reign of Henry III. In 1265 the canons of York elected William Langton; the pope appointed S. Bonaventura, who, knowing the disturbed state of the kingdom, declined the appointment. The chapter was then allowed to postulate the bishop of Bath⁵. Numerous disputed elections to suffragan sees under Henry III.

383. Under Edward I there were only twelve cases of the kind; yet, although the rarity of the appeals shows the king to have become stronger, they were so managed by the popes as to trahitur in aliis ecclesiis Angliae in exemplum, quod summus pontifex hiis omissis in hoc casu, ubi nec in materia nec in forma electionis inventum est fuisse peccatum, nec in ipsius litteris expressum, potestatem sibi assumpserit ipsi ecclesiae providendi,' &c.; Prynn, Records, iii. 122.*

¹ Prynn, Records, iii. 223.

² The election of Winchelsey, one of the very few which the popes allowed to be canonical, is described at length in the bull of confirmation issued by Celestine V; Wilkins, Conc. ii. 197, 198.

³ The details of most of these disputes may be found in the second volume of Prynn's Records.

⁴ The monks were divided; fifty-four chose Oliver de Tracy, seven chose Andrew of London; the pope provided John of Exeter; Ann. Winton. p. 99.

⁵ See Raine, Fasti Eboracenses, i. 302.

Gradual suspension or extinction of the elective rights of chapters.

Papal rights on translation.

increase their own influence, and the result was the extinction, for more than a century, of the elective right of the chapters¹. The practice of translating bishops from one see to another, a practice which had been very rare until now, gave an opportunity for a new claim. Only papal authority could loose the tie that bound the bishop to the church of his consecration²; it was the pope's duty and privilege to see that the divorced church should not remain unconsoled, and when, on the petition of the king or the chapter, he had authorised the translation, he filled up the vacancy so caused³. Thus in 1299, when, on a double election at Ely, both candidates had surrendered their rights to the pope, Boniface VIII nominated the bishop of Norwich to Ely, and filled up Norwich with one of the two complaisant disputants from Ely⁴. On the next vacancy at Ely, in 1302, he appointed a candidate, Robert Orford, whose election archbishop Winchelsey had refused to confirm, but who had re-

¹ The most famous case in the first half of Edward's reign was the papal provision of John of Pontoise to the see of Winchester, which the pope made after quashing an election; he had great difficulty in obtaining his temporalities; Prynne, Records, iii. 292, 1255, 1261; Foed. i. 610. In 1280 the chapter of Carlisle elected without royal licence, damaging the interest of the crown, as it was alleged, to the amount of £60,000; ib. p. 1230; Foed. i. 579.

² Anselm, Epp. iii. 126; Decr. Greg. IX. lib. i. tit. 7. Nicolas IV ordered that all postulations, that is, elections of persons disqualified, including translations, should be personally sued out at Rome. In 1287 Honorius IV, on a case of the kind arising, reserved the provision to the see of Emly; Theiner, Vet. Mon. p. 138.

³ The only translations, except to the archiepiscopal sees, which took place from the Conquest to the reign of Edward I, were the following: Hervey from Bangor to Ely in 1109 (Anselm, Epp. iii. 126); Gilbert Foliot from Hereford to London in 1163 (see the pope's letter in R. Diceto, i. 309); Richard le Poor from Chichester to Salisbury in 1217, and thence to Durham in 1228 (Ang. Sac. i. 731); William of Raleigh from Norwich to Winchester in 1244, having been elected to Winchester before he was bishop of Norwich (Ang. Sac. i. 307); Nicolas of Ely from Worcester to Winchester 'per ordinationem domini papae Clementis,' in 1268 (ibid. p. 312). In all these cases the pope was consulted; but he did not in all of them fill up the see vacated by translation. In the last case the king exacted an acknowledgment of the same kind as that obtained from archbishop Kilwardby; Prynne, Records, iii. 122.

⁴ The monks of Ely were divided, the majority chose their prior John, the minority John Langton, the king's treasurer; the prior appealed to the pope, who, having failed to make them unanimous, translated the bishop of Norwich and appointed the prior to Norwich; Ang. Sac. i. 639; Prynne, Records, iii. 799.

nounced the election by the chapter before he accepted the nomination by the pope¹. Nearly at the same time the see of Worcester was vacant, and a monk of the house, named John of S. German, was elected to fill it. He was accepted by the king, but made such a show of reluctance that Winchelsey delayed his confirmation, and the matter was carried to Rome. There Boniface VIII obtained from John the renunciation of his claim, and immediately consecrated to the see a Franciscan named William Gainsborough.

Boniface
VIII provides to sees.

Boniface was not content with the substance of supreme power; he took in both these cases a further step in which he directly attacked the king's constitutional relation to the episcopate. We have seen that Innocent IV, in confirming the election of Boniface to the see of Canterbury in 1243, had ventured to commit to him the administration of his church in temporals as well as spirituals². We are not told how this assumption was regarded in England, or whether it was noticed at all. Nor did it immediately become a precedent in the appointments to English sees. Gradually however the form was introduced into the bulls by which Scottish and Irish prelates were nominated³, and expressions similar in terms but not

He attempts to confer the temporalities as well as the spirit-ualities.

¹ Winchelsey rejected Orford on account of his literary insufficiency; Ang. Sac. i. 640; Prynne, Records, iii. 919.

² Cont. Gervas. ii. 200: 'Rogamus itaque universitatem vestram et hortamur attentius, per apostolica scripta vobis praeicipiendo mandantes, quatinus praefatum electum ad saepe dictam ecclesiam, cujus in spiritualibus et temporalibus plenam sibi administrationem commisimus, cum benedictionis nostrae gratia procedentem, devote ac hilariter admittentes et honeste tractantes, sibi obedientiam et reverentiam debitam impendatis;' Sept. 16, 1243.

³ In the letters confirming the election of a bishop of Killaloe in 1253, Innocent IV used the form 'plena tibi ejusdem ecclesiae tam in spiritualibus quam in temporalibus administratione concessa;' Theiner, Vet. Mon. p. 58; yet this is accompanied by a letter to the king requesting him to grant the temporalities. In the bulls for the Scottish sees at the same time the claim is insinuated but not definitely expressed; ibid. pp. 60, 61. In the appointment to Cashel in 1254, the pope exhorts the archbishop 'quatenus ecclesiam tibi commissam in spiritualibus et temporalibus ita studeas gubernare quod,' &c.; ibid. p. 62. Alexander IV in some cases uses the direct form without any circumlocution; instances will be found both in Theiner's Vetera Monumenta, p. 66, and for foreign churches in the Bullaria of the Mendicant orders. A still earlier case occurs in an election to the see of Cashel in 1237. Gregory IX empowers the legate

Papal claim to confer temporalities.

quite so wide in meaning were adopted both in English and foreign appointments. A new bishop was praised for his circumspection in spiritual and temporal things, or a pious hope was expressed that the church committed to a new pastor would gain both spiritual and temporal advantage from his administration. Both these forms however fell far short of any direct commission of authority such as was used in the Irish and Scottish cases. In the bull for the appointment of archbishop Peckham, Nicolas III introduced a more direct bestowal of authority, nearly resembling that used for Boniface; but even then Edward's attention was caught rather by the over-ruling of the custom of the realm in elections, than by the form of nomination: nor did he remonstrate when in the promotion of John Darlington to the see of Dublin in the same year, the same pope used the same expression. In a third case, falling within the same year, the appointment of archbishop Wickwane to York, the form does not appear¹. The precedent thus kept alive was not followed to any alarming extent until Boniface VIII, who never omitted an opportunity of turning the shadow of a claim into the substance of a usurpation, in 1300 attempted to extend the practice to the see of York: and when Thomas Corbridge, archbishop elect, went to Rome for confirmation, the Otho to confer the appointment on the bishop of Killaloe, 'sibique facias in spiritualibus et temporalibus responderi;' Theiner, p. 37.

¹ The bulls by which Kilwardby, the successor of Boniface, was nominated are not forthcoming. The bull for Peckham, dated Jan. 28, 1279, has 'administrationem ejusdem ecclesie tibi spiritualiter et temporaliter plenarie committentes;' Sbaralea, Bullar. Franciscanum, iii. 298, 375. That for Darlington, Feb. 8, 1279, has exactly the same words; Theiner, p. 119. That for Wickwane, Sept. 19, 1279, omits them and requests the king to confer the regalia; Prynn, iii. 225. In the appointment to S. Andrews in 1280 and in the confirmation of the next election to Dublin in 1285 the pious hope only is expressed; Theiner, pp. 124, 132; and generally a wish for the prosperity of the church in both departments is all that is expressed until the pontificate of Boniface VIII. In 1292 Boniface uses the direct form in the provision of the bishops of Ross, Theiner, p. 157; of Caithness and Brechin, pp. 161, 164; of S. Andrews, p. 165; and Moray, p. 166. The next instance is that of the archbishop elect of Dublin, Richard Ferringes, July 1, 1299, where the words used are 'curam et administrationem ipsius tibi in spiritualibus et temporalibus committentes;' Theiner, p. 168. They occur in the confirmation of an abbot of Evesham in 1284; Prynn, iii. 1269. In archbishop Peckham's bull they are copied from the appointment of the archbishop of Braga in Portugal, April 6, of the same year.

pope prevailed on him to resign the right conferred by election and then re-appointed him¹, solemnly committing to him both the spiritual and the temporal administration of his see. Edward I restored the temporalities, apparently without noticing the innovation; but when, a month after, the usurpation came before him on the appointment of an archbishop of Dublin, the king compelled the new-made prelate to renounce all words in the Bull that were prejudicial to the royal authority². The experiment was again tried in the cases of Orford and Gainsborough, and on the latter, who had obtained his appointment without any reference to the king, Edward's indignation fell heavily; the bishop only recovered his temporalities by a payment of 1000 marks³. The renunciation of the offensive words in the Bulls of provision afterwards became a regular ceremony on the restitution of the temporalities. The particular intention with which Boniface aggravated the papal assumption and the special causes that prompted Edward's resistance are not clear, but it is possible that the king's suspicions as to the real bent of the papal policy had been aroused by the recent proceedings in the matter of clerical taxation and the claim to the superiority of Scotland.

The bishops obliged to renounce the words in the papal bulls, prejudicial to royal authority.

384. In all the cases hitherto cited the pope either had acted as a judge, or had skilfully availed himself of opportunities which were brought before him in his capacity as judge. But from the beginning of the fourteenth century his interference in the appointment of bishops took a new form, and he assumed the patronage as well as the appellate jurisdiction. This was done by the application to the episcopate of the rights of pro-

The popes now assume the direct patronage to vacant sees.

¹ Corbridge was appointed by a bull dated March 9, 1300, containing the words 'spiritualiter et temporaliter commendantes;' Prynne, iii. 860. He received the temporalities by writ of April 30, 1300.

² The archbishop of Dublin was appointed by a bull of July 1, 1299, and received his temporalities by writ of June 1, 1300. He was thus appointed before Corbridge, but received his see after him. The words in his bull have been given in the note, p. 318. His renunciation of the objectionable words is in Prynne, iii. 865. The king restores the temporalities 'de gratia nostra speciali;' Prynne, iii. 865, 866. See similar protests under Edward I; ibid. 1132.

³ Thomas, Survey of Worcester, App. p. 85.

Growth of the system of provisions.

vision¹ and reservation which had been exercised long before in the case of lower preferments. The first direct attack on patronage had been made in 1226, when the papal envoy Otho was sent to England to demand two prebends in each cathedral church for the use of the pope². Some few Italians were already beneficed in England, but these, probably in all cases, owed their promotion either to the king or to the bishops, who thus repaid the services of their agents at Rome, or gratified the popes by liberality to their relations. Otho's request was refused by the church, but in 1231 Gregory IX issued orders to the English bishops to abstain from presenting to livings until provision had been made for five Romans unnamed³. The barons forbade the bishops to comply, and prohibited the farmers of livings in the hands of foreigners from sending the revenue out of the country. Notwithstanding their attitude of defiance, Gregory in 1239 attempted to extend the usurpation to livings in private patronage⁴, and, when this was defeated, he directed in 1240 the bishops of Lincoln and Salisbury to provide for not less than three hundred foreign ecclesiastics⁵. This claim was one of the burdens that broke down the spirit of archbishop Edmund and drove him into exile. Innocent IV continued the practice which Gregory had begun, notwithstanding annual remonstrances from the bishops and an appeal to a general council. From time to time he promised to abstain, or by some illusory undertaking appeased the jealousy of the

¹ 'Providere ecclesiae de episcopo,' 'Providere ad ecclesiam de persona,' to provide for the church by appointing such and such a person, simply implies the act of promotion, but most frequently involves the superseding of the rights of all other patrons except the pope. The papal right of collation or provision is exercised, according to the canonists, in three ways: (1) 'Jure praeventionis,' which includes reservations and expectatives; (2) 'Jure concursus;' and (3) 'Jure devolutionis,' where the chapter has neglected to choose, or has chosen an unfit person, or has chosen uncanonically, in which case the appointment lapsed to the pope; Sext. Decr. lib. i. tit. 6. c. 18.

² Above, vol. ii. p. 38.

³ M. Paris, iii. 208. On the growth of this form of usurpation in the Western Church generally see Gieseler, Eccles. Hist. (ed. Hull), vol. iii. p. 173; vol. iv. p. 79. England seems to have been the great harvest-field of imposition.

⁴ M. Paris, iii. 610.

⁵ M. Paris, iv. 32.

king¹; but, by the use of the infamous non obstante clause, managed to evade the performance of his word. In 1253, however, he recognised in the fullest way the rights of patrons, and undertook to abstain from all usurped provisions². The same year Henry III made a similar promise on his part to abstain from interference in elections³; a promise which in 1256 was enforced by the parliament which rehearsed and confirmed the Charter of John⁴. In 1258 freedom of election was one of the articles demanded by the barons in the Mad Parliament. Notwithstanding this legislation, however, the claim of the pope was enforced during the whole reign of Edward I⁵; and it was not until his last year, 1307, that the laity, in the parliament of Carlisle, forced the question upon the king's attention. Edward had perhaps connived at some amount of usurpation in this particular point, in order to secure objects which were for the time of more importance; the appointment to benefices was but one of many ways of papal exaction; the king was in 1307 on friendly terms with the pope, and wished to avoid another rupture such as had happened in 1297. Nothing more was done at the time⁶. The weakness of Edward II⁷ and the Interference with elections renounced in 1253; but continued notwithstanding.

The power strengthened by compromise.

Provision extended to bishoprics.

¹ See especially in 1246 and 1247; M. Paris, ed. Luard, iv. 550, 598.

² M. Paris, ed. Wats, Additum. pp. 184-186; Foed. i. 175; Ann. Burton, pp. 284, 314-317.

³ M. Paris, ed. Luard, v. 373, 374.

⁴ Ib. v. 541, 542.

⁵ The countless instances given by Prynne, in the third volume of his Records, defy even an attempt at classification here.

⁶ Rot. Parl. i. 222; Prynne, Records, iii. 1168 sq.; above, vol. ii. p. 162.

⁷ In 1307 the pope committed the temporalities as well as the spiritualities of Armagh to Walter Jorz; Foed. ii. 3. Edward compelled him to renounce the obnoxious words; ib. p. 7. Several similar attempts to repel aggression were made in the following years; ib. 77, 96: John de Leek, archbishop of Dublin in 1311, has to renounce the words; ib. p. 140: the pope repeats them the same year in the provision to Armagh; p. 149: similar cases are found, ib. pp. 185, 197. In 1307, when Worcester was vacant and archbishop Winchelsey was abroad, Edward, who had obtained the election of Reynolds to that see, wrote to the pope to pray him to confirm it, because he did not wish the matter to come before the papal administrator of the spiritualities of Canterbury; Foed. ii. 15: and the same year he asked the same favour for bishop Stapleton of Exeter against whose election an appeal was made; ib. p. 19. Early in 1308 he heard that the pope had reserved the provision to Worcester, and protested against it; p. 29. The pope appointed Reynolds, using the words prejudicial to royal authority; Thomas, Worcester, App. p. 99.

exigencies of the papacy emboldened Clement V and his successors to apply to the episcopal sees the system of provision and reservation¹.

Clement V reserves the appointment to Canterbury.

Papal appointments by reservation and provision, under Edward II and Edward III.

In 1313, on the death of archbishop Winchelsea, the monks of Canterbury elected the learned Thomas Cobham as his successor, although Edward had begged them to choose his tutor, Walter Reynolds, bishop of Worcester. Winchelsea had died on the 11th of May; on the 23rd of June the prior heard a rumour that the pope had reserved the appointment for his own nomination, and on the 7th of July letters were produced, bearing date April 27², in which Clement expressed this intention. The prior thinking, as he said, that nothing was impossible with God, entreated the pope to nominate Cobham; but on the 1st of October he appointed Reynolds by virtue of the reservation³, and immediately filled up the see of Worcester which Reynolds vacated. Clement died in 1314, and the papacy was vacant for two years, during which the English bishops were appointed by compromise between the crown and the chapters. But John XXII, who was elected in 1316, immediately followed in the steps of Clement. In 1317 he reserved the appointments to Worcester, Hereford, Durham, and Rochester⁴; in 1320 to Lincoln and Winchester⁵; in 1322 to Lich-

¹ The form of a provision after reservation declared that during the life of the last incumbent the pope had reserved the appointment for his own bestowal, thereby making void any attempt to fill it up; but that, on the occurrence of the vacancy, being anxious that there should be no delay, he had specially applied himself to find a fit person; he therefore preferred the person named, who in many cases was the elect of the chapter or the royal nominee. E. g. in 1313: 'dudum siquidem bonae memoriae Roberto archiepiscopo Cantuariensi regimini Cantuariensis ecclesiae praesidente, nos cupientes eidem ecclesiae, cum eam pastore vacare contingeret, personam utilem per apostolicæ sedis providentiam praesidere, provisionem faciendam ipsi ecclesiae de praelato, quam cito eam per ejusdem archiepiscopi obitum vel alio legitimo modo vacare contingeret, dispositioni nostræ ac sedis ejusdem ea vice duximus reservandam, decernentes extunc irritum et inane si secus super hoc a quoquam quavis auctoritate, scienter vel ignoranter contingeret attemptari;' Foed. ii. 228. There are a great many such bulls in the Foedera.

² Wilk. Conc. ii. 424.

³ Foed. ii. 228. The Bull contained the offensive words which the new archbishop had formally to renounce; ib. p. 237; see also the case of Durham, p. 328.

⁴ Foed. ii. 313, 319, 328; Ang. Sac. i. 357, 533.

⁵ Foed. iii. 422, 425. The provision to Lincoln does not mention the field¹; in 1323 to Winchester²; in 1325 to Carlisle and Norwich³; in 1327 to Worcester, Exeter, and Hereford⁴; in 1329 to Bath⁵; in 1333 to Durham⁶; in 1334 to Canterbury, Winchester, and Worcester⁷. In many of these cases the king played into the pope's hands, or the pope appointed the person recommended by the king. Haymo Heath, who was elected to Rochester in 1317, found arrayed against him as competitor the queen's confessor, who produced letters of recommendation from the queen and the king and three queens of France; he also had a papal reservation, but his death in 1319 left Haymo in quiet possession of his see. In 1327 bishop Berkeley of Exeter⁸, and in 1329 Ralph de Salopia¹⁰, bishop of Bath, obtained their sees in spite of reservations. But cases were very rare in which any voice in the appointment was allowed to the chapters. In 1328 the pope, in a letter to archbishop Mepeham, expressed his general intention of reserving all appointments caused by translation¹¹. All sees vacated by bishops who died at the papal court were also regarded as temporalities; but the bishop was kept out of them by Hugh le Despenser; ib. p. 697.

Occasional defeat of the papal candidate.

¹ Foed. iii. 495; Ang. Sac. i. 443.

² Foed. iii. 525: the temporalities are mentioned in the Bull; bishop Stratford had to give security for 10,000 marks before he recovered them; ib. p. 687.

³ Ann. Lanerc. A.D. 1325; Ang. Sac. i. 413. Bishop Ayermin of Norwich was kept out of his temporalities by Hugh le Despenser in consequence.

⁴ Foed. iii. 715, 723, 726. The provision to Exeter was justified by the death of the last bishop at the papal court; Oliver, Bishops of Exeter, p. 76; that to Hereford by the translation of Orlton.

⁵ This provision was defeated, and the person elected obtained the see; Ang. Sac. i. 568.

⁶ See below, p. 324.

⁷ Stratford of Winchester was promoted to Canterbury; Orlton from Worcester to Winchester, and Simon Montacute to Worcester; the provision to Canterbury was done thus: the monks elected Stratford and the king approved; the pope 'dissembled,' or pretended that he had not heard of the election and appointed the same person. See Thomas, Worc., App. p. 109.

⁸ Ang. Sac. i. 357, sq.

⁹ Oliver, Bishops of Exeter, p. 73.

¹⁰ Ang. Sac. i. 568. The reservation did not make void what had been done towards an election before it, only what was done knowingly or in ignorance after the reservation itself was made. See Sext. Decr. lib. i. tit. 6. c. 45.

¹¹ Wilk. Conc. ii. 546.

under the ancient and customary patronage of the apostolic see¹. Mepeham himself fell a victim to the pope's policy, for he died of mortification at being repelled in his metropolitical visitation by Grandison, bishop of Exeter, who announced that the pope had exempted him from any such jurisdiction.

Collusion of the king
with the pope.

385. Edward III, during the early years of his reign, contentedly acquiesced in the pope's assumptions, and up to the year 1350 the right of provision was exercised without check. The king occasionally remonstrated², but the effect of the remonstrance was weakened by his constant petitions for the promotion of some friend of his own. It was on an occasion of this kind, the petition made for Thomas Hatfield of Durham, in 1345, following a strong remonstrance presented in 1343, that Clement VI made the famous remark—'If the king of England were to petition for an ass to be made bishop, we must not say him nay³.' Archbishop Stratford was a papal nominee, and his first act was to set aside Robert Graystones the elect of Durham, who had not only been regularly chosen and confirmed, but consecrated also: the king had petitioned and the pope had reserved in favour of the more famous Richard de Bury⁴.

Cases of Hatfield and Bury.

Statute of Provisors.

By the Statute of Provisors, in 1351⁵, it was enacted that all persons receiving papal provisions should be liable to imprisonment, and that all the preferments to which the pope nominated should be forfeit for that turn to the king. But even this bold measure, in which the good sense of the parliament condemned the proceedings of the pope, was turned by royal manipulation to the advantage of the crown alone. A system was devised which saved the dignity of all parties. When a see became vacant, the king sent to the chapter his

Practical
compromise,

¹ Sext. Decr. lib. iii. tit. iv. c. 2; Extrav. Comm. lib. i. tit. 3. c. 4; lib. iii. tit. 2. cc. 1, 13. E.g. in 1307, 'pro eo quod nos olim ante vacationem hujusmodi circa primordia nostrae promotionis ad summi apostolatus officium, provisiones omnium ecclesiarum tam archiepiscopatum quam aliarum cathedralium quas apud dictam (sc. apostolicam) sedem vacare contingeret dispositioni nostrae ac dictae sedis duximus reservandas;' Theiner, p. 176; cf. p. 183.

² For example in 1343; Wals. i. 254-258.

³ Walsingham, i. 255 sq.; Ypod. Neust. p. 284.

⁴ Hist. Dunelm. Scriptores, pp. 120, 121.

⁵ 25 Edw. III. Stat. iv; Statutes, i. 316.

licence to elect, accompanied or followed by a letter nominating the person whom he would accept if elected. He also, by letter to the pope, requested that the same person might be appointed by papal provision. With equal complaisance the chapters elected and the popes provided. The pope retained, however, the nomination to sees vacant by translation, which vacancies he took care to multiply. This arrangement was very displeasing to the country, for the question of patronage, in other cases besides bishoprics, was becoming complicated to an extreme degree: the king presented to livings which were not vacant, and displaced incumbents by his writ of *quare impedit*¹; the pope's right of reservation affected the tenure of every benefice in the country. At length, after long debates by way of letter, in 1374 a congress was held at Bruges for determining the general question; in 1375 Gregory XI annulled the appointments which he and his predecessor had made in opposition to the king², and in 1377 Edward was able to announce that, whilst he himself gave up certain pieces of patronage, the pope had by word of mouth undertaken to abstain from reservations and to allow free elections to bishoprics³. But this promise was as illusory as all that had gone before. The troubles of the next reign prevented England from taking advantage, as might have been expected, of the weakness of the papacy, now in a state of schism. Richard and his opponents were alike intent rather on using the papal influence for their own ends, than on securing the freedom of the church. In 1388 Urban VI, at the instance of the lords, translated Alexander Neville from York to S. Andrews, and Thomas Arundel from Ely to York. Such a breach of the law would in ordinary times have called forth a loud protest, but party evading the rights of the chapters.

Congress at Bruges.

Promise of free elections made in 1377.

Translations of political importance under Richard II.

¹ The form of this writ is thus given by Fitz Herbert, Nat. Brev. f. 32: 'Rex Vicecomiti Lincoln. salutem. Praecipe W. archiepiscopo et R. quod permittant nos praesentare idoneam personam ad ecclesiam de W. quae vacat et ad nostram spectat donationem, et unde praedictus W. archiepiscopus et R. nos injuste impediunt ut dicitur et nisi &c. summone &c. praedictum archiepiscopum et R. quod sint coram nobis &c. vel coram iustitiariis nostris de Banco, &c.' On the legal questions connected with it, see Gibson, Codex, pp. 824, 827-830.

² See above, vol. ii. p. 445.

³ See above, vol. ii. p. 445.

spirit was rampant, and none was heard. In 1390 the Statute of Provisors was re-enacted and confirmed, and in 1393 the great Statute of Praemunire secured, for the time, the observance of the Statute of Provisors¹. In 1395 the election to Exeter was made without papal interference; but in 1396 the bishops of Worcester and S. Asaph were appointed by provision²; and in 1397 Richard procured the pope's assistance in translating Arundel to S. Andrews, and in appointing Walden to Canterbury³; Boniface IX, the same year, translated bishop Bockingham from Lincoln to Lichfield against his own will, and appointed Henry Beaufort in his place⁴.

Right of election revived under Henry V, for a short time.

386. Archbishop Arundel and Henry IV managed the episcopal appointments during the later years of the great schism; and Henry V, among the other pious acts by which he earned the support of the clergy, recognised the elective rights of the chapters, the parliament also agreeing that the confirmation of the election should, during the vacancy of the apostolic see, be performed as it had been of old by the metropolitans⁵. For two or three years the whole of the long-disused process was revived and the church was free. But Martin V, when he found himself seated firmly on his throne, was not content to wield less power than his predecessors had claimed. He provided thirteen bishops in two years, and threatened to suspend Chichele's legation because he was unable to procure the repeal of the restraining statutes. An attempt of the pope however to force bishop Fleming into the see of York was signally defeated⁶. The weakness and devotion of Henry VI laid him

¹ 16 Rich. II. Stat. 5; Statutes, ii. 84, 85.

² Rymer, vii. 793, 797.

³ See above, vol. ii. p. 519.

⁴ Wals. ii. 228.

⁵ Rot. Parl. iv. 71. The proceedings in the cases of Norwich, Hereford, and Salisbury in 1416 and 1417 may be found in archbishop Chichele's Register.

⁶ On the death of archbishop Bowet in 1423, the pope translated bishop Fleming of Lincoln to the vacant see; the chapter who, with the royal licence and assent had chosen bishop Morgan of Worcester, refused to receive Fleming; and after some discussion the dispute was compromised by the translation of bishop Kemp from London to York. This was agreed on by the council Jan. 14, 1426; on the 8th of April Kemp was elected to York, on the 22nd he received the temporalities, and on the 20th of July the pope consented to 'provide' him. See Ord. iii. 180; Godwin, de Praes. p. 692.

open to much aggression; during the whole of Stafford's primacy the pope filled up the sees by provision; the council nominated their candidates; at Rome the proctors of the parties contrived a compromise; whoever otherwise lost or gained, the apostolic see obtained a recognition of its claim¹. During the later years of our period the deficiency of records makes it impossible to determine whether the exercise of that claim were real or nominal; certainly the kings had no difficulty in obtaining the promotion of their creatures; a few Italian absentees were, on the other hand, allowed to hold sees in England and act as royal agents at Rome. Under Henry VII and Henry VIII the royal nominees were invariably chosen; the popes had other objects in view than the influencing of the national churches, and the end of their spiritual domination was at hand. The clergy too were unable to stand alone against royal and papal pressure, and placed themselves at the disposal of the government; the government was ready to use them, and paid for their service by promotion.

Plan followed under Henry VI.

The crown is the ultimate winner.

English church history during the middle ages furnishes happily only very few instances in which a bishop was for any penal reason removed from his see. In these few cases, for the sake of security no doubt, the papal assistance was generally invoked. William the Conqueror got rid of the native prelates, with the aid of a legation from Rome, by the act of a national council. Everhard of Montgomery, bishop of Norwich, is said to have been deposed in 1145 for cruelty; and the same year Seffrid of Chichester was removed from his see; but history has in neither case recorded the exact process². Geoffrey of S. Asaph was compelled in 1175 to resign as unwilling to reside on his see; and some of the later cases of resignation may have been the results of legal or moral pressure. The threat of deprivation, although often held out by the popes as an ultimate resource against contumacious prelates, was never carried into effect. The political troubles of the reign of Richard II involved certain changes which the popes, who were too weak to resist much pressure, brought about, as we have seen, by fictitious translations. The condemnation and removal of bishop Pecock of Chichester in 1457 did not apparently constitute a case of formal and legal deprivation; he was declared to be, in consequence of heresy, illegally possessed of his see, and the pope was requested to deprive him, but nothing very definite was done; and the whole details of his trial are even now matter of controversy. The removal therefore of a spiritual lord is not in constitutional history a point so important as the right of appointment.

Cases of deprivation.

¹ Abundant illustrations of this diplomacy will be found in the Proceedings of the Privy Council and among Beckington's Letters. In 1434 the king at the instance of the commons appointed Bouchier to Worcester, the pope provided Thomas Brouns to the same see; Rochester, which was in the archbishop's patronage, was vacant at the time; the quarrel was settled by the appointment of Brouns to Rochester; Ord. iv. 278, 281, 285.

² H. Hunt.; Ang. Sac. ii. 700; Chron. Peterb. ed. Giles, p. 920. It is probable that they were mere cases of retirement or resignation. Everhard retired to Fontenay; R. Coggesh. p. 12; Seffrid, it is said, to Glastonbury.

Additional sees.

Permanent additions to the episcopal body by the institution of new bishoprics were probably sanctioned by papal as well as national recognition, but on this point there is little evidence. The foundation of the see of Ely in 1109 was confirmed by the pope, if the extant documents are genuine; the institution of the sees of Carlisle and Whithern in 1133 took place when a brisk communication was open with Rome, and can hardly have lacked the papal sanction.

Importance of this discussion.

The great importance of this discussion must justify its length. The point at issue was not merely whether the king or the pope should rule the church through the bishops, but whether the king and nation should accept, at the pope's dictation, the nomination of so large a portion of the House of Lords as the bishops really formed. When the average number of lay lords was under forty, the presence of twenty bishops nominated by the pope, and twenty-six abbots elected under Roman influence, would have placed the decision of national policy in foreign hands. The kings had no easy part to play, to avoid quarreling with the clergy and yet to maintain a hold upon them. Nor had they to struggle with the pope alone, but with a great body of European opinion which he could bring to bear upon them. The English reformation, by itself, would have been impossible unless the unity of that European consensus had been already broken.

387. It might have been expected that the right of appointment to the twenty-six parliamentary abbacies would have been to the pope and to the king an object of not less importance than the nomination to bishoprics; and, as the process of election was much the same in the two cases, it offered the same opportunities for interference. The forms of licence to elect, the modes of election, assent, and restitution to temporalities were exactly parallel in all monasteries of royal foundation, although in such of them as were, like S. Alban's, exempt from all spiritual jurisdiction but that of the pope, the action of the archbishops was excluded, and the abbots elect sought confirmation, if not benediction also, at Rome. Neither the king however nor the pope attempted much interference in this quarter¹. The monasteries were the stronghold of papal influence, which they supported as a counterpoise to that of the diocesan bishops; the pontiffs were too wise to overstrain an authority which was so heartily supported, and they trusted the monks. The kings let them alone for other reasons: the abbots were not so influential as the bishops in public affairs, nor was the post equally desirable as a reward for public service; with a very few exceptions the abbacies were much poorer than the bishoprics, and involved a much more steady attention to local duties, which would prevent attendance at court. But probably the chief cause of their immunity from royal usurpation was the certainty that any attempt to infringe their liberties would have armed against the aggressors the whole of the monastic orders, with their widespread foreign organisation and overwhelming influence at Rome. One result of this immunity was that scarcely any abbot during the later middle ages takes any conspicuous part in English politics; the

The appointment of abbots less contested than that of bishops.

Danger of touching the privileges of the convents.

¹ There are some few instances; for example, Edmund Bromfield obtained a provision to the abbey of S. Edmund's in 1379 contrary to the Statute of Provisors; Cont. Murim. p. 235. And in 1347 the commons petitioned against papal provisions to abbeyes and priories; Rot. Parl. ii. 171.

registers of the abbeys are no longer records of national history, but of petty law-suits; the monastic life separates itself more widely than ever from the growing life of the nation; the temporalities of the monasteries are offered to the king by the religious reformers as a ready source of revenue, by the confiscation of which no one can lose; when the great shock of the Reformation comes at last, the whole system falls at one blow, and, vast as the ruin is at the time, it is forgotten before the generation that witnessed it has passed away.

The constitution of convocation little changed in the middle ages.

388. The convocations of the two provinces, as the recognised constitutional assemblies of the English clergy, have undergone, except in the removal of the monastic members at the dissolution, no change of organisation from the reign of Edward I down to the present day. The clergy moreover are still, by the praemunientes clause in the parliamentary writ of the bishops, ordered to attend by their proctors at the session of parliament. On both these points enough has been said in former chapters¹; and here it is necessary only to mention the particulars in which external pressure was applied to multiply meetings or accelerate proceedings. The clergy from the very first showed great reluctance to obey the royal summons under the praemunientes clause, and accordingly during a great part of the reigns of Edward II and Edward III, from the year 1314 to the year 1340², a separate letter was addressed to the two

¹ Vol. ii, pp. 205-208.

² In June 1311 the clergy were summoned, to the parliament in which the Ordinances were published, by the usual praemunientes clause. Under the guidance, probably, of Winchelsey, who was anxious to extend their immunities, they demurred to electing proctors, and, when in October the king called another meeting of parliament for November 18, he wrote to the two metropolitans urging them to compel the attendance of the proctors. Winchelsey took offence at the wording of this writ, and on October 24 the king issued another, in which he said that nothing offensive was intended, and that the writ should be amended in Parliament; Parl. Writs, II. i. 58; Wake, State of the Church, pp. 260, 261. In 1314, March 27, the king summoned the archbishops to meet the royal commissioners in their respective convocations to discuss an aid. The clergy immediately protested against the royal citation, and having met, recorded their protest and broke up; Parl. Writs, II. i. 123. When then on July 29 the king summoned a new parliament, he wrote special letters to the archbishops urging them to enforce attendance under the praemunientes clause; ib. p. 128. This practice was followed down to 1340. On the 1st archbishops at the calling of each parliament, urging them to compel the attendance of the clerical estate. This was ineffectual; and after the latter year the crown, having acquiesced in the rule that the clerical tenths should be granted in the provincial convocations, seems to have cared less about the attendance of representative proctors in parliament. On two or three critical occasions the clerical proctors were called on to share the responsibilities of parliament¹, but their attendance ceased to be more than formal, and probably from the beginning of the fifteenth century ceased altogether.

Failure of attempts to compel the attendance of the clergy in parliament.

With regard to the constitution of the Convocations the only question which has taken its place in political history is that of their relation to parliament: and this question affects only those sessions of convocation which were held in consequence of a request or a command issued by the king with a view to a grant of money. The organisation of the two provincial assemblies was applicable to all sorts of public business, and the archbishops seem to have encountered no opposition from the king on any occasion on which they thought it necessary to call their clergy together. The means to be taken for the extirpation of heresy, for the reform of manners, for the dealings with foreign churches and general councils, might be, and no doubt were, generally concerted in such assemblies. Archbishop Arundel and his successors held several of these councils, which are not to be distinguished from the convocations called at the king's request in any point except that they were called without any such request. As however parliaments and convocations had this much in common, that the need of pecuniary aid was the king's chief reason for summoning them, it might naturally be expected that, when a parliament was called, the convocations would at no great distance of time be summoned to supplement

Question of the relation of convocation to parliament.

The provincial councils or convocations.

Meetings of convocation correspond with but do not regularly accompany parliaments.

of December 1314 the prior and convent of Canterbury protested against the archbishop's citation under the premunition, first, 'in eo quod ad curiam secularem, puta domini regis parliamentum quod in camera ejusdem domini regis fuit inchoatum et per dies aliquos continuatum;' secondly, because the abbots and priors were not summoned; ib. p. 139; they complied however with the summons. See above, vol. ii. pp. 344, 350.

¹ See above, vol. ii. pp. 364, 519.

its liberality with a clerical gift. We have seen how regularly this function was discharged during the fifteenth century, and how the clerical grant followed in due proportion the grant of the laity. But although in nearly every case there is a session of convocation to match the session of parliament, the session of convocation cannot be regarded as an adjunct of parliament. Archbishop Wake, in his great controversy with Atterbury, showed from an exhaustive enumeration of instances that, even where the purpose of the two assemblies was the same, there was no such close dependence of the convocation upon the parliament as was usual after the changes introduced by Henry VIII. The king very seldom even suggests the day for the meeting of convocation; its sessions and adjournments take place quite irrespective of those of the parliament; very rare attempts are made to interfere with its proceedings even when they are unauthorised by the royal writ of request; and, after the accession of the house of Lancaster, they are not interfered with at all. On the side of the papacy interference could scarcely be looked for. As a legate could exercise no jurisdiction at all without royal licence, a legatine council could not be held in opposition to the king's will; but the days of legatine councils of the whole national church seemed at all events to be over; there is no trace of any important meeting of such assembly between the days of Arundel and those of Wolsey¹; although, after the date at which both archbishops acquired the legatine character, both the provincial convocations might be invidiously represented as legatine councils.

The meetings of convocations or provincial councils little interfered with.

Varieties of ecclesiastical legislation.

389. The history of ecclesiastical legislation, so far as it enters into our present consideration, comprises three distinct topics; the legislation of the clergy for the clergy, of the clergy for the laity, and of the laity for the clergy; and, under each of these, the several attempts at interference with, and resistance to, such legislation. Under each head moreover we have to distinguish in the case of the clergy between the pope and the national church, as regards both attempts at legislation and attempts at restriction; whilst in the case of the laity we must not less carefully discriminate between the action of the crown, of the parliament, and of the common law. An exhaustive discussion of the subject, even thus limited, would be out of all proportion to the general plan, of this work, even if controversial points could be treated in it. It is however necessary to attempt to classify, under some such arrangement, the particular points of the subject which have an important bearing on our national history; and, as most of these have been noted in their chronological order in our narrative chapters, the recapitulation need not occupy much space.

¹ In 1408 the archbishop of Bourdeaux is said to have held a legatine council at London to discuss the state of the papacy; Cont. Eulog. iii. 413; but he seems to have merely been the envoy of the cardinals sent to debate the matter with the English clergy; see Wilkins, Conc. iii. 308, 311, 312.

The laws made by spiritual authority for the spirituality, by the clergy for the clergy, include, as far as mediæval history is concerned, the body of the Canon Law, published in the Decretum of Gratian and its successive supplements, such particular edicts of the popes as had a general operation, the canons of general councils, the constitutions of the legates and legatine councils, the constitutions published by the archbishops and the convocations of their provinces, which in the fifteenth century were codified by Lyndwood in the Provinciale, and those of individual bishops made in their diocesan synods. All these may be included under the general name of Canon Law; all were regarded as binding on the faithful within their sphere of operation, and, except where they came into collision with the rights of the crown, common law or statute, they were recognised as authoritative in ecclesiastical procedure.

Laws made by ecclesiastical authority for the clergy.

Canon Law.

In the general legislation of the church, the English church and nation had alike but a small share; the promulgation of the successive portions of the Decretals was a papal act, to which Christendom at large gave a silent acquiescence¹: the General legislation of the Church.

¹ See Blackstone, Comm. i. 79, 80: 'All the strength that either the papal or imperial laws have obtained in this realm or indeed in any other kingdom in Europe, is only because they have been admitted and received by immemorial usage and custom in some particular cases and some particular courts, . . . or else because they are in some other cases introduced by consent of parliament.' In the statute de Bigamis (Statutes, i. 44)

Restraint on the admission of papal bulls.

crown asserted and maintained the right to forbid the introduction of papal bulls without royal licence, both in general and in particular cases; and the English prelates had their places, and the ambassadors accredited by the king and the estates had their right to be heard, in the general councils of the church. But except in the rare case of collision with national law, the general legislation of Christendom, whether by pope or council, was accepted as a matter of course.

National church legislation
in council.

In the acts of the national church, whether legatine, provincial, or diocesan, the legislative power was exercised by the presiding prelate in his own name and in that of his brethren; the legate Otho made constitutions, 'supported by divine help and by the suffrage and consent of the present council¹;' and Othobon legislated 'with the approbation of the present council².' The archbishops, who issued constitutions after the organisation of the provincial convocations was perfected, acted with the advice and consent of their brethren the bishops and the clergy of their provinces. The province of York by its convocation accepted the provincial code of the province of Canterbury³. The diocesan regulations made by particular bishops were either mere repetitions of general enactments, or rules of the nature of local ordinances, and require no notice here.

Diocesan enactments.

Royal right of restrain-ing legislation.

The calling of the assemblies in which such legislation could be transacted was, as a matter of fact, subject to royal permission or approval, and the right of the king to forbid such a council or to limit its legislative powers was during the Norman reigns both claimed and admitted. William the Conqueror did not allow the archbishop in a general council of the bishops to 'ordain or forbid anything that was not agreeable to his royal will, or had not been previously ordained by him⁴.' William Rufus prevented the holding of such an

Edward I recognises and extends the application of a constitution of the general council of Lyons.

¹ Johnson, Canons, ii. 157.

² Ib. ii. 213.

³ Blackstone, Comm. i. 83; Wilkins, Conc. iii. 663; Johnson, Canons, ii. 513.

⁴ Above, vol. i. p. 310.

assembly for thirteen years¹. Henry I acted on his father's principle, and added his royal confirmation to the ecclesiastical legislation which he approved². Stephen struggled in vain against the claims of the clergy to independent power of legislation, and retorted by measures of oppression; but Henry II contented himself with aiding the conciliar legislation, which he knew himself to be strong enough by fair means to control.

Royal confirmation.

Hubert Walter held a 'general' council in spite of a prohibition of Geoffrey FitzPeter³; but he was himself chancellor at the time, and the protest of the justiciar may have been only formal.

Prohibition by the justiciar.

As a rule the later sovereigns, instead of restricting the liberty of meeting, contented themselves with warning the clergy not to infringe the royal rights. In 1207 for instance John warned the council of S. Alban's not to do anything contrary to the customs of the realm, and to defer their deliberations until they had conferred with him⁴. In 1281 again Edward I in the strongest language forbade the archbishops and bishops, as they loved their baronies, to discuss any questions touching the crown, the king's person or council, or to make any constitution against his crown and dignity⁵. But these and similar prohibitions were simply cautionary; so long as the councils confined their deliberations to matters of spiritual or ecclesiastical interest the kings either actively assisted or quietly acquiesced in the freedom of deliberation and legislation; nor in later times were the parliaments more than duly jealous or watchful in this respect, so long as the legislation was such as would bind the clergy alone, or the laity only in foro conscientiae.

Warnings addressed by the king to councils.

390. Any attempts made by the spirituality in council and

¹ Anselm, Epp. iii. 40.

² 'Sciatis quod auctoritate regia et potestate concedo et confirmo statuta concilii, a Willelmo Cantuariensi archiepiscopo et sanctae Romanae ecclesiae legato apud Westmonasterium celebrati, et interdicta interdico. Si quis vero horum decretorum violator vel contemptor extiterit, si ecclesiasticae disciplinae humiliter non satisfecerit, noverit se regia potestate graviter coercendum, quia divinae dispositioni resistere praesumpsit;' Foed. i. 8.

³ Hoveden, iv. 128; R. Diceto, ii. 169. This was an attempt made by Hubert as primate to convene the whole of the English clergy.

⁴ Rot. Pat. i. 72; Foed. i. 94; a similar warning of 18 Hen. III is cited by Coke upon Littleton, s. 137; and other instances 4 Inst. pp. 322, 323.

⁵ Wilkins, Conc. ii. 50; see above, vol. ii. pp. 115, 116.

Instances of legislation
by the clergy for the laity.

In matrimonial testamentary and tithe questions.

Illustrations.

Judicial interference more common than legislative assumption.

convocation, or by the pope and his legates, to bind the laity by legislative enactment, must be looked for in those regions of ecclesiastical jurisprudence where the state had placed in the hands of the church, or the church had acquired by prescription, an ill-defined amount of judicial authority; or in other words, in those departments of judicature in which, according to the charter of William the Conqueror, the ministers of the common law undertook to compel the execution of ecclesiastical sentences. The most important of these departments during the early middle ages were the jurisdiction by which matrimonial suits were regulated, by which testamentary causes were decided, and by which the payment of tithes and ecclesiastical fees was enforced; from the beginning of the fifteenth century the jurisdiction in cases of heresy was another field for co-operation between the two powers, and there were besides such cases of slander, usury, and other minor offences, as could be tried in the spiritual courts. In each of these points, the baronage first, and the parliament afterwards, showed some jealousy of ecclesiastical legislation; the barons at the council of Merton, in 1236, rejected the proposition, to which the prelates had agreed, that illegitimate children are made legitimate by the subsequent marriage of their parents; the excessive charges made on the probate of wills are a frequent subject of complaint in parliament; and the constitution framed by archbishop Stratford in 1343 against those who refused to pay tithe of underwood called forth a petition from the commons, in 1344, that no petition made by the clergy to the injury of the laity might be granted without examination before the king and the lords¹. Almost all the examples however, in which the clergy went beyond their recognised rights in regulating the conduct of the laity, come under the head of judicial rather than of legislative action; in that department the common law had its own safeguards, and could ignore and quash proceedings founded on any canonical enactment that ran counter to it. Petitions in parliament against the encroachments of spiritual courts were frequent, any direct conflict between the two legislatures is extremely rare. In the normal state of English politics the prelates, who were the real legislators in convocation and also formed the majority in the house of lords, acted in close alliance with the crown, and, under any circumstances, would be strong enough to prevent any awkward collision; if their class-sympathies were with the clergy, their great temporal estates and offices gave them many points of interest in common with the laity. Thus, although, as the judicial history shows, the lines between spiritual and temporal judicature were very indistinctly drawn, England was spared during the greatest part of the middle ages any war of theories on the relations of the church to the state. Even when the great question of heresy arose, few disputes of importance found a hearing in parliament; and, if contemporary history testifies to some amount of popular disaffection caused by ecclesiastical laws, the records of parliament show that such disaffection found little sympathy in the great council of the nation. All attempts of the popes or general councils to legislate in matters affecting the laity were limited in their application, on the one hand by the common law, and on the other hand by the statute of praemunire. The subject of heresy may be reserved for a separate section.

¹ See above, vol. ii. p. 415, and § 293.

The position of the bishops prevented any difficulty between ecclesiastical and civil legislation.

391. The enactments made by the king in parliament to regulate, restrict, or promote the action of the spirituality are very numerous, as might indeed be expected from the general tenour of a history in which the clerical estate played so great a part. Under this head it would be possible to range nearly everything that has here been classified under all the other departments of administration. Most points of importance, however, occur in the history of taxation and judicature, and these will be noticed separately; as so much has been said on the topic in the earlier chapters of this work, a very brief recapitulation will be sufficient. The claim of William the Conqueror and his sons to determine, by their recognition, to which of the competitors for the papacy the obedience of the English Church was due may stand first in the series of these acts. In 1378 the English parliament following the same idea

Legislation in parliament touching the clergy.

The king's claim to recognise the lawful pope.

Restriction of papal assumptions.

declared Urban VI to be the true pope, in opposition to the antipope supported by France and Scotland. But such measures are in fact political rather than legislative, and in their very nature exceptional. The most prominent place belongs to the statutes by which the papal usurpations or aggressions were met under the successors of Henry III, especially the legislation exemplified in the statutes of provisors and praemunire.

Legislation on Provisors,

392. The great statute of provisors, passed in 1351, was a very solemn expression of the national determination not to give way to the pope's usurpation of patronage. It was the result of a series of efforts to throw off the yoke imposed in the thirteenth century by the successive encroachments on the free election to bishoprics, the history of which has been already traced. These efforts had begun under the influence of the school of Grosseteste, who, however much he may have been inclined to aid the pope in other ways, was determinedly opposed to the appointment of foreigners, ignorant of the English language or non-resident altogether, to the care of English churches. The papal provisions were not only usurpations of patronage, and infringements of canonical liberty, but the occasion of the loss of Christian souls. Yet, in spite of the dislike with which they were viewed, petition, remonstrance, and even legislation seemed powerless against them. The clergy were afraid of the pope, the king found it convenient to use the power which connivance with the pope gave him in the promotion of his servants; and, to the baronage and the commons alike, the withdrawal of money from the realm by the aliens whom the pope provided was a point of at least as much importance as the spiritual loss of the church. Not to recur to the constant presentments of gravamina which furnished employment to the councils and parliaments of the thirteenth century, it will be enough to point to the legislation attempted in the parliament of Carlisle in 1307. The petition of the earls, barons, and commonalty of the land presented to the king in that parliament, the words of which were afterwards rehearsed in the statute of provisors, states that the church in this realm was founded by the king and his ancestors, and by the earls

Growth of opposition to the system,

Attempted legislation
of 1307.

Petition of the parliament of Carlisle.

and barons and their ancestors, that they and their people might learn the faith, and provision might be made for prayer, alms, and hospitality; the recent action of the pope had tended to throw the great estates devoted to these purposes into the hands of aliens. The articles enumerated in the petition touch several other points of aggression, a claim recently made to the goods of intestates and to property not distinctly bequeathed by testators, the attempt to tax the temporalities of the clergy, the demand of firstfruits and of an increased contribution of Peter's pence¹. The immediate result of the petition was the publication of a statute, which had been passed by the lay estates in 1305, forbidding the religious houses to send money abroad, a prohibition addressed to William de Testa, the papal agent, forbidding him to proceed under the instructions committed to him, a letter of remonstrance to the pope, and orders, which were afterwards partially suspended, that the sheriffs should arrest the officers employed as papal collectors. Edward, whose death was known to be very near, was in no condition to dispute with the legate, Peter of Spain, and before a concordat could be arranged he died². The struggle continued languidly under Edward II; he himself and the representatives of his father's policy were still inclined to resistance; but the opposition, headed by the earl of Lancaster, and supported to some extent by French and clerical influence, avoided offending the pope; and, although aggressions were multiplied and preventive measures and remonstrances were now and then tried³, no legislation was attempted until Edward III had been for some years on the throne. In 1343 the king was desired to write to the pope against the promotion of aliens, and to attempt some such legislation as has been contemplated in the parliament of

Parliament of Carlisle.

Failure of the attempt at legislation.

State of affairs under Edward II.

Remonstrances by Edward III.

¹ Rot. Parl. i. 219-223; Statutes, i. 150.

² See above, vol. ii. pp. 162, 163.

³ Letters forbidding the introduction of papal bulls without licence were issued by Edward II in 1307; Foed. ii. 13: by Edward III in 1327; ib. p. 726: and in 1376; Wilk. Conc. iii. 107. In 1376 William Courtenay, then bishop of London, published a papal bull against the Florentines, for which he was brought before both the king and chancellor and forced to retract the publication, which he did by proxy at St. Paul's Cross; Cont. Eulog. iii. 335.

Ordinances
of 1343.

Carlisle. After a search for the records of that parliament, an ordinance was prepared and passed with the assent of the baronage and commons, which forbade the introduction and reception into the realm and the execution of papal bulls, reservations and other letters, and ordered the arrest of all persons contravening the order¹. This ordinance was not however enrolled as a statute; and, although in the next parliament a petition of the commons for the perpetual affirmation of the act received the assent of the king and baronage², three years later the law was unexecuted; the king had written to the pope, but no remedy had been devised. The remonstrance was repeated with no better result³. At last, in the parliament of 1351, the enactment was elaborately amended and framed into a perpetual statute⁴. By this act it was ordered that elections to elective benefices and dignities should be free, and that patrons should have their rights; that if the pope should reserve an elective promotion the king should have the collation, and if he should usurp a presentation on advowson the king should present for that turn: all persons procuring or accepting papal promotions were to be arrested and on conviction fined and bound over to satisfy the party whose rights had been infringed. The assent of the lords spiritual was not formally given to this statute, and, important as it is, it seems to have been from the first evaded.

Statute of 1351.

The lords spiritual withhold consent.

In 1352 the purchasers of papal provisions were declared outlaws; in 1365, another act repeated the prohibitions and penalties⁵; and in 1390 the parliament of Richard II rehearsed and confirmed the statute⁶. By this act forfeiture and banishment were decreed against future transgressors. The two archbishops entered a formal protest against it as tending to the restriction of apostolic power and the subversion of ecclesiastical liberty⁷. The parliaments however of Henry IV and Henry V recognised the validity of the legislation, and Chichele, as we

Parliamentary confirmations.

Recognition of the validity of the act.

¹ Rot. Parl. ii. 144, 145.

² Ib. ii. 153, 154.

³ Ib. ii. 172, 173.

⁴ Rot. Parl. ii. 232, 233; st. 25 Edw. III, st. 4; Statutes, i. 316 sq., 323.

⁵ 31 Edw. III, stat. 2; Statutes, i. 385; Rot. Parl. ii. 284, 285.

⁶ 13 Ric. II, st. 2. c. 2.

⁷ Rot. Parl. iii. 264.

have seen, incurred the displeasure of Martin V because he could not obtain a repeal¹. How ill the statutes were kept we have already noted.

393. The history of the statute of praemunire starts from a somewhat different point, but runs parallel for the most part with the legislation on the subject of provisions. It was intended to prevent encroachments on and usurpations of jurisdiction, as the other was framed for the defence of patronage. The ordinance of 1353, which was enrolled as a 'statute against annullers of judgments in the king's courts,' condemns to outlawry, forfeiture, and imprisonment, all persons who, having prosecuted in foreign courts suits cognisable by the law of England, should not appear in obedience to summons, and answer for their contempt². The name 'praemunire,' which marks this form of legislation, is taken from the opening word of the writ by which the sheriff is charged to summon the delinquent³. It is somewhat curious that the court of Rome is not mentioned in this first act of praemunire; as the assembly by which it was framed was not a proper parliament, it may not have been referred to the lords spiritual; their assent is not mentioned. The act however of 1365, which confirms the statute of provisors, distinctly brings the suitors in the papal courts under the provisions of the ordinance of 1353, and against this the prelates protested⁴. In spite of the similar protest in 1393, the parliament passed a still more important statute, in which the word praemunire is used to denote the process by which the law is enforced. This act, which is one of the strongest defensive measures taken during the middle ages against Rome, was called for in consequence of the conduct of the pope, who had forbidden the bishops to execute the sentences of the royal courts in suits connected with patronage. The political translations of the year 1388 were adroitly turned into an argument: the pope had translated bishops against their own will to foreign sees, and had endangered the freedom

History of the Statute of Praemunire.

Ordinance against suing in foreign courts in 1353.

Legislation of 1365.

Statute of Praemunire of 1393.

¹ Above, p. 309.

² 27 Edw. III, st. 1; Statutes, i. 329.

³ Gibson, Codex, p. 80.

⁴ Rot. Parl. ii. 285.

Statute of Praemunire.

Courtenay's protest.

Disquietude of the pope and clergy under the restraint.

of the English crown, 'which hath been so free at all times that it hath been in subjection to no earthly sovereign, but immediately subject to God and no other, in all things touching the regalie of the said crown.' The lords spiritual had admitted that such encroachments were contrary to the right of the crown, and promised to stand by the king. It was accordingly enacted that all persons procuring in the court of Rome or elsewhere such translations, processes, sentences of excommunications, bulls, instruments, or other things which touch the king, his crown, regality, or realm, should suffer the penalties of praemunire. Archbishop Courtenay's protest already referred to, whilst it admits the facts stated in the preamble, simply guards against limiting the canonical authority of the pope: the words of the protest are incorporated in the statute itself¹. Nor was the legislation exemplified in the statutes of praemunire and provisors a mere 'brutum fulmen;' although evaded by the kings,—notably by Richard himself in the translation of Arundel to S. Andrew's in 1397,—and, so far at least as the statute of provisors was concerned, suspended from time to time by consent of the parliament, it was felt by the popes to be a great check on their freedom of action; it was used by Gloucester as a weapon against Beaufort; the clergy, both under papal influence and independently, petitioned from time to time for its repeal²; and in the hands of Henry VIII it became a lever for the overthrow of papal supremacy. It furnishes in ecclesiastical history the clue of the events that connect the Constitutions of Clarendon with the Reformation; and, if in a narrative of the internal history of the constitution itself it seems to take a secondary place, it is only because the influences which it was devised to check were everywhere at work, and constant recurrence to their potent action would involve two separate readings of the history of every great crisis and every stage of growth.

¹ 16 Ric. II, c. 5; Statutes, ii. 84.

² In the convocation of 1439 especially; see Wilkins, Conc. iii. 533; and again in 1447; ib. p. 555. It is fair to say that these clerical remonstrances were called forth rather by the chicanery of the lawyers than by any affection for the papal jurisdiction; the lawyers now and then chose to treat the ordinary ecclesiastical jurisdiction as foreign, and so to bring all the courts Christian under the operation of the statute of praemunire.

394. The several legislative measures by which at various times the crown or the parliament endeavoured to regulate the proceedings of the national church may be best arranged by reference to the particular subject-matter of the acts. They are important constitutional muniments, but are not very numerous or diversified. First among them come the ordinances or statutes by which the tenure of church property was defined and its extension limited. The establishment of the obligation of homage and fealty due for the temporalities or lands of the clergy was the result of a compromise between Henry I and Anselm, and it was accordingly not so much an enactment made by the secular power against the ecclesiastical, as a concordat betwixt the two. It was not so with the mortmain act, or with the series of provisions in which the statute 'de religiosis' was prefigured, from the great charter downwards. To forbid the acquisition of lands by the clergy without the consent of the overlord of whom the lands were held was a necessary measure, and one to which a patriotic ecclesiastic like Langton would have had no objection to urge. But the spirit of the clergy had very much changed between 1215 and 1279, and the statute 'de religiosis,' which was not so much an act of parliament as a royal ordinance, was issued at a moment when there was much irritation of feeling between the king and the archbishop¹. It was an efficient limitation on the greed of acquisition, and although very temperately administered by the kings, who never withheld their licence from the endowment of any valuable new foundation, it was viewed with great dislike by the popes, who constantly urged its repeal, and by the monks whose attempts to frustrate the intention of the law, by the invention of trusts and uses, are regarded by the lawyers as an important contribution to the land-law of the middle ages. Other instances of legislation less directly affecting the lands of the church were the acts by which the estates of the Templars were transferred to the Legislative interference by the state with the national church.

Concordat of Henry and Anselm.

Restriction, on the acquisition of lands.

Statute 'de religiosis.'

Clerical disquietude under the restraint.

Church lands subject to the Common Law.

¹ Vol. ii. pp. 116, 117.

Hospitallers¹, and the many enactments from the reign of Edward III downwards, by which the estates of the alien priories were vested in the king. Beyond these, however, which are mere instances of the use of a constitutional power, it is certain that not only the parliaments but the crown and the courts of law exercised over the lands of the clergy the same power that they exercised over all other lands; they were liable to temporary confiscation in case of the misbehaviour of their owners, to taxation, and the constrained performance of the due services; and although they were not liable to legal forfeiture, as their possessors could be deprived of no greater right in them than was involved in their official tenure, they might be detained in the royal hands on one pretext or another for long periods without legal remedy. The patronage of parish churches was likewise a temporal right, and, although the ecclesiastical courts made now and then a vain claim to determine suits concerning it, it was always regarded as within the province of state legislation. The spiritual revenues of the clergy, the tithes and offerings which were the endowment of the parochial churches, were subject to a divided jurisdiction; the title to ownership was determined by the common law, the enforcement of payment was left to the ecclesiastical courts². The attempts of the parliament to tax the spiritualities were very jealously watched, and generally, if not always, defeated. The parliament, however, practically vindicated its right to determine the nature of the rights of the clergy to tithe of underwood, minerals, and other newly asserted or revived claims³. In 1362 a statute fixed the wages of stipendiary chaplains⁴.

Legal treatment of church lands.

Patronage a temporal right.

Tithes, a divided jurisdiction.

Minor points.

Restriction of ecclesiastical judicature by state legislation.

A second department in which the spirituality was subjected to the legislative interference of the state was that of judicature. In this region a continual rivalry was carried on from the Conquest to the Reformation, the courts of the two powers, like all courts of law, being prone to make attempts at usurpation, and the interference of the crown as the fountain of ¹ 17 Edw. II, st. 2; Statutes, i. 194.

² See below, p. 353.

³ Ib. p. 352.

⁴ Statutes, i. 374.

justice, or of the parliament as representing the nation at large, being constantly invoked to remedy the evils caused by mutual aggression. Of the defining results of this legislation the 'articuli cleri' of 1316, and the writ of 'circumspecte agatis,' neither of them exactly or normally statutes, are the chief landmarks. In order to avoid repetition, we may defer noticing these disputes until we come to the general question of judicature.

Outside these two regions of administration there are some few acts of the national legislature in which the interests or acts of the clergy are contemplated in a friendly and statesmanlike spirit, which rises above the quarrels of the day or of the class. Such probably were the statutes passed in 1340, 1344, and 1352¹, at the request of the clergy; most of their provisions, however, concern property or jurisdiction. The ordinance of 1416, by which it was enacted that during the vacancy of the apostolic see the bishops elect should be confirmed by their metropolitans², seems a singular instance of the parliament legislating for the clergy where they might have legislated for themselves. The petitions of the parliament for measures which might tend to close the schism are not indeed legislative acts, but may be adduced as proof that the attitude of the commons towards the church, even at moments when there was much reason for watchfulness, was neither unfriendly nor unwise. In the struggle against heresy the policy of the parliaments was not uniform, but, if the petitions against the clergy, which were ineffectually brought forward, are to be set off against the statutes against the Lollards, the result shows that in the long run the sympathies of the three estates were at one. In coming to such a conclusion, it must not be forgotten that the clergy, during nearly the whole period of the Lollard movement, had great influence with the king, were in possession of the greatest offices of state, possessed a majority of votes in the house of lords, and had an additional source of strength in the support of the pope and foreign churches. But even if all these influences are taken Miscellaneous legislation for the clergy.

Cognisance of the great schism.

Discussions on heresy.

¹ Statutes, i. 292, 302, 324.

² Above, p. 326.

into account, a united and resolute determination of the commons, such as in 1406 was brought to bear upon the king, must have made itself felt in legislation, and could not have contented itself with protest and petition.

Ecclesiastical taxation by the pope.

Papal exactions.

The papal collector.

Petitions against him.

395. In the department of finance and taxation, one of the great factors of the social problem may be briefly treated and dismissed; the pecuniary assumptions and exactions of the papacy are more important in political history than as illustrations of constitutional action. From the nation at large no imperative claim for money was made by the popes after the reign of Henry III, except in 1306, when William de Testa was empowered by Clement V to exact a penny from every household as Peter's pence, instead of accepting the prescriptive traditional composition of £201 9s. for the whole kingdom¹: the tribute promised by John was stopped in the year 1366 by the resolution of parliament². Voluntary payments for bulls and dispensations do not come within the scope of our present inquiries. The burden of papal exaction had, even in the thirteenth century, fallen chiefly on the clergy, and from the beginning of the fourteenth it fell wholly upon them. Contributions from the nation at large for papal purposes, such as crusades and the defence against the Turks, were collected by the pope's agents in the form of voluntary gifts. The pope had a regular official collector who gathered the offerings of the laity as well as the sums imperatively demanded from the clergy, and who was jealously watched by both. A series of petitions against the proceedings of this most unpopular official was presented in the parliament of 1376³. He was regarded as a mere spy, sent to live in London and to hunt up vacancies and other opportunities for papal claims; he kept up the state of a duke; he had begun to take firstfruits, and sent out of the country annually 20,000 marks. In 1377 the commons petitioned that the collector might be an Englishman¹. In 1390 the king had to reject a petition that the collector might be banished as a public enemy. The oath which he was made to take was stringent enough; he swore fealty to the king; that he would not do or procure anything prejudicial to the king, the realm, or the laws; would give the king good advice, and would not betray his secrets; would suffer the execution of no papal mandates hurtful to the kingdom; would receive no such mandates without laying them before the council; would export no money or plate without leave from the king, nor send any letters out of the kingdom contrary to the king's interests; that he would maintain the king's estate and honour; that he would not collect firstfruits from benefices in the king's gift, nor from those given by the popes by way of expectative; that he would attempt no novelties, and would not leave the kingdom without permission². In 1427 the pope's collector having introduced bulls of provisions contrary to the statute, was imprisoned, and only released on bail after a brisk discussion in the privy council³; and there are many indications that the fulfilment of the oath was generally enforced.

¹ Rot. Parl. i. 220. Innocent III in 1213 complained that the English bishops paid only 300 marks for Peter's pence, retaining 1000 for themselves; Foed. i. 118.

² Vol. ii. p. 435.

³ It was no doubt in consequence of these representations, that the collector's oath was framed; Rot. Parl. ii. 338-340.

Oath administered to him.

Enforcement of the oath.

On the clergy the hand of the papacy was very heavily laid in the exaction of compulsory contributions. These belong chiefly to the reign of Henry III. His grandfather in 1184 had, by the advice of the national council, refused to allow the visit of a legate to collect an aid for the recovery of S. Peter's patrimony. The surrender of John and the piety of Henry laid the king open to the greatest exactions, the history of which has been traced in former chapters. The exactions of tenths of ecclesiastical revenue, which were so common under Henry III, were not indeed collected without the consent of the payers, given in provincial synod; but the consent was really compulsory⁴; the king was in alliance with the pope, and even Grosseteste admitted that the papal needs were great Papal exactions from the clergy.

¹ Rot. Parl. ii. 373.

² Rymer, vii. 603; Prynne, on the Fourth Institute, p. 146.

³ Ordinances, iii. 268.

⁴ See Ann. Burton, pp. 356, 360; and a list of papal exactions, ib. pp. 364 sq.

Restrictions and evasions.

Firstfruits of promotions.

and must be satisfied. Edward I and Edward II had been obliged alike to allow these heavy exactions¹, and had in some instances shared with the popes the profits of transactions which they did not venture to contravene. But after the settlement of the papacy at Avignon the pressure was very much lessened; other modes of raising money were devised. Richard II, in 1389, ventured to forbid the collection of a papal subsidy²; when in 1427 the pope demanded a tenth for the crusade against the Hussites, the council and convocation contrived to pass the proposition by without direct refusal³; a similar course was followed in 1446, when the pope demanded a like subsidy⁴. But the other forms of exactions were endured at least with resignation. The right to the firstfruits of bishoprics and other promotions was apparently first claimed in England by Alexander IV in 1256, for five years⁵; the claim was renewed by Clement V in 1306, to last for two years⁶; and it was in a measure successful. John XXII demanded firstfruits throughout Christendom for three years, and met with universal resistance⁷. The general and perpetual claim seems to have followed upon the general admission of the pope's right of provision and the multiplication of translations, the gift being at first a voluntary offering of the newly-promoted prelates. Stoutly contested as it was in the council of Constance⁸, and frequently made the subject of debate in parliament and council⁹, the demand must have been regularly complied with;

¹ See the instances recorded above; vol. ii. pp. 108, 117, 124, 129, 339, 361, 395.

² Wilk. Conc. iii. 20; Rymer, vii. 645; Rot. Parl. iii. 405: instances of papal petitions for subsidy are not unfrequent; see Wilk. Conc. iii. 13, 48.

³ Wilk. Conc. iii. 514.

⁴ Wilk. Conc. iii. 541-552.

⁵ Ann. Burton, p. 390.

⁶ Rot. Parl. i. 221: the claim is there spoken of as unheard of. Edward allowed it to be enforced; p. 222. In the parliament of 1376 it is said to be a new usurpation; ib. ii. 339. On the general history of Annates see Gieseler (Eng. ed.), vol. iv. pp. 86, 102-108.

⁷ Gieseler, Eccl. Hist. vol. ii. p. 86; see also Extrav. Comm. lib. iii. tit. 2. c. 11.

⁸ Gieseler, Eccl. Hist. vol. iii. p. 102.

⁹ The act 6 Hen. IV, c. 1, declares that double and treble the amount formerly paid under this name was then exacted, and restricts it to the ancient customary sums.

in the petition of convocation in 1531 on the abolition of annates, it is stated that the firstfruits of the temporalities of bishoprics, as well as of the spiritualities, were paid, and the act which bestowed these annates on the king mentions the sum of £160,000 as having been paid on this account to the pope between 1486 and 1531¹.

396. The history of the steps by which ecclesiastical property was made to contribute its share towards the national income, and of the methods by which the process of taxation was conducted, has been traced in our earlier chapters up to the time at which right of the provincial convocations to self-taxation became so strongly established that the king saw no use in contesting it. This right was a survival of the more ancient methods by which the contributions of individuals, communities, and orders or estates, were requested by separate commissions or in separate assemblies. It was in full exercise from the early years of Edward I, and accordingly was strong enough in prescriptive force to resist his attempts to incorporate the clergy as an estate of parliament by the prae-munientes clause. Although in some of the parliaments of the earlier half of the fourteenth century the report of the clerical vote was brought up in parliament by the clerical proctors, and the grants may have been in some cases made by the parliamentary assembly of the clergy², the regular and permanent practice was, that they should be made by the two convocations. In 1318 the parliamentary estate of the clergy refused the king money without a grant of the convocations; in 1322 the parliamentary proctors made a grant, but the archbishops had to call together the convocations to legalise it. In 1336 the representatives of the spirituality granted a tenth in parliament, but this seems to have been an exception to the rule³, for in 1344 they merely announced the grant which the provincial convocations had made. In fact, from the period at which the records of the convocations begin the grants were so made, and

Taxation of
the clergy for national purposes.

Self-taxation of the clergy.

¹ 23 Hen. VIII, c. 20; Statutes, iii. 386.

² See vol. ii. pp. 355, 361, 370, 399; and especially p. 414; the clerical grants are generally mentioned in the notes.

³ See vol. ii. p. 398.

Process of taxing the clergy.

Clerical tenths.

Amount of a clerical tenth.

The old valuations.

the function of the parliamentary proctors was chiefly to negotiate between parliament and convocation, rather to announce than to make the grants. With the convocations the kings very prudently abstained from direct interference. When money was wanted the king requested the archbishops to collect their clergy and ask for a grant; the archbishops, through their provincial deans, summoned their provincial synods, as they might do for any other purpose, and the clergy assembled without the pressure of a royal writ or such direct summons as would derogate from their spiritual independence. When they met, the king, either through the archbishop or through special commissioners, acquainted them with his necessities, and the votes were made either conditionally on the granting of petitions, or unconditionally, in much the same way as they were made in parliament. The clerical vote usually took the form of a tenth or a portion of a tenth, or a number of tenths, of all ecclesiastical property, assessed on the valuation of pope Nicolas in 1291; the parochial clergy shared with the towns the burden of a heavier rate of taxation than the counties and the baronial lands, which paid a fifteenth; the latter were of course subject to feudal services from which the former were exempt. The produce of an ecclesiastical tenth seems to have been a diminishing quantity, owing probably to the multiplication of exemptions, especially the exemption of livings under ten marks value; under the full valuation of 1291 it ought to have amounted to £20,000¹; we learn, however, from a letter addressed by Henry VII to the bishop of Chichester, that in his reign the tenth of the southern province was estimated at no more than £10,000. The lay tenth and fifteenth had at the same time sunk to £30,000². The history of the two forms of grant is the same; as the spiritual tenth was levied on the assessment of 1291, the lay tenth and fifteenth was paid

¹ See above, vol. ii. § 282.

² In 1497 the convocation of Canterbury granted £40,000 to the king, payable in two moieties. Henry excuses the payment of £10,000, 'which is as we understand to the value of one hole disme.' The laity had granted a tenth and fifteenth amounting to £30,000. The king's debts were £58,000; W. Stephens, Memorials of Chichester, pp. 178, 179.

according to an assessment of 1334¹, the counties and their subdivisions being expected to account for the sums which they had furnished in that year, and the particular incidence being regulated by local assessments. Both were unelastic, and required to be supplemented as time went on. Accordingly, just when the parliaments are found introducing new forms of subsidy, income tax, poll tax, or alien tax, the clergy have to provide some corresponding methods of increasing their grants. The stipendiary clergy were brought under contribution by archbishop Arundel, who, as we have seen, had some difficulty in reconciling with justice the collection of the priests' noble, by a vote of convocation, from a class of clergy which was not represented in convocation². The difficulty was probably overcome by a diocesan visitation or some other proceeding of the individual bishops.

New forms of ecclesiastical impost.

397. Of this liberty of convocation the kings were carefully observant; and the parliaments not less so. Frequently as the knights of the shire proposed to seize the temporalities of the clergy, they never threatened the spiritualities; they attacked the position of the bishops and religious orders, but not that of the parochial clergy. And the clergy were generally willing to make a virtue of the necessity which lay upon them; they never, or only in the rarest cases, refused their tenth when the parliament had voted its proper share. More than once, indeed, under Edward III and Richard II, the commons made their grants conditional on the proportionate contribution of the clergy; but these occasions were not construed as a precedent, and were met by protests at the time³. On one occasion, in the next century, we have seen the commons taking the clerical grant into account and presuming upon the gift of the priests' noble in a way that called for the interposition of Henry VI⁴. He reminded them that it was not for them but for the convocations to decide that that tax should be voted. But although the clergy had thus retained the power to consent or to refuse, they had no direct voice in the disposal of the grants they Forbearance of the laity in dealing with spiritualities.

The king forbids the commons to tax the stipendiary clergy.

¹ Coke, 4 Inst. p. 34; Brady, Boroughs, p. 39; Blackstone, Comm. i. 308; Madox, Firma Burgi, pp. 110 sq. ² See above, pp. 46, 48.

³ Vol. ii. pp. 444, 470, 489.

⁴ Above, p. 147.

General acquiescence.

bestowed; the sums collected went to the general fund of the revenue, and were appropriated to special purposes by the commons or by the council. In all these points the period on which we have been last employed witnessed no important change; but the disuse of the attendance of the clergy in parliament, their constant complaisance in supplementing the parliamentary grants, and the increasing tendency to regard convocation as a constitutional supplement of parliament, are all signs of a progress towards the state of things in which it became possible for Henry VIII to effect the great constitutional change that marks his reign.

Clerical taxation of the laity not attempted or unsuccessful.

398. Of attempts by the clergy, except under papal authority, to tax the laity, or to enforce any general payments from them, English history has no trace. The cases in which tithes were claimed for underwood, in which the nearest approach seems to be made to such a proceeding, have been already noticed. Other attempts made in provincial synods to extend the area of titheable property seem to have failed¹. Indirect exactions, in the form of fees or fines in the spiritual courts, mortuaries and customary payments, scarcely come within the scope of our consideration, except as part of a very general estimate of the causes which alienated the laity from the clergy.

Jurisdiction in ecclesiastical matters.

399. We thus come to the last of our constitutional inquiries, that of judicature; the subject of jurisdiction of, by, and for the clergy, which has been through the whole period of English history one of the most important influences on the social condition of the nation, the occasion of some of its most critical experiences, and one of its greatest administrative difficulties. In the very brief notice which can be here given to it, it will be necessary to arrange the points which come before us under the following heads: first, the jurisdiction exercised by the secular courts over ecclesiastical persons and causes; secondly,

Division of the subject.

¹ Especially the demand of a tithe of personalty; see on this subject Gibson, Codex, pp. 690 sq.; Prynne, Records, iii. 332 sq. In 1237 the clergy petitioned that secular judges might not be allowed to determine 'utrum dandae sint decimae de lapidicinis vel silvicaediis, vel herbagiis vel pasturis vel de aliis decimis non consuetis;' Ann. Burton, p. 254. In archbishop Gray's Constitutions, cir. A.D. 1250, the obligation to pay tithe of personalty is strongly urged; Johnson, Canons, ii. 179.

the jurisdiction exercised by the spiritual courts over laymen and temporal causes; thirdly, the jurisdiction of the spiritual courts over the clergy; and fourthly, the judicial claims and recognised authority on judicial matters of the pope of Rome.

All suits touching the temporalities of the clergy were subject to the jurisdiction of the king's courts, and against so reasonable a rule scarcely any traces of resistance on the part of the clergy are found. Yet it is not improbable that during the quarrels of the twelfth century some question on the right of the bishops to try such suits may have arisen. Glanvill gives certain forms of prohibition in which the ecclesiastical judges are forbidden to entertain suits in which a lay fee is concerned¹; and Alexander III, in a letter addressed to the bishops in 1178, directed them to abstain from hearing such causes, the exclusive jurisdiction of which belonged to the king². In reference to lands held in frankalmoign, disputes between clergymen belonged to the ecclesiastical courts; but the question whether the land in dispute was held by this tenure or as a lay fee was decided by a recognition under the king's writ³. The jurisdiction as to tithes was similarly a debateable land between the two jurisdictions; the title to the ownership, as in questions of advowson and presentation⁴, belonging to the secular courts, and the process of recovery belonging to the court Christian⁵. The right of defining matters titheable was claimed by the archbishops in their constitutions, but without much success, the local custom and prescription being generally received as decisive in the matter. The right of patronage was determined in the king's courts. In each of these departments, however, some concert with the ecclesiastical courts was indispensable; many issues of fact were referred by the royal tribunals to the court

Royal jurisdiction over the temporalities of the clergy.

Lands held in frankalmoign.

Questions of right to tithe.

Questions of patronage.

¹ Glanvill, lib. xii. cc. 21, 22, 25.

² R. Diceto, i. 427.

³ Const. Clar. no. 9; Glanvill, lib. xii. c. 15: against this the clergy petitioned in 1237; Ann. Burton, p. 254.

⁴ Glanvill, lib. iv.

⁵ The processes for recovery of tithe, and the jurisdiction in subtraction of tithe, have a long history of their own which does not concern us much. The statement in the text is Blackstone's conclusion, Comm. vol. iii. p. 88; but the details may be found in Reeves's History of English Law, iv. 85 sq.; cf. Prynn, Records, iii. 332; Gibson, Codex, pp. 690 sq.; and Ann. Burton, p. 255.

Cooperation of the two judicatures.

Christian to be decided there, and the interlacing, so to speak, of the two jurisdictions was the occasion of many disputes both on general principle and in particular causes. These disputes, notwithstanding the legislative activity of the kings and the general good understanding which subsisted between them and the prelates, were not during the middle ages authoritatively and finally decided. It is enough for our present purpose to state generally the tendency to draw all causes which in any way concerned landed property into the royal courts, and to prevent all attempts at a rival jurisdiction.

Personal actions between clerk and lay.

The same interlacing of judicatures, similar disputes, and a like tendency, are found in the treatment of personal actions between laymen and clergymen; the fifteenth Constitution of Clarendon¹, which insists that the cognisance of debts, in which the faith of the debtor has been pledged, belongs to the king's jurisdiction, was contravened by the canon of archbishop Boniface, who, in 1261, attempted to draw all such pleas in which clerks were concerned into the ecclesiastical courts²; but there is no reason to suppose that such a canon was observed, still less that it was incorporated into the received jurisprudence of the realm. A still larger claim was made in 1237, when the clergy demanded that a clerk should never be summoned before the secular judge in a personal action in which real property is untouched³; but this, with many other gravamina presented on the same occasion, could never find a favourable hearing, notwithstanding the high authority of Grosseteste, who maintained them; and after the reign of Edward I they are heard of no more except as theoretical grievances.

Claims of the clergy not allowed.

Criminal suits.

In criminal suits the position of the clergy was more defensible. The secular courts were bound to assist the spiritual courts in obtaining redress and vindication for clergymen who were injured by laymen; in cases in which the clerk himself was accused, the clerical immunity from trial by the secular judge was freely recognised. If the ordinary claimed the incriminated clerk, the secular court surrendered him for ecclesiastical trial: the accused might claim the benefit of clergy either before trial or after conviction in the lay court; and it was not until the fifteenth century that any very definite regulation of this dangerous immunity was arrived at¹. We have seen the importance which the jurisdiction over criminous clerks assumed in the first quarrel between Becket and Henry II. It was with the utmost reluctance that the clergy admitted the decision of the legate Hugo Pierleoni, that the king might arrest and punish clerical offenders against the forest law². The ordinary, moved by a sense of justice, or by a natural dislike to acknowledge the clerical character of a criminal, would not probably, except in times of political excitement, interfere to save the convicted clerk; and in many cases the process of retributive justice was too rapid to allow of his interposition. It is not a little curious, however, to find that Henry IV, at the time of his closest alliance with Arundel, did not hesitate to threaten archbishops and bishops with condign punishment for treason³; that on one famous occasion he carried the threat into execution⁴; and that the hanging of the mendicant friars, who spread treason in the earlier years of his reign, was a summary proceeding which would have endangered the throne of a weak king even in less tumultuous times. Into the legal minutiae of these points we are not called on to enter: as to their social and constitutional bearing, it is enough to remark that although, in times when class jealousies are strong, clerical

¹ Select Charters, p. 140: cf. the Ordonnance of Philip II; Ord. i. pp. 39 sq.

² Johnson, Canons, ii. 196.

³ Ann. Burton, p. 254: 'item petunt quod clerici non conveniantur in actione personali quae non sit super re immobili coram iudice saeculari, sed coram iudice ecclesiastico, et quod prohibitio regis non currat quominus hoc fieri non possit.'

Benefit of clergy.

Jurisdiction over criminous clerks.

Prelates threatened with the punishment of treason.

Influence of class immunities.

¹ Blackstone, Comm. iv. 365 sq.

² R. Diceto, i. 410. In a letter addressed to the pope Henry states the concessions which he has made to the legate; 'videlicet quod clericus de cetero non trahatur ante iudicem saecularem in persona sua de aliquo criminali neque de aliquo forisfacto excepto forisfacto forestae meae, et excepto laico feodo unde mihi vel alii domino saeculari debetur servitium;' he will not retain vacant sees or abbeys in hand for more than a year; the murderers of clerks are subjected to perpetual forfeiture besides the customary lay punishment; and clerks are exempted from trial by battle. On the later phases of this dispute see Ann. Burton, pp. 425 sq., where is a tract by Robert de Marisco on the privileges of the clergy. Cf. Robertson's Becket, 82, 83, 209, 210.

³ Rymer, viii. 123.

Above, pp. 52, 53.

immunities are in theory, but in theory only, a safeguard of society, their uniform tendency is to keep alive the class jealousies; they are among the remedies which perpetuate the evils which they imperfectly counteract. In quiet times such immunities are unnecessary; in unquiet times they are disregarded.

Ecclesiastical jurisdiction in matters temporal, matrimonial, and testamentary.

Growth of the testamentary jurisdiction.

Subtraction of tithe.

Certificate of the ecclesiastical court, necessary for temporal justice.

400. Of the temporal causes which were subject to the cognisance of the ecclesiastical courts the chief were matrimonial and testamentary suits, and actions for the recovery of ecclesiastical payments, tithes and customary fees. The whole jurisdiction in questions of marriage was, owing to the sacramental character ascribed to the ordinance of matrimony, throughout Christendom a spiritual jurisdiction. The ecclesiastical jurisdiction in testamentary matters and the administration of the goods of persons dying intestate was peculiar to England and the sister kingdoms, and had its origin, it would appear, in times soon after the Conquest. In Anglo-Saxon times there seems to have been no distinct recognition of the ecclesiastical character of these causes, and even if there had been they would have been tried in the shire moot. Probate of wills is also in many cases a privilege of manorial courts, which have nothing ecclesiastical in their composition, and represent the more ancient moots in which no doubt the wills of the Anglo-Saxons were published. As however the testamentary jurisdiction was regarded by Glanvill¹ as an undisputed right of the church courts, the date of its commencement cannot be put later than the reign of Henry I, and it may possibly be as old as the separation of lay and spiritual courts. The 'subtraction of tithe' and refusal to pay ecclesiastical fees and perquisites were likewise punished by spiritual censures which the secular power undertook to enforce.

As all these departments closely bordered upon the domain of the temporal courts, some concert between the two was indispensable; and there were many points on which the certificate of the spiritual court was the only evidence on which the temporal court could act: in questions of legitimacy, regularity of marriage, the full possession of holy orders and the fact of institution to livings, the assistance of the spiritual court enabled the temporal courts to complete their proceedings in suits touching the title to property, dower and patronage¹; and the more ambitious prelates of the thirteenth century claimed the last two departments for the spiritual courts². In this however they did not obtain any support from Rome, and at home the claim was disregarded. Besides these chief points, there were other minor suits for wrongs for which the temporal courts afforded no remedy, such as slander in cases where the evil report did not cause material loss to the person slandered: these belonged to the spiritual courts and were punished by spiritual penalties³.

¹ Glanvill, lib. vii. c. 8; Blackstone, Comm. iii. 96 sq.; Prynne, Records, iii. 140; Gibson, Codex, pp. 551 sq.

Minor causes in courts Christian.

401. Besides the jurisdiction in these matters of temporal concern, there was a large field of work for the church courts in disciplinary cases; the cognisance of immorality of different kinds, the correction of which had as its avowed purpose the benefit of the soul of the delinquent. In these trials the courts had their own methods of process derived in great measure from the Roman law, with a whole apparatus of citations, libels, and witnesses; the process of purgation, penance, and, in default of proper satisfaction, excommunication and its resulting penalties enforced by the temporal law. The sentence of excommunication was the ultimate resource of the spiritual courts. If the delinquent held out for forty days after the denunciation of this sentence, the king's court, by writ of significavit⁴ or some similar injunction, ordered the sheriff to imprison him until he satisfied the claims of the church.

Suits 'pro correctione animae.'

Process on excommunication.

These proceedings furnished employment for a great ma-

¹ Blackstone, Comm. iii. 335 sq.

² See Johnson, Canons, ii. 331.

³ Blackstone, Comm. iii. 123, 124. In 1237 the clergy complain that such suits are withdrawn from them; 'ne quis tractet causam in foro ecclesiae sive de perjurio, sive de fide laesa, de usura vel simonia vel defamatione, nisi tantum super testamento vel matrimonio.' Ann. Burton, p. 256. Notwithstanding the 15th constitution of Clarendon, cases of debt, as cases 'laesionis fidei,' were long tried in court Christian; the Acts of the Ripon Chapter for 1452-1506 contain 118 such cases.

⁴ Blackstone, Comm. iii. 102; see below, pp. 365, 369.

Number of ecclesiastical courts.

chinery of judicature; the archbishops in their prerogative courts, the bishops in their consistories, the archdeacons in some cases, and even the spiritual judges of still smaller districts, exercised jurisdiction in all these matters; in some points, as in probate and administration, co-ordinately, in others by way of delegation or of review and appeal.

Prohibitions issued by the king's court.

With the constitution of these courts the secular power meddled little. It does not appear that the secular courts were ever invoked to compel the ecclesiastical courts to do their duty: such a proceeding would have been contrary to the legal idea of the middle ages. With the proceedings, however, of the courts Christian, whenever due cause was shown, the temporal judicature might interfere by prohibitions issued by the king's courts of law or equity¹; and the claim of the kings that none of their vassals or servants should be excommunicated without their leave exempted a large number of persons from the jurisdiction of the church courts. The prohibitions were a standing grievance with the clergy, and were probably granted in many cases without due consideration. They were indeed frequently a sort of protest made by the temporal courts against the assumptions and encroachments of the courts Christian. The councils of the thirteenth century constantly complained of these vexatious proceedings², although by their own attempts to extend their jurisdiction they as constantly provoked retaliation. In 1246 Henry III charged Grosseteste as the author of these attempts which he refused to sanction; and in 1247 he endeavoured to restrict this branch of ecclesiastical jurisdiction to matrimonial and testamentary causes, and Edward I acted upon that rule³. The writ of 'circumspecte agatis,' by defining the exercise of the royal power of prohibition, succeeded in limiting the functions of the church courts. This writ, which was regarded as a statute, directed that prohibitions should not be issued in cases of spiritual correction, neglect of churchyards, subtraction of tithes, oblations, mortuaries, pensions due to

Complaints
of the clergy against prohibitions.

Restriction of ecclesiastical jurisdiction.

The writ
'circum-specte agatis.'

¹ Blackstone, Comm. iii. 112; Gibson, Codex, pp. xix, 1064, sq.

² Ann. Burton, pp. 254 sq.; 403 sq.; 413 sq.; 422 sq.

³ See above, vol. ii. p. 66; and the forms of prohibition in Prynne's Records, iii. 780; Britton, i. 90, ii. 284.

prelates, assault of clergymen, defamation, and breach of oath. In cases which concerned the right of patronage, tithe suits between parsons for more than a fourth part of the tithe of a parish, and pecuniary penances, prohibitions were to be enforced. In cases of assault on a clerk the injured person might appeal to the king's courts on account of the breach of the peace, and likewise to the bishop's court for sentence of excommunication; and in cases of defamation the spiritual court might commute penance for pecuniary payment in spite of prohibition¹. The later statutes of 1316, 1340, and 1344, are amendments and expansions of the principles here laid down.

402. The jurisdiction of the spiritual courts over spiritual men embraced all matters concerning the canonical and moral conduct of the clergy, faith, practice, fulfilment of ecclesiastical obligations, and obedience to ecclesiastical superiors. For these questions the courts possessed a complete jurisprudence of their own, regular processes of trial, and prisons in which the convicted offender was kept until he had satisfied the justice of the church. In these prisons the clerk convicted of a crime, for which if he had been a layman he would have suffered death, endured lifelong captivity²; here the clerk convicted of a treason or felony in the secular court, and subsequently handed over to the ordinary, was kept in safe custody. In 1402, when Henry IV confirmed the liberties of the clergy, the archbishop undertook that no clerk convicted of treason, or being a common thief, should be admitted to purgation, and that this should be secured by a constitution to be made by the bishops³. These prisons, especially after the alarms consequent on the Lollard movements, were a grievance in the eyes of the laity, who do not seem to have trusted the good faith of the prelates in their over clergy.

Jurisdiction

The bishops' prisons.

Tendency to abuse.

¹ Statutes, i. 101, 102; above, vol. ii. p. 124. It is worth while comparing the law under the assizes of Jerusalem, ii. 28; the points marked out by Beaumanoir, for the competence of spiritual courts, are; 1. Accusations of faith; 2. Marriage; 3. Gifts to churches and alms; 4. Religious properties; 5. Crusaders; 6. Widows; 7. Wills; 8. Holy places; 9. Bastardy; 10. Sorcery; 11. Tithes; Beaumanoir, xi. p. 56. And on testamentary jurisdiction, see Assizes, ii. 124.

² See Boniface's Constitution of 1261; Johnson, Canons, ii. 208.

³ See Wilkins, Conc. iii. 271, 272.

treatment of delinquent clergy¹. The promise of archbishop Arundel was not fulfilled.

Into the peculiar questions of ecclesiastical jurisdiction we are not called to inquire, for, in so far as it worked within its own proper sphere, its proceedings had no bearing on the subject before us. One further point, and that a most important one, the question of appeals to Rome, must be likewise briefly noticed and dismissed.

Rarity of early appeals from England
to Rome.

403. Except in the earliest days of Anglo-Saxon Christianity, when Wilfrid carried his suit to Rome, contrary to the decisions of the kings and witan of Northumbria, there are no traces of appeals to the pope earlier than the Norman Conquest. Recourse was indeed from time to time had to the holy see for the determination of points touching the bishops for which insular history and custom furnished no rules; in the ninth century a pope interceded to obtain the restoration of a dethroned king of Northumbria², and king Kenulf of Mercia, who had obtained papal confirmation of the restored dignity of Canterbury, is said to have declared that neither for pope nor for Caesar would he consent to the restoration of archbishop Wulfred³. but on these three occasions the points at issue were political rather than legal, and the action of the papal envoy that of a mediator rather than a judge. Even in the later days of the West-Saxon dynasty, when intercourse with the continental powers was much more frequent than before, the case of an application to Rome for leave to marry within the prohibited degrees seems to be the only recorded instance of a judicial resort thither; and in that case Dunstan is found resisting the papal mandate⁴. There can be no doubt that the Norman kings, influenced by continental usage, and not in the first instance unwilling to extend the authority of the papacy to which they knew themselves to be indebted, allowed the introduction of the practice of referring cases to the successor of S. Peter as supreme judge, although they did, as much as they could, restrain the practice by making their own licence an

In Anglo-Saxon times.

¹ See the petition of 1410, above, p. 65, note 4. ² Councils, &c., iii. 561.

³ Ibid. iii. 587, 588, 602.

⁴ Memorials of S. Dunstan, p. 67.

absolutely necessary preliminary. Anyhow, even in the reign of the Conqueror, disputed questions were carried to Rome for decision. William had before the Conquest been a suitor there in the matter of his marriage. The questions at issue between the sees of York and Canterbury were debated there. The bishop of Durham in his quarrel with William Rufus¹ threatened to appeal to the pope in a tone that shows the idea of such an appeal to be familiar to the persons to whom he spoke: and one of Anselm's charges against that king was that he hindered the prosecution of appeals². It would seem certain from these facts that thus early, in matters which the royal tribunal was incompetent to decide, a right of appeal under royal licence was recognised. That Henry of Blois, whilst he filled the office of legate, from 1139 to 1144, introduced the practice, is an unwarranted conclusion from the words of the contemporary writer, which seem to refer rather to appeals to his own legatine jurisdiction than to that of the court of Rome³. But although the custom was older, the frequency of appeal much increased under Stephen. In a legatine council held by archbishop Theobald in the king's presence, in 1151, three appeals were made to the pope⁴. We have noted the cases of disputed elections that occurred in his reign. Early in the next reign we find a matrimonial cause, that of Richard of Anesty, referred to Rome, and the correspondence of John of Salisbury shows that in almost every department of ecclesiastical jurisdiction the system was in full working before the election of Becket to the primacy⁵. By the Constitutions of Clarendon Henry attempted to stop or at least to control it. He forbade beneficed ecclesiastics to quit the realm without licence, and, having provided a regular succession of appellate courts from that of the archdeacon to that of the archbishop, ordered that without royal assent controversy should proceed no further⁶. This restriction of the liberty of appeal was one of the great points of the struggle with Becket, and, when the king was

Introduction of papal appeals.

Legation of Henry of Blois.

Multiplication of appeals.

Forbidden
by Henry II in the Constitutions of Clarendon.

¹ See above, vol. i. p. 477.

² H. Hunt. f. 226.

³ Foed. i. 20.

² Anselm, Epp. lib. iii. ep. 40.

⁴ Ibid.

⁶ Select Charters, p. 138.

forced to abandon the evil customs embodied in the Constitutions, he was made to swear in a special clause that he would not impede nor allow others to impede the free exercise of the right of appeals in ecclesiastical causes, provided that the appellants might, if they were suspected, be called upon to give security that they would not seek to harm the king or the kingdom¹. But although the king was thus obliged to surrender one of the most important of the points for which he had contended, and to allow, as the later records of his reign show, constant reference to the pope in cases which the national church was competent to decide, he was able to limit the appeals to strictly ecclesiastical questions, in some cases to defeat the purpose of the appellants, and in others to avoid giving formal recognition to the decisions of the foreign court. In the two famous causes of the next reign, that of the monks of Canterbury against archbishop Hubert, and that of the election of Giraldus Cambrensis to S. David's, the king relied rather on the means which he took to persuade or force the appellants to withdraw the appeal, than on any constitutional right to prohibit it; and in the Canterbury case Richard I showed no small skill in prevailing on the parties to accept an arbitration even when the Roman legate was waiting to determine the appeal². The church history of the thirteenth century, after the collapse of John's attempt to resist Innocent III, is full of appeals. Falkes de Breauté appealed against his outlawry and banishment; archbishops Richard and Edmund appealed against their monks; almost every new bishop had to fight a battle at Rome before he could obtain his see; Henry III himself, although constantly putting forward, as a special privilege of England, that all ecclesiastical suits should be finally decided within the confines of England, more than once sought in a papal sentence of absolution a release from the solemn obligations by which he had bound himself to his people. With the reign of law which was restored under his son, who insisted on the same privilege of England, the practice was

Prohibition withdrawn.

Appeals eluded and evaded.

Appeals
under Henry III.

¹ Hoveden, ii. 35; Bened. i. 32.

² Epistolæ Cantuarienses, pp. 322, 323.

discouraged and restricted but not forbidden; its exercise was limited by the certainty that in most cases safer and cheaper justice could be found at home. Yet appeals did not cease, and the custom of seeking dispensations, faculties and privileges in matrimonial and clerical causes, increased. Archbishop Winchelsea had a suit with the monks of S. Augustine's which lasted for eight years¹. Even the statutes of præmunire did not prevent the suing for justice in the papal court, in causes for which the English common law provided no remedy. But from the date of this legislation this particular practice became less historically important: the collusion, so to call it, between the crown and the papacy, as to the observance of the statute of provisors, extended also to the other dealings with the Curia. No attempt was made to prevent the sale of dispensations, and when an appeal was carried to Rome, and the Pope had on the usual plan appointed judges-delegate to hear the parties in England, the Royal veto was rarely if ever interposed. Probably however such appeals were not numerous, and, in comparison with the sums raised by dispensations, the pecuniary results were inconsiderable. Still so great was the influence which the Roman court possessed in all political and social matters, that every bishop had his accredited agent at Rome, and by presents and pensions had to secure the good offices of the several cardinals and other prelates. It is a pitiful thing to read the letters of Archbishop Chichele to the great ecclesiastics of the pontifical court, or to trace in those of bishop Becketon the paltry intrigues which determined the action of the supreme tribunal of Christendom. In the fifteenth century, notwithstanding the bold policy of Martin V and the somewhat submissive attitude of the Lancaster kings, the direct influence exerted by the papacy in legal proceedings in England had become very small: questions which had once been bitterly contested had become matters of compromise; the papal jurisdiction in minor matters had become a thing of course, and in Improvement under Edward I.

Operation of the statute of præmunire.

Diminution in the number and importance of causes referred to Rome.

Network of papal litigation.

¹ Prymne, Records, iii. 836. See also a form of appeal by Godfrey bishop of Worcester against archbishop Peckham; Thomas, Worcester, App. p. 38; and cases of appeal mentioned in the Rolls of Parliament, i. 50, 208; ii. 82.

Gradual diminution of importance.

greater matters it was seldom heard of. The kings, who freely availed themselves of the powers which they obtained by good understanding with Rome, were tolerant of pretensions which, except in one point, were little more than pretensions. That one point, the drawing of revenue from England, was indeed contested, and now and then was the subject of some sharp recriminations, in which the parliament as well as the king had to speak the mind of the nation. But most of the mischiefs caused by the old system of appeal, a system which at once crushed the power of the diocesan and defied the threats of metropolitan and king, were extinguished by the growth of sound principles in the courts of law, by the determined policy of the statute of praemunire, and by the general conviction that the decisions purchased at Rome could not be executed or enforced except with the leave of the courts at home. The papal policy had become obstructive rather than aggressive; its legal machinery was becoming subservient to royal authority, not a court of refuge or of remedy: and, had not the doctrinal reformation given to the remodelled Curia a new standing ground, which on any theory was higher than the old position of territorial and pecuniary adventure into which it was rapidly sinking, the action of the papacy in England might have altogether ceased. It was a curious coincidence that the great breach between England and Rome should be the result of a litigation in a matrimonial suit, one of the few points in which the Curia had continued to exercise any real jurisdiction.

The question of heresy and its treatment.

In the foregoing outline of the legislative and judicial relations of church and state, the subject of heresy has been set aside for more particular treatment. It is a subject which comes into prominence as the older constitutional questions between the two powers become less important; and its interest is, from the point at which we have arrived, mainly prospective. It has however great importance both legally and socially, and the history of the legislation concerning it, so far as we can now follow it, furnishes most valuable illustrations of the curious interlacing of the spiritual and temporal politics on which we have had again and again to remark.

404. The English church had up to the close of the fourteenth century been singularly free from heresy¹: it had escaped all such horrors as those of the Albigensian crusade, and had witnessed with but slight interest the disputes which followed the preaching of the spiritual Franciscans. Misbelief and apostasy were indeed subjects of inquest at the sheriff's tourn, and the punishment of 'mescreauntz apertement atteyntz' was burning². If however there was any persecution of heresy in England before the year 1382, it must have taken the ordinary form of prosecution in the spiritual court; the heretic when found guilty would, after his forty days of grace, be committed to prison by the writ 'de excommunicato capiendo,' or 'significavit,' until he should satisfy the demands of the church³. But it is highly improbable that if any such cases had occurred the scrutiny of controversial historians and of legal antiquaries should have alike failed to discover them.

Immunity of England from heretical error.

Recognised process of ecclesiastical law.

The first person against whom any severe measures were taken was John Wycliffe himself. He had risen to eminence as a philosophic teacher at Oxford. Although he was in the main a Realist, he had adopted some of the political tenets of the Franciscan Nominalists, and, hating the whole policy of the mendicant orders, had formed views on the temporal power of Wycliffe the first important person prosecuted for heresy.

¹ The early cases of medieval heresy in England are these; (1) the appearance of certain 'pravi dogmatis disseminatores' in 1165 or 1166; they were 'Publicani,' and spoke German; they were condemned in a council, held at Oxford, to be branded, flogged and excommunicated, and were proscribed by the Assize of Clarendon. They quitted England after making one convert; R. Diceto, i. 318; Will. Newb. lib. ii. c. 13. (2) An Albigensian was burned in London in 1210. (3) In 1222 a deacon who had apostatised to Judaism was condemned in a council at Oxford and burned; Ann. Wykes, p. 63; or hanged, M. Paris, iii. 71. (4) There were alarms about heresy in 1236 and 1240; and royal writs were issued restraining the action of unauthorised attempts at persecution; Prynne, Records, ii. 475, 560; cf. M. Paris, iv. 32. (5) There is a curious and obscure case, that of Richard Clapwell (Ann. Dunst. pp. 323, 341); in the years 1286-8: he was excommunicated by the archbishop, made his way to Rome, was silenced there, and died mad. (6) In the troubles of the Franciscans, some of the unfortunate friars are said to have perished in England; Ann. Mels. ii. 323; but the authority for the statement is insufficient. See above, vol. ii. p. 492.

² Britton, i. 42, 179; cf. Fleta, p. 113.

³ Gibson, Codex, p. 1102; Rot. Claus. (ed. Hardy), ii. 166; Rot. Parl. iii. 128.

Development of his views.

the papacy akin to those of Marsilius and Ockham, blending with them the ideal of apostolic poverty as the model of clerical life. As his opinions in the later years of his life developed rapidly, it is not surprising that he came to look on the sacramental system of the medieval church with suspicion and dislike, as the real basis on which papal and clerical authority rested. Speculations on philosophical dogmas, and a certain amount of loose thought on doctrinal matters, the age of Edward III easily tolerated; archbishop Sudbury, if he were not afraid of Wycliffe, was not actively hostile to him; he had friends at court, and his reputation was so high that he was employed by the king in the negotiations with the pope which were held at Bruges in 1374. It was his share in the anti-clerical policy broached by the earl of Pembroke in 1371, and by John of Gaunt in 1376, which drew down upon him the hostility of the bishops¹. The convocation which met February 3, 1377, insisted on the restoration of bishop Wykeham, on whom John of Gaunt had avenged the humiliation which he had received in the Good Parliament, and urged the prelates to attack Wycliffe, whom they regarded as the chief counsellor of their great enemy. He was accordingly on the 19th brought before the bishops at St. Paul's; but the affray between his noble protectors and the citizens of London, provoked by the insult offered to bishop Courtenay, prevented the trial from proceeding, and the precise charges then laid against him are unknown². A few months later the pope, under the influence of the friars, urged the bishops to attack him again, and in his letters distinctly alleged Wycliffe's following of Marsilius of Padua and John de Janduno as proving him to be a heretic³. Again a prosecution was attempted; Wycliffe was brought before a body of bishops at Lambeth; but again a popular tumult, encouraged by the attitude of the court, put an end to

First attempt to try him,

Second attempt.

¹ See above, vol. ii. pp. 440, 447, 457.

² The annalists give a sketch of the heresies generally imputed to Wycliffe, but not the precise points on which the investigation was attempted in 1377; Cont. Murimuth, pp. 222-224; Wals. i. 325. Cf. Shirley, Fasc. Zizan. pref. p. xxvii.

³ By letters dated May 22, 1377; Wals. i. 345; Chr. Angl. p. 174.

the trial. Although he lived six years longer, and by his attacks on the sacramental system exposed himself, far more than before, to charges of doctrinal heresy, and although his tenets were formally condemned, no further attempt was made to molest him personally. Thus his opinions regarding the wealth and power of the clergy were the occasion of the first attack upon him; the pretext of the second was his theory on the papacy; and he was not formally brought to trial for his views on the sacraments. Of the spiritual, the philosophical, and the political elements in Wycliffe's teaching, the last was far the most offensive to the clergy and the most attractive to the discontented laity. In Wycliffe himself there is no reason to doubt that all the three were matters of conviction; but neither is there any reason to doubt that the popular favour which attended on his teaching was caused mainly by the desire for social change. Both he and his adversaries recognised the fact that on the sacramental system the practical controversy must ultimately turn; the mob was attracted by the idea of confiscation.

His opinions condemned.

As soon as the alarm of Wat Tyler's rising had subsided, Courtenay, who had succeeded the murdered Sudbury as archbishop of Canterbury, undertook the task of repressing the new heresy which Wycliffe's emissaries were spreading at Oxford and in the country at large. In the first parliament of 1382 he procured the passing of an act against heretic preachers. That parliament sat from May 7 to May 22, and its acts were promulgated on the 26th; the statute touching heresy stated that unlicensed preachers of heresy, when cited before the ordinaries, refused to obey and drew people to hear them and to maintain them in their errors by great 'routs'; it enacted that commissions should be directed out of chancery to the sheriffs and others, to arrest the particular persons certified by the bishops to be heretics or favourers of heresy, that the sheriffs should arrest them, and they should be held in strong prison until they satisfied the church; in other words, instead of waiting until the heretic had been tried, found guilty, and excommunicated, the sheriff was to arrest under a commission

Legislation
against heresy in 1382.

from the chancellor issued on the bishop's certificate¹. This was not all : on the 17th of May the archbishop had assembled a body of bishops, jurists, and divines, who drew up a series of propositions which were ascribed to the heterodox preachers and which they pronounced to be heretical². During the consultations of this body, which lasted until May 21, an earthquake was felt in London, which caused no small consternation, and the heretics regarded it as a divine interposition in their favour³. On the 12th of July the archbishop obtained from the king letters empowering the bishops to arrest all persons who maintained the condemned propositions, to commit them to their own prisons, or to those of other authorities, and to keep them there until the council should determine what was to be done with them⁴. A brisk series of prosecutions followed during the summer ; trials were held and excommunications issued ; but the delinquents submitted ; and, when in the October parliament the knights of the shire insisted that the statute of May, not having duly passed the commons, should be repealed, all attempts at further persecution ended for the time⁵. The clergy had to content themselves with the old process of the spiritual courts⁶ ; the Lollard party were emboldened to bring before parliament the extravagant propositions of their rashest leaders⁷.

Wycliffe died in 1384 ; soon after that the political troubles of Richard's reign threw the religious difficulty altogether into the shade ; the condition of the papacy was not such as to invite critical examination. After the victory of the appellants in 1388 royal letters were issued for the seizure of heretical books and the imprisonment of heretical teachers⁸, and in 1389

¹ Rot. Parl. iii. 125 ; Stat. 5 Ric. II, p. 2. c. 5 ; Statutes, ii. 25.

² Wilkins, Conc. iii. 157 sq. ; Fasc. Ziz. pp. 272 sq.

³ Wycliffe, Trialogus, iv. 27, 36, 37 ; Fasc. Ziz. p. 283.

⁴ Wilkins, Conc. iii. 156. Letters in the same sense were directed to the chancellor of Oxford ; ib. p. 167 ; Fasc. Ziz. pp. 312 sq.

⁵ Rot. Parl. iii. 141 ; see above, vol. ii. pp. 488, 494.

⁶ See for example the injunctions issued by bishop Wakefield of Worcester in 1387 ; Wilk. Conc. iii. 202 ; Thomas, Worc. App. p. 123.

⁷ Fasc. Ziz. pp. 360-369 ; above, vol. ii. p. 512.

⁸ Wilk. Conc. iii. 191 ; above, vol. ii. p. 512 ; Prynne, 4th Inst. pp. 396-398.

Council of 'The earthquake.'

Royal letters.

Repeal of the statute.

an attack made by Courtenay on the Leicestershire Lollards, under the royal letters of 1382, ended in the submission of the accused¹. In 1391 the prosecution of Swynderby showed that the prelates had no other legal weapon against the heretics than the old spiritual process, whilst the heretics took care not to provoke extreme measures by their obstinacy².

Prosecutions and recantations.

A long manifesto of the party, presented in parliament in 1395, roused Richard himself to take measures of precaution, and suggested further proceedings³.

In 1396 Thomas Arundel succeeded to the primacy; he immediately held a council which condemned the heretical propositions⁴; but political affairs prevented any new legislation until, in 1401, having obtained the promise of aid from the king and the help of a sympathetic parliament, he procured the passing of the statute 'de haeretico⁵.' This act went far beyond that of 1382, both in its description of the evil and in the nature of the remedy prescribed. A certain new sect had arisen which usurped the office of preaching, and which, by holding unlawful conventicles, teaching in schools, circulating books and promoting insurrection, defied all authority; the diocesan jurisdiction was helpless without the king's assistance, for the preachers migrated from diocese to diocese, and contemned the citations of the courts; the prelates and clergy, and the commons also, had prayed for a remedy, the former in a long, and the latter in a brief petition; in conformity with their request the king in the usual form granted, established and ordained, that none should presume to preach openly or privately without the licence of the diocesan, except curates in

The statute 'de haeretico,' passed in 1401.

Tenour of the act.

¹ Wilk. Conc. iii. 208 sq.

² Swynderby's appeal (Foxe, Acts and Monuments, iii. 127) states distinctly that after excommunication the bishop must seek the succour of the king's law and 'by a writ of significavit put a man in prison.' Death is the punishment of heresy, but the sentence cannot 'be given without the king's justices;' ib.

³ See above, vol. ii. p. 512. Royal letters of the year 1394, against a heretic in Hereford, are in Prynne, 4th Institute, pp. 227, 228, and proceedings against Wycliffe's books were constantly going on at Oxford during these years.

⁴ Wilk. Conc. iii. 227 sq.

⁵ See above, p. 33.

Statute 'de haeretico.'

their own churches, and that none should teach heresy, hold conventicles, or favour the new doctrines: if any should offend, the diocesan of the place should cause him to be arrested and detained in his prison till canonical purgation or abjuration, proceedings for which should take place within three months of the arrest: if he were convicted he should be imprisoned by the diocesan according to the measure of his default, and fined proportionably; but if he should refuse to abjure, or relapse after abjuration, so that according to the canons he ought to be left to the secular court, he should be given up to the sheriff or other local magistrate and be publicly burned¹. By this act then the bishop had authority to arrest, imprison, and try the criminal within three months, to detain him in his own court, and to call in the sheriff to burn him. The parliament which passed the statute broke up on the 10th of March.

Trial and execution of Sawtre.

The archbishop however had not waited for this to make an example. The heretic clerk Sawtre during the session of parliament had been brought before the bishops in convocation, tried and condemned². On the 26th of February the king's writ was issued for his execution. The coincidence of the two events is somewhat puzzling: the execution of Sawtre under the royal writ has led the legal historians to believe that prior to the passing of the act of 1401, it was possible, in the case of a condemned heretic, for the king to issue a writ 'de haeretico comburendo' analogous to the writ 'de excommunicato capi-endo'³. But no other instance of the kind can be found⁴; and most probably no such process had ever been followed. Why Arundel should have hurried on Sawtre's execution by royal writ instead of waiting until by his own order to the sheriff the sentence could have been enforced under the act, is not clear;

Question of the writ 'de haeretico comburendo.'

¹ 2 Hen. IV, c. 15; Statutes, ii. 125.

² Wilk. Conc. iii. 254.

³ Blackstone, Comm. iv. 46.

⁴ Although Blackstone declares that a writ of the kind is found among our ancient precedents, and refers to Fitz Herbert, Natura Brevium, 269, the only example of the writ given there is the writ in Sawtre's case; and Fitz Herbert's argument (or that of his editor), that such a writ could only issue on the certificate of a provincial synod and was not a writ of course but specially directed by the king in council, is based on that single example.

unless, as there is some authority for supposing, he anticipated a popular attempt at rescue¹. It was under these circumstances that the first execution for Lollard heresy took place in England. By the laws and customs of foreign states burning was the regular form of execution for such an offence; in England it was the recognised punishment due for heresy in common with arson and other heinous crimes²; and there was nothing apparently in its enforcement here that shocked the feelings of the age.

First execution for Lollardy.

The act of 1401 neither stopped the growth of heresy nor satisfied the desires of the persecutors. The social doctrines, with which Wycliffe's rash followers had supplemented the teaching of their leader, had probably engaged the sympathies of the discontented in the project of unseating the new king. In the parliament of 1406 a petition was laid before Henry, supported by the prince of Wales and the lords, and presented by the speaker of the commons³. In this document the action of the Lollards is described as threatening the whole fabric of society; the attacks on property endangered the position of the temporal and spiritual lords alike; to them were owing the reports that king Richard was alive, and the pretended prophecies of his restoration: the king was asked to enact that any persons promulgating such notions should be arrested and imprisoned, without bail except by undertaking before the chancellor, and should be brought before the next parliament, there to abide by such judgment as should be rendered by the king and the lords; that all lords of franchises, justices, sheriffs, and other magistrates should be empowered and bound to take inquest of such doings by virtue of this statute without any special commission, and that all subjects should be bound to assist. Henry agreed to the petition, and the statute founded upon it was ordered to take effect from the approaching Epiphany and to hold good until the next parliament. Strange to say, nothing more was heard of it; whether it was merely Insufficiency of the statute.

Great petition of 1406.

Act founded upon it.

No result follows.

¹ Adam of Usk (p. 4) mentions an alarm of a Lollard rising in London during this session of parliament.

² Above, p. 365; Britton, i. 42.

³ Rot. Parl. iii. 583, 584; see above, p. 58.

Different views of this proposed measure.

intended as a temporary expedient, whether the Lollard knights procured its suppression, or the archbishop had seen the impolicy of confusing the spiritual and temporal jurisdictions, or whether it was not a premature attempt of the prince to legislate on the principle which he adopted after the death of Arundel and when he was king himself, it is not possible to decide. Opinions have been divided as to the purport of the petition, and it has even been maintained that it was intended to substitute for the ecclesiastical persecution a milder form of repression over which the parliament could exert more direct authority¹. But the language of the petition carefully considered seems to preclude any such conclusion; and it seems best to refer the disappearance of the statute either to a jealousy between the prince and the archbishop, of which there are other traces at a later time, or to a feeling of distrust existing between the spiritual and secular courts. The patent rolls of the ninth year of the reign contain several commissions issued by the king's authority for the suppression of heresy and the arrest of Lollard preachers after royal inhibition²; it is possible that these measures may have been taken under this statute.

Arundel's
Constitu-
tions.

The next parliament was that of Gloucester, in October 1407; nothing however was done respecting the Lollards in that session. Arundel found time to issue a series of constitutions against them in 1409, in which he declared heresy to be a crime which should be treated as summarily as high treason. But the condition of the papacy itself occupied the minds of the bishops too much during the following years to allow time for elaborate measures of repression. In 1410 a parliamentary struggle took place, of which some account has been already given³. The knights of the shire petitioned, according to Walsingham, that convicted clerks might not be handed over to the bishops' prisons, and that the recent statute, according to which the Lollards whenever and wherever arrested might without

Petition
of 1410.

¹ Hallam (Middle Ages, iii. 90) supposes that the clergy prevented it from appearing on the Statute Roll.

² Rot. Pat. Calend. pp. 254, 256.

³ Above, p. 65.

royal writ be imprisoned in the nearest royal prison, might be modified¹. A petition of similar character appears on the rolls; the purport of which is that persons arrested under the provisions of the act of 1401 may be admitted to bail and make their purgation in the county in which they are arrested, such arrests to be henceforward made by the king's officers without violent affray². To this prayer the king returned an unfavourable answer, and it is probable that this was the petition which the commons asked to have back, so that nothing might be enacted thereupon³. In this parliament also was first broached the elaborate scheme of confiscation which became a part of the political programme of the Lollards⁴. During this session a frightful execution took place under the act of 1401, and on this occasion the victim was a layman; John Badby, a tailor of the diocese of Worcester, had been excommunicated for heresy by the bishop and had refused to abjure; he was brought before the archbishop and clergy in convocation and, persisting in his refusal, was handed over to the secular arm with a petition, addressed by archbishop Arundel to the lords, that he might not be put to death⁵. Whether the petition were a piece of mockery or not, the unfortunate man was burned, the prince of Wales being present at the execution and making a vain attempt to procure a recantation. This event took place on the 10th of March; it seems to have been the first execution under the act, and accordingly in the record of the convocation the whole statute is rehearsed, apparently in justification⁶. In the following month Sir John Oldcastle's church at Cowling was placed under interdict in consequence of the contumacy of his chaplain, but the sentence was remitted within a few days⁷, and Oldcastle as well as his followers had peace until the death of the king.

Proposal of confiscation.

Execution
of Badby.

Beginning of Oldcastle's troubles.

On the accession of Henry V, Arundel, as we have seen, renewed his attack on the Lollards: Oldcastle was tried, condemned, and allowed to escape from prison. The abortive

Legislation
of Henry V against heresy.

¹ Wals. ii. 283.

² Rot. Parl. iii. 626.

³ Rot. Parl. iii. 623; above, p. 65.

⁴ Above, pp. 65, 115.

⁵ Wilk. Conc. iii. 324-329; Foxe, iii. 235-238; Wals. ii. 282.

⁶ Wilk. Conc. iii. 328.

⁷ Ib. iii. 330, 331.

Development of policy.

attempt at revolution followed¹; and Henry V in the parliament of 1414 proceeded to legislate finally and more fiercely against the remnant of the heretic party. Arundel was dead, and, whatever had been his influence in forwarding or in preventing the measures proposed in 1406, the king proceeded to legislate on the principle which was then propounded. That principle was to make heresy an offence against the common law as against the canon law, and not merely to use the secular arm in support of the spiritual arm, but to give the temporal courts a co-ordinate power of proceeding directly against the offenders. If we suppose that Henry V was now acting under the advice of the Beauforts, as may be generally assumed when he acted in opposition to the advice of Arundel, this policy may be described as the policy of the Beauforts; and the cardinal's expedition to Bohemia may be regarded as a later example of the same idea of intolerance. But it is not necessary to look for the suggestion further than to the king himself, who, in the full belief of his duty as maintainer of orthodoxy, no doubt thought it incumbent upon him to place himself in the van of the army of the church. The purport of the act is as follows: in the view of the recent troubles caused by the Lollards and their supporters, the king, with the advice of the lords and at the prayer of the commons, enacts that the chancellor, treasurer, judges, and all officers of justice shall on their appointment swear to do their utmost to extirpate heresy, to assist the ordinaries and their commissaries; all persons convicted before the ordinaries, and delivered over to the secular arm, are to forfeit their lands as in case of felony, the lands which they hold to the use of others being however excepted; they are also to forfeit their chattels to the king. So far the act is only an expansion of the law of 1401: the following clauses go further: the justices of the bench, of the peace, and of assize are now empowered to inquire after heretics, and a clause to that effect is to be introduced into their commissions: if any be so indicted the justices may award against them a writ of capias which the sheriffs shall be bound to execute. The persons arrested are to

Tenour of the act of 1414.

¹ See above, p. 82.

be delivered to the ordinaries by indenture to be made within ten days of the arrest, and are to be tried by the spiritual court: if any other charges are laid against them in the king's court they are to be tried upon them before being delivered to the ordinary, and the proceedings so taken are not to be taken in evidence in the spiritual court; the person indicted may be bailed within ten days; the jurors by whom the inquest is to be taken are to be men who have at least five pounds a year in land in England or forty shillings in Wales; if the person arrested break prison before acquittal, the king shall have his chattels, and also the profits of his lands until he be forthcoming again, but, if he dies before conviction, the lands go to his heirs¹. In 1416 archbishop Chichele followed up this act by a constitution directing an inquiry by ecclesiastical officers, empowered to take information on oath, and authorised to imprison the accused until the next convocation, in which report is to be made to the archbishop of the whole proceedings².

The act of 1414 is the last statute against the Lollards, and under it most of the cruel executions of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries were perpetrated. It was not however the last occasion upon which parliamentary action was attempted. In 1422 the Lollards were again formidable in London, and the parliament, on the petition of the commons, ordered that those who were in prison should be at once delivered to the ordinary according to the statute of 1414; a similar order was given in 1425³. In 1468 Edward IV, with exceptional tenderness, rejected a petition that persons who had committed the acts of sacrilege which were attributed to the Lollards should be regarded as guilty of high treason⁴.

Outside the parliament the still unextinguished embers of political Lollardy continued to burn; in the attempted rising of Jack Sharp in 1431 the Lollard petition of 1410 was republished and circulated⁵, and it is not improbable that some Later attempts to legislate.

Change of political feeling with regard to the Lollards.

¹ 2 Hen. V, stat. i. c. 7; Statutes, ii. 181 sq.

² Johnson's Canons, ii. 482.

³ Rot. Parl. iv. 174, 292.

⁴ Ib. v. 632.

⁵ Above, p. 115.

Lollard discontent was mingled with the popular complaints in 1450. But the influences which had supported the early Wycliffites were extinct. The knights of the shire no longer urged the spoliation of the clergy; the class from which they were drawn found plunder enough elsewhere; the universities produced no new schoolmen; the friars experienced no revival or reform; and, although learning was liberally nurtured by the court, freedom of opinion found little latitude. Bishop Pecock of Chichester, who had endeavoured to use against the erroneous teaching of the Lollards some controversial weapons which implied more independent thought than his brethren could tolerate, was driven out of the royal council with one accord by the lords, was tried for heretical opinions before the archbishop and bishops of his province, and condemned¹. Like so many of the earlier Lollards he chose submission rather than martyrdom, abjured and recanted; in spite of papal mediation he was not restored to his see, but kept in confinement, and remained a pensioned prisoner as long as he lived. He is almost a solitary instance of anything like spiritual or intellectual enlightenment combining with heretical leanings to provoke the enmity or jealousy of the clergy.

Case of bishop Pecock.

Local influence of Lollardy.

The political views of the Lollards too were a very subordinate element in the dynastic struggle of the century. It is certainly curious that the early Lollard knights came chiefly from those districts which were regarded as favourable to Richard II, to the Mortimers, and afterwards to the house of York. Herefordshire, Gloucestershire, Bristol, and now and then Kent, are the favourite refuge of the persecuted or the seed-plots of sedition; Jack Sharp of Wigmoreland led the rising of 1431, as the so-called John Mortimer led that of 1450. But the common idea of resistance to the house of Lancaster was probably the only link which bound the Lollards to the Mortimers, at least after the old court influences of Richard's reign were extinguished. There were Lollards in Kent and London as well as Yorkists, but the house of York when it came

Possible
connexion with dynastic faction.

¹ Wilkins, Conc. iii. 576; Babington, Pecock's Repressor, vol. i. pref. pp. xxxvi-lyii.

to the throne showed no more favour to the heretics than the house of Lancaster had done.

It is difficult to form any distinct notion of the way in which the statutes against the Lollards operated on the general mass of the people: they were irregularly enforced, and the number of executions which took place under them has been very variously estimated¹. Although the party had declined politically, so far as not to be really dangerous at any time after Oldcastle's death, considerable liberty of teaching must have been allowed, or otherwise bishop Pecock's historical position is absolutely unintelligible. If he were, as he thought, a defender of the faith, the enemies against whom he used his controversial weapons must have existed by toleration; if he were himself heretical, the avenues to high promotion must have been but negligently guarded. But the whole of the age in which the Lollard movement was working was in England as elsewhere a period of much trouble and misgovernance; men, parties, and classes were jealous and cruel, and, although there was an amount of intellectual enlightenment and culture which is in contrast with the preceding century, it had not yet the effect of making men tolerant, merciful, or just. Tiptoft's literary accomplishments left him the most cruel man of his cruel time.

Question of the number of executions.

Some liberty of teaching allowed.

Inconsistencies of the age.

¹ Adam of Usk (p. 3.), in drawing a parallel between the Israelites who worshipped the golden calf, and the Lollards, has some words which might lead to misapprehension; they must be read as follows, 'Unde in pluribus regni partibus et praecipue Londonia et Bristolia, velut Judaei ad montem Oreb propter vitulum conflatilem, mutuo in se revertentes, xxiii milium de suis miserabilem patientes casum merito doluerunt, Anglici inter se de fide antiqua et nova altercantes omni die sunt in puncto quasi mutuo ruinam et seditionem inferendi.' There is no statement of 23,000 executions, but of the danger of internal schism. The London chroniclers furnish a considerable number of executions under Henry V and Henry VI; thirty-eight persons were hanged and burned after Oldcastle's rising in 1414; in 1415 were burned John Claydon and Richard Turmyng; Gregory, p. 108; in 1417 Oldcastle; in 1422 William Taylor, priest, p. 149; in 1430 Richard Hunden, p. 171; in 1431 Thomas Bagley, p. 171; Jack Sharp and five others were hanged, p. 172; in 1438 John Gardiner was burned, p. 181; in 1440 Richard Wych and his servant, p. 183; in 1466 William Balowe was burned, p. 233; in 1467 four persons were hanged for sacrilege, p. 235. Foxe adds a few more names; Abraham, White, and Waddon, 1428-1431 (vol. iii. p. 587); John Goose in 1473, p. 755. There were many prosecutions, as may be seen in the Concilia as well as in Foxe, but in the vast majority of cases they ended in penance and recantation.

In the church the gentle and munificent wisdom of men like Chichele and Waynflete had to yield the first place in power to the politic skill and the unscrupulous partisanship of men like Bourchier, who persecuted the assailants of truths which had little or no moral influence upon the persecutor.

405. The social importance of the clergy in England during the middle ages rested on a wider basis than was afforded by their constitutional position. The clergy, as a body, were very rich; the proportion of direct taxation born by them amounted to nearly a third of the whole direct taxation of the nation; they possessed in the constitution of parliament and convocation a great amount of political power, a majority in the house of lords, a recognised organisation as an estate of parliament, and two taxing and legislating assemblies in the provincial convocations; they had on their great estates jurisdictions and franchises equal to those of the great nobles, and in the spiritual courts a whole system of judicature parallel to the temporal judicature but more inquisitorial, more deeply penetrating, and taking cognisance of every act and every relation of men's lives. They had great immunities also, and a corporate cohesion which gave strength and dignity to the meanest member of the class.

Political and social weight of the clergy.

Great numbers of persons ordained.

One result of these advantages was the existence of an exceedingly large number of clergymen, or men in holy orders. The lists of persons ordained during the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries are still extant in the registers of the bishops; the ordinations were held at least four times a year, and the number admitted on each occasion was rarely below a hundred. In 1370, bishop Courtenay, acting for the bishop of Exeter, ordained at Tiverton 374 persons; 163 had the first tonsure, 120 were ordained acolytes, thirty subdeacons, thirty-one deacons, and thirty priests¹. The ordination lists of the bishops

¹ Maskell, Mon. Rit. iii. Thomas, in the Survey of Worcester, gives the following numbers:—

	Acolytes.	Subdeacons.	Deacons.	Priests.	Total.
At Cirencester, June 1, 1314	105	140	133	85	463
Worcester, Dec. 21, 1314	50	115	136	109	310
Worcester, Dec. 22, 1319		43	96	91	230
Ombersley, Dec. 18, 1322	120	102	50	60	332

of Durham¹ furnish numbers smaller than these, but still so large as to make it a difficult question how so large a body of candidates for preferment could be provided for. To these lists the mendicant orders contribute but a small percentage; the persons who supplied the place of non-resident pluralists, or who acted under the incumbents as parish priests, were not numerous, the whole number of parish churches being not much over 8000; a large proportion of candidates were ordained on the title of chaplaincies, or rather on the proof that they were entitled to small pensions from private persons who thus qualified them for a position in which, by saying masses for the dead, they could eke out a subsistence². The persons so ordained were the stipendiary priests, who in the reign of Henry IV were so numerous that a poll tax of six and eightpence upon them formed an important branch of the revenue³. They were not represented in convocation, but they had every clerical immunity, and they brought a clerical interest into every family. A slight acquaintance with mediæval wills is enough to show how large a proportion of those who were in such circumstances as made it necessary for them to make a will, had sons or near kinsmen in orders. Sometimes they were friars; more generally, in the yeoman class, chantry priests; the country knights had kinsmen in their livings and among the Large privileged class.

Drawn from all ranks of society.

	Acolytes.	Subdeacons.	Deacons.	Priests.	Total.
Tewkesbury, Trinity, 1329	218	47	79	62	406
Campden, Trinity, 1331	221	100	47	51	419
Ombersley, June 2, 1335	251	115	133	22	521
Worcester, April 9, 1337	391	180	154	124	849
Tewkesbury, June 6, 1338	204	141	117	149	613.
¹ In the Registrum Palatinum, vol. iii. One year's ordinations taken at random may suffice:—
In 1341 at Pentecost	86	26	31	16	159
in September	16	10	18	19	63
in December	11	14	5	8	38.

² Thus 'Willelmus de Blenkow, ad titulum V. Marcarum de Johanne Forestario, de quo reputat se contentum;' Reg. Pal. iii. 137. The mischiefs arising from this system are forcibly stated by archbishop Islip; 'curas animarum genere negligunt, et onera curatorum caritate mutua supportare; quin immo eis penitus derelictis ad celebranda annualia et ad alia pecuniaria se conferunt obsequia,' &c. Wilkins, Conc. iii. 1; cf. pp. 50, 51, 213. The same archbishop fixed a maximum amount of stipend; ib. p. 135.

³ See above, p. 48.

monks of the great monasteries; the great nobles and the king's ministers looked on the bishoprics as the provision for their clerical sons. The villein class, notwithstanding legal and canonical hindrances, aspired to holy orders as one of the avenues to liberty¹. And this great diffusion of interest must be set against all general statements of the unpopularity of the clergy in the later middle ages. There were just complaints of unfair distribution of patronage, and of concentration of great endowments in few hands; but against class jealousy there was this strong safeguard: every tradesman or yeoman might live to see his son promoted to a position of wealth and power.

Classes from which the bishops were taken.

Officials promoted.

Scholars promoted.

Royal and noble prelates.

Some important generalisations may be drawn from a study of the episcopal lists from the time of the Conquest downwards: under the Norman kings the sees were generally occupied by men of Norman birth, either such as were advanced by Lanfranc on the ground of learning and piety, or such as combined with distinguished birth that gift of organisation which belonged to the Norman feudalist; to one class belonged Lanfranc himself and Anselm, to the other Osmund of Salisbury, who was a Norman baron but also the reformer of the medieval liturgy, and William Giffard the minister of Henry I. As the ministerial system advanced, the high places of the church were made the rewards of official service, and official servants, having no great patrimonies, cultivated the cathedral foundations as a provision for their families; hence arose the clerical caste which was so strong under Henry I and Stephen. Here and there we find a scholar like Robert of Melun, or Gilbert the Universal. Already the great nobles showed their appreciation of the wealth of the Church; Everard bishop of Norwich was of the house of Montgomery, Henry of Winchester was a grandson of the Conqueror, and the pious Roger of Worcester, the friend of Becket,

¹ The restriction on the liberty of unfree persons to be ordained dates from very early times, and was intended no doubt to prevent persons seeking ordination from a worldly motive as well as to save the rights of the master over his dependents. In the Apostolic Canons it is based on the latter reason. See Maskell, Mon. Rit. iii. pp. xcvii, xcvi; and above, vol. ii. p. 507, vol. i. p. 467; Deer. p. 1. dist. 54; Greg. IX, lib. i. tit. 18.

was a son of Earl Robert of Gloucester. Hugh de Puiset, bishop of Durham, and S. William, archbishop of York, were nephews of Stephen. Nor was the example lost upon the later kings or barons : Henry II gave the archbishopric of York to his son ; Henry III obtained Canterbury for his wife's uncle, and Winchester for his own half-brother ; Fulk Basset, bishop of London, was a baron both temporal and spiritual. The noble Cantilupes served their generation as bishops of Hereford and Worcester. The next age saw the culmination of the power of the mendicant orders ; Kilwardby, Peckham, and Bradwardine sat at Canterbury ; another avenue to power was thus open to men of humble birth, and when the short-lived popularity of the friars was over, the avenue was not closed. Wykeham, Chichele, and Waynflete rose by other means, services done in subordinate office, but they amply justified the system by which they rose, in the great collegiate foundations by which they hoped to raise the class from which they sprang. Side by side with them are found more and more men of noble names, Beaumont, Berkeley, Grandison, Charlton, Despenser, Courtenay, Stafford, Beaufort, Neville, Beauchamp, and Bourchier, taking a large share, but not the whole, of the great dignities. Last, a Wydville rises under Edward IV ; and then under Henry VII a change takes place ; new men are advanced more frequently, and meritorious service again becomes the chief title to promotion ; the humiliation of the baronage has perhaps left few noble men capable of such advancement. In this, as in some other points, medieval life was a race for wealth ; the poor bishoprics were left to the friars ; scarcely any great man took a Welsh see except as a stepping-stone to something better. Still it may fairly be said that during the latter centuries a poor and humble origin was no bar to great preferment ; and the meanest stipendiary priest was not only a spiritual person, but a member of an order to which the greatest families of the land, and even the royal house itself, thought it no humiliation to contribute sons and brothers.

Prelates
from the mendicant orders.

Preponderance of noble names.

Meritorious service a title to promotion.

General diffusion of clerical interest.

Against this diffusion of influence and interest has to be set the fact, that it was only on points of the most general and

Internal divisions of the clerical body.

universal application that a body so widely spread, and so variously composed, could be brought to act together. Against any direct interference from the temporal power, unauthorised taxation or restrictive legislation, the clergy might act as a body; but within the sphere of ecclesiastical politics, and within the sphere of temporal politics, they were as much liable to division as were the baronage or the commons. The seculars hated the regulars; the monks detested the friars; the Dominicans and Franciscans regarded one another as heretics; the Cistercians and the Cluniacs were jealous rivals: matters of ritual, of doctrine, of church policy—the claims of poverty and chastity, the rights and wrongs of endowments—the merits of rival popes, or of pope and council—licenced and unlicenced preaching, licenced and unlicenced confession and direction—were fought out under the several standards of order and profession. And not less in the politics of the kingdom. As in early days the regulars sustained Becket and the seculars supported Henry II, under John the clergy were divided between the king and the bishops; the Franciscans of the thirteenth century were allied with Grosseteste and Simon de Montfort; under Edward III they followed Ockham and Marsilius, and linked Grosseteste with Wycliffe; under Henry IV they furnished martyrs in the cause of restoration. In the great social rising of 1381 clergy as well as laymen were implicated; secular priests as well as friars died for Richard II; and later on the whole body of the clergy was arrayed for or against one of the rival houses. It was well that it was so, and that the welfare of the whole English church was not staked on the victory of a faction or a policy, even though the faction may have been legally or the policy morally the best. The clergy could no longer, as one united estate, mediate with authority between parties, but they might, and probably did, help on reconciliation where reconciliation was possible, and somewhat humanise the struggle when the struggle must be fought out.

Political partisanship among the clergy.

406. The existence of a clerical element in every class of society, and in so large proportion, must in some respects have been a great social benefit. Every one admitted even to minor orders must have been able to read and write; and for the sub-deaconate and higher grades a knowledge of the New Testament, or, at the very least, of the Gospels and Epistles in the Missal, was requisite¹. This was tested by careful examination in grammar and ritual, at every step; even a bishop elect might be rejected by the archbishop for literary deficiency²; and the bishop who wittingly ordained an ignorant person was deemed guilty of deadly sin. The great obscurity which hangs over the early history of the universities makes it impossible to guess how large a portion of the clergy had received their education there; but towards the close of the period the foundation of colleges connected with particular counties and monasteries must have carried some elements of higher education into the remotest districts; the monastic and other schools placed some modicum of learning within reach of all. The rapid diffusion of Lollard tracts is itself a proof that many men could be found to read them; in every manor was found some one who could write and keep accounts in Latin; and it was rather the scarcity and cost of books, than the inability to read, that caused the prevalent ignorance of the later middle ages. Some germs of intellectual culture were spread everywhere, and, although perhaps it would still be as easy to find a clerk who could not write as a layman who could, it is a mistake to regard even so dark a period as the fifteenth century as an age of dense ignorance. In all classes above the Diffusion of elementary education resulting from the widespread clerical body.

Colleges and schools.

Knowledge of Latin common.

¹ The rules on the subject of examination were very strict; see Maskell, Mon. Rit. iii. xcvi. sq.

² Thus in 1229 Walter, elect of Canterbury, was rejected by the pope for failing in his examination; M. Paris, iii. 170. There are some instances in which this was overruled. Lewis Beaumont of Durham could scarcely read the hard words in his profession of obedience; see vol. ii. p. 332; Robert Stretton elect of Coventry was rejected by archbishop Islip but forced by the king and the pope into his see; he could not read his profession, and it was read for him; Islip in disgust declined to take part in the consecration; Ang. Sac. i. 44, 449. Robert Orford elect of Ely was rejected by Winchelsey 'ob minus sufficientem literaturam;' on application to the pope he convinced him that he had not failed in his examination but had answered logically not theologically; ib. p. 641. Giraldus Cambrensis has some amusing stories about the bad Latin of the bishops of his time; but on the whole the cases of proved incompetence are very few.

Active intercourse with foreign nations.

lowest, and especially in the clerical class, men travelled both in England and abroad more than they did after the Reformation had suspended religious intercommunion and destroyed the usefulness of ecclesiastical Latin as a means of communication. For clerks, if not for laymen also, every monastery was a hostelry, and the frequent intercourse with the papal court had the effect of opening the clerical mind to wider interests.

Moral influence questionable.

It would have been well if the moral and spiritual influence of the clerical order had been equally good; but, whilst it is necessary to guard against exaggerated and one-sided statements upon these points, it cannot be denied that the proved abuses of the class go far to counterbalance any hypothetical advantages ascribed to its influence. The majority of the persons ordained had neither cure of souls nor duty of preaching; their spiritual work was simply to say masses for the dead; they were not drawn on by the necessities of self-culture either to deeper study of divine truth or to the lessons which are derived from the obligation to instruct others; and they lay under no responsibility as bound to sympathise with and guide the weak. The moral drawback on their usefulness was even more important, because it affected the whole class and not a mere majority. By the necessity of celibacy they were cut off from the interests of domestic life, relieved from the obligations to labour for wives and families of their own, and thus left at leisure for mischief of many sorts. Every town contained thus a number of idle men, whose religious duties filled but a small portion of their time, who had no secular responsibilities, and whose standard of moral conduct was formed upon a very low ideal. The history of clerical celibacy, in England as elsewhere, is indeed tender ground; the benefits which it is supposed to secure are the personal purity of the individual, his separation from secular ways and interests, and his entire devotion to the work of God and the church. But the results, as legal and historical records show us, were very different. Instead of personal purity, there is a long story of licenced and unlicenced concubinage, and, appendant to it, much miscellaneous profligacy and a general low tone of morality in the very point that is supposed to be secured. Instead of separation from secular work is found, in the higher class of the clergy, entire devotion to the legal and political service of the country, and in the lower class idleness and poverty as the alternative. Instead of greater spirituality, there is greater frivolity. The abuses of monastic life, great as they may occasionally have been, sink into insignificance by the side of this evil, as an occasional crime tells against the moral condition of a nation far less fatally than the prevalence of a low morality. The records of the spiritual courts of the middle ages remain in such quantity and in such concord of testimony as to leave no doubt of the facts; among the laity as well as among the clergy, of the towns and clerical centres, there existed an amount of coarse vice which had no secrecy to screen it or prevent it from spreading. The higher classes of the clergy were free from any general faults of the kind; after the twelfth century, when many of the bishops were, if not married, at least the fathers of semi-legitimate families, the episcopal character for morality stands deservedly high; bishop Burnell, the great minister of Edward I, is perhaps an exception¹; but there is scarcely a case of avowed or proved immorality on record until we reach the very close of the middle ages, and there is no case of the deprivation of a bishop for any such cause. The great abbots were, with equally rare exceptions, men of high character. It is in the obscurity of the smaller monasteries and in the self-indulgent, unambitious, and ignorant ranks of the lowest clergy, that we find the vices which called in the former class for summary visitation and suppression, and in the latter for the exercise of that disciplinary jurisdiction which did so much to spread and perpetuate the evils which it was created to cure. For the spiritual courts, whilst they imposed spiritual penalties, recognised perfunctory purgations, and accepted pe-

Mischief arising from the number of half-employed clergy.

Evils resulting from clerical celibacy.

Good character of the higher clergy.

¹ Burnell is probably the bishop who had five sons, and against whom archbishop Peckham attempted a prosecution in 1279; Wilk. Conc. ii. 40. He was Peckham's personal rival, and one annalist who mentions his death in 1292 speaks of his 'consanguineas, ne dicam filias' and 'nepotibus suis seu filiis;' Ann. Dunstable, p. 373.

Abuses of the spiritual courts.

Their incapacity of reform.

Unwilling-ness to give up clerical privilege.

Vitality of these abuses.

cuniary fines, really secured the peccant clerk and the immoral layman alike from the due consequences of vice, such as either stricter discipline or a healthier public opinion would have been likely to impose. And in this, as in other particulars, the medieval church incurred a fearful responsibility. The evils against which she had to contend were beyond her power to overcome, yet she resisted interference from any other hand. The treatment of such moral evils as did not come within the contemplation of the common law was left to the church courts; the church courts became centres of corruption which archbishops, legates, and councils tried to reform and failed, choosing rather to acquiesce in the failure than to allow the intrusion of the secular power. The spiritual jurisdiction over the clergy was an engine which the courts altogether failed to manage, or so far failed as to render reformation of manners by such means absolutely hopeless: yet any interference of the temporal courts was resented and warded off until the evil was irremediable, because a clerk stripped of the reality of his immunities, but retaining all the odium with which they had invested him, would have no chance of justice in a lay court. Thus on a small stage was reproduced the result which the policy of the papacy brought about in the greater theatre of ecclesiastical politics. The practical assertion that, except by the court of Rome, there should be no reformation, was supplemented by an acknowledgment of the evils that were to be reformed, and of the incapacity of the court of Rome to cure them: there popes and councils toiled in vain; they could bear neither the evils of the age nor their remedies. Strange to say, some part of the mischief of the spiritual jurisdiction survived the Reformation itself, and enlarged its scope as well as strengthened its operation by the close temporary alliance between the church and the crown. To this the English church owes the vexatious procedure of the ecclesiastical tribunals and the consequent reaction which gave so much strength to Puritanism: nay Puritanism was itself leavened with the same influences, and instead of struggling with the evils of the system which it attacked, availed itself of the same weapons, met a like failure, and yielded to a like reaction. But on this point, as has been said before, it is useless to dogmatise; and no mere theory, however consistent and perfect in itself, can either insure its own realisation or prove itself applicable to different ages and stages of growth.

CHAPTER XX.

PARLIAMENTARY ANTIQUITIES.

407. Parliamentary usages, definite or obscure.—408. Plan of the chapter.—409. Choice of the day for parliament.—410. Annual parliaments.—411. Length of notice before holding parliament.—412. Choice of the place of session.—413. The Palace of Westminster.—414. Parliaments out of London.—415. Share of the council in calling a parliament.—416. Issue and form of writs.—417. Writs of summons to the lords.—418. Writs of the justices.—419. Writs to the Sheriffs for elections.—420. County elections.—421. Return on indenture.—422. Borough elections.—423. Contested and disputed elections.—424. Manucaption and expenses.—425. Meeting of parliament and opening of the session.—426. Separation of the houses.—427. House of Lords.—428. Ranks of the peerage.—429. Number of lords temporal.—430. Number of lords spiritual.—431. Justices in the House of Lords.—432. Clerical proctors.—433. Numbers and distribution of seats in the House of Commons.—434. Clerks.—435. The Speaker of the Commons.—436. Business laid before the houses by the king.—437. Supply and account.—438. Form of the grant.—439. Proceeding in legislation.—440. The Common petitions.—441. Form of statutes.—442. Details of procedure.—443. Sir Thomas Smith's description of a session.—444. Judicial power of the Lords.—445. Prorogation.—446. Dissolution.—447. Writ of expenses.—448. Distinctions of right and privilege.—449. Proxies of the Lords.—450. Right of protest.—451. Freedom of debate.—452. Freedom from arrest.—453. Privileges of peerage.

Antiquity
of parliamentary customs.

407. THE rules and forms of parliamentary procedure had, before the close of the middle ages, begun to acquire that permanence and fixedness of character which in the eyes of later generations has risen into the sanctity of law. Of these rules and forms some are very ancient, and have preserved to the present day the exact shape in which they appear in our earliest parliamentary records ; others are less easily discovered in the medieval chronicles and rolls, and owe their reputation for antiquity to the fact that, when they make their appearance in later records, they have already assumed the prescriptive dignity of immemorial custom. To the former class for instance belong the formulæ of the legislative machinery, the writs for assembling parliament, the methods of assent and dissent, the enacting words of statutes, the brief sentence of royal acceptance or rejection ; to the latter class belong the methods of proceeding which are less capable of being reduced to written record ; the machinery of initiation and discussion, of committees and reports ; the process by which a Bill passes through successive stages before it becomes an Act, the more minute rules of debate, and the more definite elaboration of points of privilege. Both classes of forms are subject to a certain sort of expansion ; but the former seems to have reached its full growth before any great development of the latter can be distinctly traced. And this difference is not to be explained on the theory that, as time went on, freedom of debate and activity of discussion compelled the use of new rules and the formation of a customary code, while the more mechanical part of the old system was found to answer all purposes as well as ever. There can be little question that debates were as fierce and as tedious in the minority of Henry VI as in the troublous days of Charles I. No doubt the public interest in politics, fostered by improved education and stimulated by religious partisanship, gave to the latter a wider influence and made a more distinct impression on national memory. As early as the seventeenth century the speeches of parliamentary orators were addressed to the nation at large ; although the publication of the debates was still in the distant future. But the fact that the rule and method of debate does, when it first appears, wear the habit of custom, the constant appeal to precedent and prescription, the whole history and theory of privilege, seem to show that the silence of earlier record is not to be interpreted as negation. A very faint idea of parliamentary activity would be formed from the isolated study of the journals of either house.

Difference in their history.

Records clear.

Usages obscure.

Reason for this obscurity.

Want of records as to the details of usage.

rolls of parliament, in like manner, furnish scarcely a skeleton of the proceedings of the earlier sessions. Published speeches, the diaries of clerks and members, unauthorised and authorised reports of debate, enable us to realise, in the case of the later parliaments, almost all that is historically important. For the medieval period we have no such helps; and for some particular parts of it we have no light at all, or what is more puzzling still, cross lights and discordant and contradictory authorities.

Plan of this chapter.

408. In the present chapter our design is to collect such particulars as may help to complete our idea of the medieval parliament in its formal aspect, to describe the method of summoning, choosing, and assembling the members; to trace, as far as we can, the process of initiation, discussion, and enactment, and to mark the points up to which the theory of privilege had grown at the close of our period. It will be no part of our plan to venture into the more dangerous regions of modern procedure; but where in the earlier forms the germs of such later developments are discoverable it will be sufficient to indicate them. In pursuance of this plan our first step is to recapitulate the points of interest involved in the determination of the time, place, and forms of summons, for parliament; the next step is to describe the process of election of the elected members; we can then proceed to the consideration of the session itself, the arrangement of the houses, their transaction of business, intercourse, prorogation and dissolution; and close the survey with a brief notice of the history of privilege.

Choice of the day for the meeting of parliament.

409. The determination of the time at which the parliament was to be held rested primarily with the king; but the choice of the particular day or season of the year, as well as the frequency or infrequency of sessions, and the use of adjournment or prorogation, were variously decided according to the character which the assembly possessed at the several stages of its growth. The witenagemots of the Anglo-Saxon kings, if we may draw a general conclusion from the scanty indications of particular charters, were mostly held on the great festivals of the church or at the end of harvest¹; the great councils of the Norman kings generally, although not invariably, coincided with the crown-wearing days at Christmas, Easter, and Whitsuntide¹; and, as long as the national council retained as its most prominent feature the character of a court of justice, so long it must have been almost necessary that it should meet on fixed days of the year. That character it retained until the representation of the commons came to be recognised as an indispensable requisite for a legal parliament, and the name of parliament came to be finally restricted to the assembly of the three estates. This date can scarcely be placed earlier than the beginning of the reign of Edward III, when the distinction was completely drawn between a Great Council, however summoned and however constituted, and the regular parliament. But even after this date, although the administration of justice had ceased to form the most important part of the public business, and the granting of supplies, presentation of petitions, and discussions of national policy, were matters which required punctuality and certainty much less than the administration of justice, the influence of custom, and the same reasons of convenience which had originally assigned days and seasons for legal proceedings, continued to affect the choice of a day for parliament. Under Henry II and his successors down to Henry III, the national councils met as well on the great festivals as on the terminal days of the law courts; but irregularly and not exclusively on those days. The provisional government of 1258 fixed three days in the year, which have a less distinct reference to these points of time, the octave of Michaelmas, October 6 the morrow of Candlemas, February 3, and the 1st of June, three weeks before the feast of S. John the Baptist at Midsummer²: by this expedient the awkwardness of depending on the moveable feasts was avoided. That arrangement however was short-lived. Edward I, during the early part of his reign, seems to have followed the terminal days of the courts of law.

¹ Vol. i. p. 138; notes 1, 2, 3.

Coincidence of legal and parliamentary terms.

These terminal days had their historical origin in the distinction made by the Roman lawyers between dies fasti and

¹ Vol. i. p. 399.

² See above, vol. ii. p. 78.

The law terms and vacations.

dies nefasti, the former being the days on which the courts and comitia might be held, the dies nefasti those on which they were forbidden. After the adoption of Christianity the more solemn seasons of the church took the place of the old dies nefasti, and were set apart from legal work by the civil and canon law¹. The distinction is noted in the compilation called the Laws of Edward the Confessor, which describes the custom of England as it existed under the justiciar Glanvill; according to this rule the peace of God and the church was to be observed from the beginning of Advent to the octave of the Epiphany, from Septuagesima to the octave of Easter, and from the Ascension to the octave of Pentecost, besides Sundays and holy days². Under these designations the later term days are denoted; the octave of Epiphany is the feast of S. Hilary, from which the Hilary or Lent term begins; and the octaves of Easter and Whitsuntide have the same relation to the Easter and Trinity terms. The ending of the third and the beginning of the fourth term depended on the harvest; an operation so important that not only the schools and the law courts were closed during its continuance, but even civil war was suspended by common consent of the parties, and the parliament itself was prorogued or adjourned during the vacation. The exact days for beginning and ending business varied in the courts and universities, and were from time to time altered by legislation. For parliamentary business the fourth or Michaelmas term may be considered to have begun on the quindene of S. Michael, October 13th, the feast of the translation of S. Edward the Confessor, a memorable and critical day on more than one occasion of English history³.

Custom or convenience seems in quiet times to have prescribed these days as fitting days for parliaments; and no doubt the lawyers, who formed an important element in the house of commons, found the coincidence of the parliamentary and legal days of business very opportune for their own interests; the barons and bishops who had attended the court on the great festivals may also have found it convenient to remain in town after the conclusion of the festivities, instead of making an additional journey. Anyhow, in the great majority of cases, throughout the middle ages, the day of parliamentary summons is fixed with reference to the beginning of the Law Terms. In less quiet times it was impossible to observe such a rule; and, after long prorogations and less frequent elections had become usual, the old days were less regarded. But the importance of the autumnal vacation always made itself felt; Edward III in 1352 summoned only half the house of commons, that harvest might not be neglected¹; and the same cause, which in 1215 stayed the outbreak of war until the corn was got in, led to the prorogation of parliaments under Henry VI and Edward IV from July to November, the harvest apparently falling later in the year as time went on and tillage increased.

¹ See Reliquiae Spelmannianae, pp. 69 sq.; Nicolas, Chronology of History, p. 383.

² LL. Edw. Conf. § 2; cf. Canute, Eccl. § 17; Ethelred, v. § 19, vi. § 25.

³ The Translation of S. Edward was performed on the 13th of October, 1163, by Henry II, archbishop Thomas Becket, and a large number of bishops and barons; Surius, AA. SS. tom. i, Jan. 5. fo. 45; and a second time in 1269 on the same day, by Henry III and a full assembly of the estates; see above, vol. ii. p. 101.

410. As the political functions of the national parliament became more prominently important than the judicial work of the king in his full council, it became a point of public security that regular and fairly frequent parliaments should be held; and the demand for annual parliaments accordingly emerges very soon after the final admission of representatives of the commons. We have in a former chapter noted the political bearing and history of this demand². The ordinances of 1311 and acts of parliament in 1330 and 1362 established the rule that parliaments should be held annually and oftener if it were found necessary. The greatest number of sessions held in one year was four, in the year 1328³. As each session involved a fresh election, and as the wages of the members formed a heavy item in local taxation, it is no wonder that, except in times of political excitement, even the annual parliaments became some-of the parliamentary and law terms.

Coincidence

Annual parliaments.

Ordered by law.

¹ See above, vol. ii. p. 428; Lords' Report, iv. 593.

² See above, vol. ii. § 296.

³ Vol. ii. p. 390.

Neglect of the rule.

what burdensome. Before the close of the fourteenth century the law was frequently transgressed, and two or three years passed without a session. There was no parliament held in 1364, 1367, 1370, or between 1373 and 1376 : under Richard II the years 1387, 1389, 1392 and 1396, are marked by a suspension of the national action ; under Henry IV there was no parliament between 1407 and 1410 ; under Henry V there was at least one session each year. Under the Lancastrian kings the sessions had become so much longer than in earlier times that an intermission of a year was often more or less welcome ; but the longer intervals begin contemporaneously with the family troubles ; no parliament was held in 1440 or 1441, in 1443 or 1444 ; the parliament called in February 1445 sat by adjournment until April 1446 ; there was no session in 1448, 1452, 1457 or 1458. Edward IV held only six parliaments, or appealed to the country only six times, during a reign of two and twenty years.

Long sessions and prorogations.

Forty days' notice of the meeting of
parliament.

411. The great charter had prescribed for the holding of the commune consilium a summons, to be issued at least forty days before the day of meeting. This rule was regarded as binding in the reign of Elizabeth¹, and was observed until the union with Scotland ; but not without occasional exceptions. The famous parliament of Simon de Montfort was called at twenty-seven days' notice² ; the almost equally famous parliament of 1294 at thirty-five³, which is the modern rule ; in most other cases under Edward I and Edward II the notices are much longer. The summons for the parliament of 1327, in which Edward II was deposed, was issued thirty-five days before the meeting⁴ ; in 1330 Edward III apologised for abridging the notice to thirty-one days ; business was pressing and he had taken the advice of the lords⁵ ; in 1352 the council, to which only one knight of each shire was summoned, was

Few exceptions to the rule.

¹ Sir T. Smith, Commonwealth ; see below, § 443.

² Dec. 24 for Jan. 20 ; Select Charters, p. 415 ; Lords' Report, iv. 34.

³ Oct. 8 for Nov. 12 ; Lords' Report, iv. 60.

⁴ Above, vol. ii. p. 378.

⁵ Lords' Report, i. 492 ; the king apologised for the short notice in the writ, stating that he acted with the assent of the prelates and magnates, and that the act should not be a precedent to the damage of any.

called only twenty-eight days beforehand¹. Richard II invariably gave long notices; the parliament in which he was deposed was summoned exactly forty days before his resignation, and the first parliament of his successor, for which only seven days' warning was given, consisted of the same members that were summoned for the week before. These seem to be the only important variations from the rule of Magna Carta; the notices vary generally rather in excess than defect, but in many cases the rule is exactly observed².

412. A more ancient and uniform prescription than that which affected the time for holding parliament regulated the choice of the place of session. Westminster was from the days of Edward the Confessor the recognised home of the great council of the nation as well as of the king. How this came about, history does not record; it is possible that the mere accident of the existence of the royal palace on the bank of the Thames led to the foundation of the abbey, or that the propinquity of the abbey led to the choice of the place for a palace; equal obscurity covers the origin of both. It is possible that under the new name of Westminster were hidden some of the traditions of the old English places of councils, of Chelsea or even of the lost Clovesho. But when the palace and the abbey had grown up together, when Canute had lived in the palace and his son Harold had been buried in the abbey, and when the life and death of the Confessor had invested the two with almost equal sanctity, the abbey church became the scene of the royal coronation, and the palace the centre of all the work of government. The crown, the grave, the palace, the festival, the laws of king Edward, all illustrate the perpetuity of a national sentiment typifying the continuity of the national life. There the Conqueror kept his summer courts, and William Rufus contemplated the building of a house of which the great parliaments.

Place of

The palace of Westminster.

Memories of Edward the Confessor.

Under the Norman
kings.

¹ Lords' Report, iv. 593.

² After the union with Scotland the notice was given fifty days beforehand; by the 15 Vict. c. 23, this period has been reduced to thirty-five days after the proclamation appointing a time for the first meeting of parliament; May, Treatise on the Law, Proceedings and Usage of Parliament, p. 44.

Westminster becomes the usual place for parliaments.

hall which now survives should be only one of the bed-chambers¹. At Westminster Henry I held his councils², and Stephen is said to have founded the chapel of his patron saint³ within the palace. Although the courts continued to attend on the king, they like him rested, when they did rest, at Westminster; there was the certain place where, according to the great charter, the common pleas were to be held when they ceased to follow the king⁴; there the annual audits of the exchequer were already settled. Although Henry II held his more solemn councils in a more central place, and where there was more room for the camps of the barons to be collected round him, he frequently met both clergy and baronage there; the clergy in the abbey, the barons in the hall, found their proper council chamber. From the beginning of the reign of Henry III the custom seems to have acquired the sanctity of law; he rebuilt the abbey and added largely to the palace, and by his devotion to the memory of the Confessor professed himself, if he did not prove himself, the heir of the national tradition. So well established was the rule, that in the troubled times which followed the legislation of Oxford the king avoided Westminster, thinking himself safer at S. Paul's or in the Tower, and the barons refused to attend the king at the Tower according to his summons, insisting that they should meet at the customary place at Westminster and not elsewhere⁵. The next reign saw the whole of the administrative machinery of the government permanently settled in and around the palace; and thus from the very first introduction of representative members the national council had its regular home at Westminster. There, with a few casual exceptions, to be noticed hereafter, all the properly constituted parliaments of England have been held.

Westminster the seat of government.

Interest of the old parliament houses.

413. The ancient palace of Westminster, of which the most important parts, having survived until the fire of 1834 and the construction of the New Houses of Parliament, were destroyed in 1852, must have presented a very apt illustration of the

¹ Stow's London. ed. Strype, bk. vi. p. 47.

² Mon. Angl. vi. 1348.

³ Ann. Dunst. p. 217.

⁴ Flor. Wig. A.D. 1102.

⁵ Art. 17.

history of the Constitution which had grown up from its early simplicity to its full strength within those venerable walls¹. It was a curious congeries of towers, halls, churches, and chambers. As the administrative system of the country had been developed largely from the household economy of the king, the national palace had for its kernel the king's court, hall, chapel, and chamber. It had gathered in and incorporated other buildings that stood around it; successive generations had added new wings, built towers, and dug storehouses. As time went on, every apartment changed its destination: the chamber became a council room, the banquet hall a court of justice, the chapel a hall of deliberation; but the continuity of the historical building was complete, the changes were but signs of growth and of the strength that could outlive change. Almost every part of the palace had its historical hold on the great kings of the past. In the Painted Chamber Edward the Confessor had died; the little hall or White Hall was believed to be the newly-fashioned hall of his palace; the Great Hall, the grandest work of sovereign power, was begun by William Rufus and completed by Richard II. The chapel of S. Stephen was begun by Stephen, rebuilt by Edward I, and made by Edward III the most perfect example of the architecture of his time. The ancient Exchequer buildings stood east and west of the entrance of the Great Hall; the Star Chamber in the south-eastern corner of the court that extended in front of the Hall. The King's Bench was held at the south end of the Hall itself. The more important of the parliamentary buildings lay south and east of the Hall. To the south-east, and at right angles with the Hall, the church of S. Stephen ran down to the river: at right angles to the church, separated from the Great Hall by a vestibule, was the lesser or White Hall; south and east of the White Hall and parallel with S. Stephen's chapel was the Painted Chamber, or Chamber of S. Edward; and at right angles to it again was the king's Great Chamber, the White Chamber, or Chamber of the Parliament. Beyond this was the

Historical interest of Westminster.

Plan of the buildings.

¹ See Brayley and Britton, History of the Ancient Palace of Westminster, and Smith's Antiquities of Westminster.

The old houses of parliament.

Prince's Chamber¹, which reached to the limit of the palace buildings southwards, and looked on the river. Of these buildings the King's Chamber, or Parliament Chamber², was the House of Lords from very early times until the union with Ireland, when the peers removed into the lesser or White Hall, where they continued until the fire. The house of commons met occasionally in the Painted Chamber, but generally sat in the Chapter House or in the Refectory of the abbey, until the reign of Edward VI, when it was fixed in S. Stephen's chapel³. The Painted Chamber, until the accession of Henry VII, was used for the meeting of full parliament, and for the opening speech of the Chancellor; it was also the place of conference between the two houses. After the fire of 1834, during the building of the new houses, the house of lords sat in the Painted Chamber, and the house of commons in the White Hall or Court of Requests. It was a curious coincidence certainly that the destruction of the ancient fabric should follow so immediately upon the constitutional change wrought by the reform act, and scarcely less curious that the fire should have originated in the burning of the ancient Exchequer tallies, one of the most permanent relics of the primitive simplicity of administration⁴.

The abbey also used in time of parliament.

The work of parliament was not always carried on within the walls of the palace. The neighbouring abbey furnished occasionally both lodging and meeting-rooms for the estates. Of the monastic buildings the refectory, the infirmary, and the chapter-house, were, after the church itself, most signally marked by historical usage. The refectory was a frequent place of meeting for the barons under Henry III; there in 1244 they bearded the king and the pope; and at a later period

¹ Probably the small chamber south of the White Chamber (Foedera, ii. 1122), where Stratford in 1340 received the Great Seal. The 'Prince' must have been Edward the Black Prince, who after the parliament of 1371 called the burghers into his own chamber, and obtained a grant of tunnage and poundage from them. It was afterwards the 'Robing Room.'

² Brayley and Britton, p. 401: the old house of lords or chamber of parliament, and the prince's chamber, were pulled down in 1823; ibid. p. 421.

³ In 1548; Brayley and Britton, p. 361.

⁴ The tallies had been in use until 1826; Brayley, &c. p. 425.

the commons frequently sat there. The infirmary or chapel of S. Katharine was at one time the regular place of session for the bishops¹. In the chapter-house, in 1257, Henry III confessed his debt to the pope; the parliament of Simon de Montfort assembled there², and it afterwards came to be regarded as the 'ancient and accustomed house' of the commons. The proper home of convocation was in the chapter-house of S. Paul's³. On one or two occasions, when the condition of the palace or other reasons compelled it, the parliament was held at Blackfriars. This was the case in 1311, when the Ordinances were published, and likewise for a few days in 1449. Richard II held his revolutionary parliament of 1397 in a great wooden building erected in the court before Westminster Hall⁴. Almost every exception to the rule has some historical significance.

Occasional sessions at Blackfriars.

414. Most of these exceptions were owing to circumstances, sanitary or political, which made it necessary or advisable to summon the estates to some place distant from London. Not to multiply instances, it may suffice to mention the cases, occurring after the incorporation of the commons, in which the parliaments met away from Westminster, and such only as concern true and full parliaments from 1295 onwards. Far the largest number of these exceptional sessions were held at York during the long struggle with the Scots, when the presence of the king and barons was imperatively required in the north. Edward I in 1298; Edward II in 1314, 1318, 1319, and 1322; Edward III twice in 1328, in 1332, 1333, 1334 and 1335, held sessions at York⁵. In 1464 Edward IV summoned the estates to the same place: the great hall of the archbishop's palace was the scene of the short session⁶. Next in point of Occasions on which parliaments were held at a distance from London.

At York,

¹ M. Paris, iv. 365. They met in the chapel of S. John the Evangelist; but the chapel of S. Katharine was the place where consecrations were most frequently performed.

² Liber de Antiquis Legibus, p. 71.

³ The Upper house occasionally sat in the Lady Chapel, and the Lower in the lower chamber of the chapter-house, see Wilkins, Conc. iii. 284.

⁴ Annales Ricardi, p. 209; Brayley, p. 283.

⁵ Vol. ii. pp. 155, 354, 356, 361, 369, 371, 390, 395, 396.

⁶ Rot. Parl. v. 499.

Northampton, and Lincoln.

Parliaments
at Winchester,S. Ed-mund's,

Leicester,

Coventry,

Reading,

distinction to York come Northampton and Lincoln, at each of which four parliaments have sat. The central position of Northampton had made it a favourite council ground with Henry II; Edward II held his first parliament there in 1307; Edward III followed the example in 1328 and 1338; and in 1380 the parliament which voted the famous poll tax met at the same place¹; the lords sat in a great chamber, the commons in the new dormitory of the priory of S. Andrew². The four parliaments of Lincoln belong to the years 1301, 1316, and 1327³; the first session of 1316 was opened in the hall of the deanery, and the lords sat in the chapter-house of the cathedral and at the convent of the Carmelites⁴. Three parliaments were held at Winchester, one in 1330, when Edmund of Woodstock was beheaded, one in 1393, and a third in 1449, when the plague was at Westminster. Besides these a supplementary great council was held at Winchester in 1371⁵. Bury S. Edmund's witnessed two famous sessions, one in 1296, when archbishop Winchelsey produced the bull clericis laicos; the other in 1447 marked by the death of duke Humfrey; the parliament was opened in the refectory of the abbey⁶. Leicester saw three parliaments, one under Henry V in 1414, when the lords sat in the great hall of the Grey Friars, and the commons in the infirmary of the same convent: another session was held there in 1426, 'the parliament of bats,' when the lords sat in the great hall of the castle, and the commons in a lower chamber; a third session was held by prorogation in 1450⁷. At Coventry in 1404 the unlearned parliament sat in the great chamber of the prior's house; and in 1459, in the chapter-house, the Lancastrian party attainted the duke of York⁸. Reading had two sessions, one in 1453, when Henry VI was insane, the other in 1467, when the plague was raging: on the first occasion the refectory was used, on the second a great chamber in the abbey¹. There were two parliaments at Salisbury, one in 1328 and one in 1384; the latter in the great hall of the bishop's palace². Gloucester also was the seat of parliament in 1378, when John of Gaunt feared to meet the Londoners, and in 1407; in 1378 the lords sat in the great hall of the abbey, the commons in the chapter-house; in 1407 the commons occupied the refectory³. Carlisle, Nottingham, Cambridge, and Shrewsbury, each saw one session; Carlisle witnessed the famous parliament of 1307; at Nottingham in 1336 Edward III obtained supplies for beginning the French war; the commission of government in 1388 held a legislative session at Cambridge⁴, and at Shrewsbury in 1398 Richard II carried into execution his scheme of absolute government. The inference from this long list is that the liberties of England were safest at Westminster.

¹ See above, vol. ii. pp. 330, 390, 398, 470.² Rot. Parl. iii. 88.³ See above, vol. ii. pp. 167, 355, 388.⁴ Rot. Parl. i. 350.⁵ See above, vol. ii. pp. 391, 507, 443; vol. iii. p. 147.⁶ See above, vol. ii. p. 136; iii. p. 140; Rot. Parl. v. 128.⁷ See above, pp. 83, 106, 154; Rot. Parl. iv. 15, 16, 295; v. 192.⁸ See above, pp. 47, 184; Rot. Parl. iii. 545; v. 345.

415. Within the prescriptive or customary limits the determination of the time and place for holding parliaments was left to the king himself; the constitutional law being amply satisfied by an annual session. As the greater development of the executive functions of the royal council agrees in point of time with the recognised development of the representative system, the choice of time and place as well as the preparation of financial and legal agenda was almost from the first a part of the business of the council. The order for affixing the great seal to the writs of summons was given by sign manual or writ of privy seal to the clerk of the crown in chancery who issued the writs. The advice of the council is specified in the writ of summons from the forty-sixth year of Edward III⁵. Until the

The choice of the day of meeting determined by the king in council.

¹ See above, pp. 168, 210; Rot. Parl. v. 227, 619.

² See above, vol. ii. pp. 390, 488; Rot. Parl. iii. 166.

³ See above, vol. ii. p. 467; iii. 61; Rot. Parl. iii. 32, 608.

⁴ The Cambridge parliament is said to have been held at Barnwell, where the king lodged; Cooper, Annals of Cambridge, i. 135. The parliament of 1447 which met at S. Edmund's was in the first instance summoned to Cambridge.

⁵ 'Quia de avisamento consilii nostri,' &c.; Coke, 4 Inst. p. 4; Lords' Report, iv. 653. The earlier writs begin generally 'Quia super diversis et arduis negotiis,' &c.; ib. p. 318, &c. The notes 'per breve de privato sigillo,' ib. pp. 64, 205, &c.; or 'per ipsum regem et consilium,' pp. 397, 416, &c., often appear in the margin of the writ. 'Per ipsum regem' means that the writ is sealed by the king's sign manual or order under

Preliminary great councils.

Preliminary privy councils.

The day fixed in a preceding parliament.

presence of the commons had come to be recognised as an integral part of parliament, the baronial council was often summoned alone, and, when the demand for money arose, the commons were called in and a parliament summoned by the regular writs. Accordingly, during the reign of Edward II, we may, in many cases, by comparing the date of the baronial summons to council with the date of the subsequent summons to parliament, infer that the day of parliament was fixed in the meeting of the barons¹. And this practice no doubt prevailed down to the days of the Lancastrian kings; for the French war of Henry V was considered in a great council of notables, lords and others, before it was discussed in parliament². In 1386 a great council of 'seigneurs et autres sages,' held at Oxford, deliberated on the expediency of the king going to war, and by advice of that council Richard summoned the parliament³. As a rule however this duty belonged to the privy council or continual ordinary council of ministers. It was no doubt a matter of some delicacy, in troubled times, to arrange the course of business so as to avoid bringing the personal disputes of the great lords before the assembled commons: a good example of this will be found in the case of the council held at Northampton in which the business was prepared for the parliament of 1426, when Gloucester had refused to meet Beaufort as chancellor⁴. The most significant exception to this rule is the very rare case in which the parliament itself attempted to fix the day for the next session. The most important recorded instance of such an event belongs to the merciless parliament of 1388, when the king was in the hands of the appellant lords and the house of commons was entirely at their beck. Although the privy signet; 'Per breve de privato sigillo,' that the sign manual was warrant to the privy seal under which the order was given for affixing the great seal; 'Per ipsum regem et consilium,' that the writ had been issued under the joint supervision of king and council. See on the whole history of the seals, Sir H. Nicolas, Ordinances, &c., vi. pp. cxi. sq., clxxxiv. &c.; Elsynge, Ancient Method of holding Parliaments, pp. 27, 29.

¹ This is sometimes stated in the writ itself circumstantially; as in 1330, Lords' Report, iv. 397; and 1331, ib. p. 403: 'de consilio praelatorum et magnatum nobis assistentium.'

² See above, p. 87.

³ Rot. Parl. iii. 215.

⁴ See above, p. 105.

the proposal was couched in the form of a petition, it was rejected by the king, and the next session was held a full month before the day proposed¹. In 1328 and 1339, however, the day for the next session was fixed before the dissolution of the parliament².

416. As soon as the day and place of session were fixed, the writs of summons were prepared in the royal chancery and issued under the great seal. As these writs were returned to the parliament itself, or later into chancery, and as copies of them were enrolled on the close rolls at the time of issue, the great numbers of extant copies form an important branch of the national treasure of record. The ingenuity of legal antiquaries has found in them much material for interesting discussion³, which cannot be here reproduced. The essential portion of the writs has continued to be the same throughout the existence of parliamentary institutions, but the forms have undergone great variations at different times, and quite as much historical interest belongs to the variations as to the permanent identity of the essential parts. These variations were unquestionably the work of the king and council⁴, the Issue of writs.

Interest attaching to the writs.

¹ Rot. Parl. iii. 246.

² In 1328 the day for the parliament to be held at York on July 31 was fixed by the king with assent of the lords, at the previous parliament of Northampton; Lords' Report, iv. 381. In 1339, 'Item fait a remembrer de somoundre le parlement as oytaves de Seint Hiller susdit;' Rot. Parl. ii. 106; cf. p. 105; see also in connexion with this parliament, vol. ii. p. 400, and below, p. 411. In 1318 the place for the next parliament was fixed in the parliament; see above, vol. ii. p. 360, note 3.

³ 'Manifold rare, delightful varieties, forms, diversities, and distinct kinds of writs of summons;' Prynne, Register, i. p. 395.

⁴ Prynne argues against Coke's statement that the form of writ could not be altered but by act of parliament; Register, i. 396; ii. 161; and has also some important remarks on the right to demand a writ; Coke argues that the writ is issued 'ex debito justitiæ,' Prynne that it is altogether in the royal power, and of the class of 'magistralia,' not 'brevia formata sub suis casibus.' But the question is one of a very technical character, although it has a bearing on rights of peerage. Bracton, lib. 5. f. 413, divides 'Brevia originalia' into several classes; first, 'quaedam sunt formata sub suis casibus et de cursu et de communi concilio totius regni concessa et approbata, quae quidem nullatenus mutari poterint absque consensu et voluntate eorum;' others are 'judicialia,' which vary according to the suits in which they are used; a third class, 'magistralia,' which often vary 'secundum varietatem casuum et querelarum;' a fourth are 'personalia,' and a fifth 'mixta.'

Writs altered by act of parliament.

form of writ having been originally settled by no constitutional act except in the very general terms of the great charter¹; but certain additions were made by acts of parliament, the omission of which would have the effect of invalidating the summons; such in particular were the clauses inserted in consequence of the amendments of election law under Henry IV, Henry V, and Henry VI. Yet, like the times and places of session, the form of writ had in the fourteenth century attained a sort of sanctity which it was exceedingly dangerous to violate; Richard II was compelled to withdraw the clause by which he ordered the sheriffs to return impartial persons; and the order, given in 1404, that lawyers should not be elected, was made the ground of a charge of unconstitutional conduct brought against Henry IV.

Special writs to the lords and judges.

417. Special writs of summons were addressed to the lords, spiritual and temporal, and to the judges or occasional counsellors who were called to advise the king in the upper house of parliament. The summons of the parliamentary assembly of the clergy was inserted in the writs to the archbishops and bishops, and all the summonses of representatives of the commons were addressed to the sheriffs of the counties. The variations in the writs addressed to the lords are of minor importance, as they are chiefly found in the clauses in which the king gives an account of the cause which has moved him to call the parliament; but some peculiarities marking the various writs of the barons, bishops, abbots, and judges, deserve special notice². On the other hand the changes which

Variations
in the forms.

¹ 'Ad certum diem scilicet ad terminum quadraginta dierum ad minus, et ad certum locum; et in omnibus litteris illius summonitionis causam summonitionis exprimemus;' Mag. Cart. art. 14.

² These points will be seen best by giving a specimen of the writs: 'Rex venerabili in Christo patri H. eadem gratia archiepiscopo Cantuariensi, totius Angliæ primati, salutem. (I) Quia de avisamento consilii nostri pro quibusdam arduis et urgentibus negotiis, nos statum et defensionem regni nostri Angliæ ac ecclesiæ Anglicanæ contingentibus, quoddam parlamentum nostrum apud Westmonasterium die lune proxime post festum Sancti Lucæ Evangelistæ proxime futurum teneri ordinavimus, et ibidem (ii) vobiscum ac cum ceteris prelatiis, magnatibus et proceribus dicti regni nostri colloquium habere et tractatum; vobis (iii) in fide et dilectione (to the lords temporal 'in fide et ligeancia') quibus nobis tene-mini firmiter injungendo mandamus quod, consideratis dictorum negowere from time to time introduced or attempted in the writs for the elections to the house of commons, point in some cases to important, in some to very obscure causes in contemporary history.

The writs enrolled and issued first were those addressed to the lords spiritual; the archbishop of Canterbury being by his ancient privilege entitled to the first summons; then followed the writ to the archbishop of York and the suffragan bishops. The normal form of the writ contained, first, a clause declaring the cause on account of which the king has ordered the parliament to be summoned, with the time and place of meeting; a description of the body whose deliberations the recipient is to share, 'cum ceteris praelatis magnatibus et proceribus regni nostri;' this is followed by an injunction on the recipient to attend, 'vobis mandamus in fide et dilectione quibus nobis tenemini,' and a description of the function which he is to discharge 'tractaturi vestrumque consilium impensuri.' Finally the praemunientes clause directs the bishop to warn the clergy of his diocese to appear, the deans and archdeacons in person and the minor clergy by their proctors, on the same occasion, to do or consent to the things which may then and there be determined.

Writs to the bishops.

It is on the varying of these few expressions that all the distinctive interest of the writs of the prelates depends. The first clause admits of infinite but non-essential variation; and is continually changed. The highest note is struck when Edward I reminds the bishops that what touches all should tiorum arduitate et periculis imminetibus, cessante quacunque excusatione, dictis die et loco personaliter intersitis nobiscum ac cum praelatis magnatibus et proceribus praedictis super praedictis negotiis (iv) tractaturi vestrumque consilium impensuri. Et hoc, sicut nos et honorem nostrum ac salvationem et defensionem regni et ecclesiae praedictorum expeditionemque dictorum negotiorum diligitis, nullatenus omittatis. (v) Praemunientes priorem et capitulum ecclesiae vestrae Cantuariensis ac archidiaconos totumque clerum vestrae diocesis quod iidem prior et archidiaconi in propriis personis suis, ac dictum capitulum per unum, idemque clerus per duos procuratores idoneos plenam et sufficientem potestatem ab ipsis capitulo et clero divisim habentes, dictis die et loco personaliter intersint ad consentiendum hiis quae tunc ibidem de communi consilio dicti regni nostri divina favente clementia contigerit ordinari. Teste' &c.; Lords' Report, iv. 827.

The cause of summons stated in the writ.

be approved by all¹; or when that great king and his successors from time to time explain that the enemy is bent on destroying the English tongue from off the face of the earth². The barest matter of fact is touched when the form becomes 'quia de advisamento consilii nostri pro quibusdam arduis et urgentibus negotiis, nos statum et defensionem regni nostri Angliae et ecclesiae Anglicanae contingentibus, quoddam parlamentum nostrum tenere ordinavimus.' The changes however are not essential and touch no constitutional point.

The position of the word ceteris.

The second point is important; the king's intention is to deliberate with the other prelates and magnates of the kingdom, 'cum ceteris praelatis, magnatibus et proceribus;' the writ of the temporal lords runs 'cum praelatis, et ceteris magnatibus et proceribus,' and that of the judges or additional counsellors omits the word 'ceteris' and frequently inserts the clause 'cum ceteris de consilio nostro.' The omission of the word 'ceteris' has the great legal force of excluding the judges from claiming the position of peers of parliament. The difference of its position in the writs of the lords spiritual may be construed as placing their right as members of the lords' house upon a different footing from that of the temporal lords, but this is not a necessary or probable inference.

Judges not lords of parliament.

The third point of importance is the regular use of the words 'fide et dilectione' in the writs of the prelates³; the corre-

¹ See vol. ii. p. 133; Select Charters, p. 485.

² See the writs of 23 Edw. I, 7 Rich. II; Lords' Report, iv. 67, 706; cf. Rot. Parl. ii. 150.

³ On the importance of the expression 'fide et dilectione' see Prynne, Reg. i. 194, 195, 206-208. It is difficult to draw any distinct inference from the use of the words 'dilectione' and 'homagio' under Edward I; for occasionally both terms are used in writs of the same character; it seems, however, clear that after the great quarrel with the earls in 1297 the king never summoned the temporal lords to parliament 'in fide et dilectione,' but always 'in fide et homagio:' in 1295, 1296, and 1297, he uses the former expression; in 1298 he omits the adjuration altogether, and in 1299 and onwards uses the sterner form. See the writs of those years in the Lords' Report and the Parliamentary Writs. 'Fide et homagio' thus became the regular form; and in 1317 the difference is specially noted in the Close Rolls, where the two sets of writs are described as identical so far; 'excepto hoc quod ubi dicitur in fide et dilectione, ibi dicitur in fide et homagio;' Parl. Writs, II. i. 171. It is just possible to draw from the military writs a further inference; in 1294 sponding form in the writ of the lords temporal is 'fide et homagio,' or 'homagio et ligeantia.' The former expression is sometimes used in the lay writs, but the latter is never used to ecclesiastics: the force of the distinction lying in the fact that the bishops as bishops did not do homage, and the abbots shared the benefit of the immunity¹. This point has some further importance in relation to the writs of the lords temporal.

The words 'fide et dilectione' distinctive of the writs of the prelates.

The fourth point, the use of the words 'tractaturi et consilium vestrum impensuri' marks the theoretical position of the upper house and its attendant judges: they are counsellors preeminently; no such words occur in the writs under which the representative members are elected.

The function expressed in tractaturi, &c.

Lastly the praemunientes clause, which of course occurs only in the writs of the bishops, directs the attendance of the benefited clergy, and defines their function: from the twenty-eighth year of Edward I to the year 1340, they are generally, but not invariably, summoned like the commons 'ad faciendum et consentiendum;' from 1340 generally, and from the first year of Richard II invariably, 'ad consentiendum' only²; the meaning of the word 'faciendum' here must be ruled by its interpretation in the writs to the sheriffs for the election of knights of the shire. It would seem that the summons 'ad faciendum' was withdrawn from the moment that the king despaired of prevailing on the clergy to vote money in parliament instead of convocation. When a bishopric was vacant the writ which would ordinarily be directed to the bishop was frequently addressed to the guardian of the spiritualities of the see, or, if a bishop had been elected and not completely invested or con-

The praemunientes clause.

Writs to the guardians of spirituals, and bishops elect.

John Balliol is cited 'in fide et homagio' to send his service of armed men to Portsmouth, June 25; on June 29 he is desired 'in fide et dilectione' to send some of them with the king to France; here the former expression may imply the feudal duty, and the latter the general bond of fealty: but this will not apply in all cases; Parl. Writs, i. 261.

¹ See above, vol. i. p. 386; ii. 211; iii. 302.

² In 1371 they are summoned 'ad consulendum et consentiendum;' Lords' Report, iv. 647. It is certainly a significant coincidence that the word 'faciendum' should be withdrawn just when the king ceased to send his second letter to the archbishops ordering the enforcement of the summons. See above, p. 330.

secrated, to him as bishop elect; when the bishop was abroad the writ was directed to his vicar-general¹. The writs of the abbots and priors correspond with those of the bishops in all other points, but omit the praemunientes clause.

Writs of the lords temporal.

The form fide et homagio.

The writs of the lords temporal differ from those of the bishops, in the change of the position of the word 'ceteris,' in the omission of anything corresponding with the praemunientes clause, and in the use of the form 'fide et homagio,' 'fide et ligeantia,' or 'homagio et ligeantia.' The difference between these expressions has been understood to indicate some difference between the barony by tenure, of which the homage would be a more distinct feature, and the barony by writ, where the oath of allegiance would take the place of the form of homage. But the words are used with so little discrimination that no such conclusion can be with any probability drawn from them; and the words homage and allegiance are in this collocation synonymous or redundant².

418. The writs of the judges and counsellors³ correspond so

¹ Specimens of the writ to the guardians of the spiritualities may be seen in Parl. Writs, I. 25, 47, 137; II. i. 155; Prynne, Register, i. 152, 153; and to bishops elect, Parl. Writs, I. 26, 47; to the vicars general, Lords' Report, iv. 500, 501.

² See Prynne, Reg. i. p. 206; Coke, 4th Inst. p. 5. An examination of the writs shows that Edward I occasionally used the form 'en la foi et en la ligeaunce,' Parl. Writs, I. 317; but that Edward III introduced it into common use in writs of summons to both councils and parliament: sometimes he uses both words, 'fide, homagio et ligeantia;' Lords' Report, iv. 594, 599: but no conclusion can be drawn as to the purpose of the change: from 1354 onwards the two words are used indiscriminately, and from the accession of Richard II 'ligeantia' is the regular word.

³ See Parl. Writs, II. i. 42; Prynne, Reg. i. pp. 341 sq., 361 sq., 365. In several cases, if the Close Rolls are to be trusted, the writs to the justices are identical with those to the lords; but these may be accidental errors. Occasionally, when the counsellor cited is a clergyman, 'in fide et dilectione' is used, as in 1311, to Robert Pickering; but generally the clause is omitted. A specimen of the form is subjoined; it is the writ corresponding with that to the archbishop, given above, p. 404: 'Rex dilecto et fideli suo Willelmo Hankeforde capitali justitiario suo salutem. Quia &c. ut supra usque ibi tractatum, et tunc sic: vobis mandamus firmiter injungentes quod omnibus aliis praetermissis dictis die et loco personaliter intersitis nobiscum ac cum ceteris de consilio nostro super dictis negotiis tractaturi vestrumque consilium impensuri: et hoc nullatenus omitteratis;' Lords' Report, iv. 829. Here the omission of the word 'ceteris' is not noted. But the writ to William de Shareshull in 1357 contains the words 'vobiscum et cum prelatiis, magnatibus, et proceribus dicti regni nostri Angliae ac aliis de consilio nostro;' ib. p.

very closely with those of the barons that it would seem almost an afterthought to exclude them from equality in debate. The variations already noticed, the omission of the word 'ceteris,' the introduction of 'ceterisque de consilio nostro' and the absence of the injunction 'fide et homagio' are interpreted as having that effect.

Summons of the judges.

All these writs are tested by the king himself, and issued under the great seal. The note 'per breve de privato sigillo' is frequently attached to the copy on the close roll, signifying that the great seal had been attached in compliance with a writ of privy seal ordering it to be done. The form 'per ipsum regem' denotes that the warrant has been issued under the sign manual and the royal signet. The later note 'per ipsum regem et consilium,' which appears occasionally in the writs of Edward II and very frequently after the accession of Edward III, has the same force, denoting that the privy seal writ had issued after deliberation in the privy council¹. This feature belongs to all the parliamentary writs alike. The writs addressed to the prelates, barons, and counsellors ordering them to attend in a great council are worded in language very similar to that of the writs of parliament; but they express the king's intention of holding a council, 'consilium' or 'tractatum,' not a parliament; the writs to the bishops omit the praemunientes clause, and there are no writs to the sheriffs. Some doubt may occasionally arise so long as the word 'colloquium' is used for both parliament and council, although that word is properly

Attestation of the writs.

Writs of summons to a great council.

615. It should be said that the writs to councils vary more than those to parliament; the judges being occasionally summoned 'in fide et ligeantia,' and in other points being placed on a level with the lords.

¹ See above, p. 401, note 5. In the parliament of Coventry held in 1459, a petition was presented on behalf of the sheriffs who had returned members under privy seal writs; the king was asked to declare the elections valid, and discharge the sheriffs from blame; and this was done. See Prynne, Reg. ii. 141; Rot. Parl. v. 367. The writs are indeed given in the regular form in the Lords' Report, iv. 940, 945; but in the act of 1460, which repealed the acts of the parliament of Coventry, it is alleged, as one of the reasons of the invalidity of those acts, that the members were returned, some of them without any due or free election, others without any election at all, against the course of the king's laws and the liberties of the commons of this realm, by virtue of the king's letters of privy seal; Rot. Parl. v. 374; Prynne, Reg. i. 142. See above, p. 184.

equivalent to 'parliamentum:' the word 'parliamentum' is however used most frequently from the latter years of Edward I, and exclusively after the first year of Edward III.

419. The writs to the sheriffs, ordering the election of representatives of the commons, correspond with the writs of the lords only so far as concerns the recital of the cause of summons, and in earlier writs this is frequently abbreviated. After declaring the occasion of meeting and the king's intention of treating with the prelates, magnates, and 'proceres,' no share in the deliberative function being assigned to any other persons, the writ proceeds to order the election of knights, citizens, and burgesses, who are to have full and sufficient power, on behalf of their constituencies, to consent to and to do what by God's favour may be determined by the common counsel of the kingdom, on the matter premised¹. The sheriff is himself to bring up the names of the persons chosen and the writ, until by the statute of Henry IV in 1406 the indenture tacked to the writ is declared to be the sheriff's return, and is ordered to be sent into chancery. Such is the essential form of the writ; the many important variations in detail, touching the status of the persons to be chosen and the process of election, are valuable indications of political and social history. They must be taken in chronological order.

The changes in the clauses which describe the character of the persons eligible as knights of the shire begin very early. The writ of 1275 describes the knights to be elected as 'de discretioribus et legalioribus².' The form used in 1290, 1294, and 1295³, prescribes the election to be made 'de discretioribus et ad laborandum potentioribus⁴;' the form is varied in 1302,

¹ 'Ita quod iidem milites plenam et sufficientem potestatem pro se et communitate comitatus praedicti, et dicti cives et burgenses pro se et communitatibus civitatum et burgorum praedictorum, divisim ab ipsis habeant ad faciendum et consentiendum hiis quae tunc ibidem de communi consilio regni nostri favente Domino ordinari contigerit super negotiis antedictis;' Lords' Report, iv. 786.

² Vol. ii. p. 235.

³ Parl. Writs, i. 21, 25, 29, 48, &c.

⁴ In 1297 the description is 'de probioribus et legalioribus;' this meeting however was not, strictly speaking, a parliament, but the council to which the knights were called to receive the copies of the confirmed charters. Parl. Writs, i. 56.

Writs addressed to the sheriffs.

How the return was to be made.

Variations in the form describing the persons to be elected as knights of the shire.

the words being 'de discretioribus ipsius comitatus¹,' and in 1306 the clause directing the election of burgesses runs 'et de quolibet burgo duos burgenses vel unum secundum quod burgus fuerit major vel minor².' Both these variations were temporary; the older form is resumed and observed down to 1324, when Edward II, apparently despairing of getting a parliament together, and, having in 1322 been obliged to receive valetti or esquires instead of knights of the shire for several counties, dispensed with the demand for discreet and able knights by adding 'seu aliis, de comitatu tuo, assensu et arbitrio hominum ejusdem comitatus nominandos³.' As however he omitted the summons for the clergy and borough members altogether, this writ cannot be regarded as a writ of parliament. In the next parliament, that of 1325, only twenty-seven of the knights of the shire were belted knights. The writs for the parliament of Northampton in 1328 forbade the attendance of members with a multitude of armed retainers⁴; and an additional writ in 1330 enjoined on the sheriff to obtain the election of persons not suspected of legal malpractices: 'deux des plus leaux et plus suffisauns chivalers ou serjauntz de meisme le countee qui soient mie suspicionous de male coveigne, ne communes meintenours des parties⁵.' This was with a view to the next parliament, in which Mortimer was condemned. Although the result was satisfactory for the moment, and no change in the writ was required for some years, abuses had already begun to creep in, and in 1339 the commons, declaring that they could not assent

Attempts to secure the election of real knights.

¹ Parl. Writs, i. 115: in 1305, 'de discretioribus et ad laborandum potentioribus;' ib. p. 138.

² Parl. Writs, i. 182, 183. This is not counted as a regular parliament.

³ In 1311 the sheriff of Rutland sends two 'homines,' having no knights; Parl. Writs, ii. 1, 51. In 1322 Worcestershire returned a valettus, who received only 2s. for his expenses; ib. ii. 1, 277: Devon returned one, Middlesex, Hereford and Leicester two; ib. 278. In 1324 all are called milites; ib. 313. In 1324 the summons to the barons is 'in fide et dilectione,' and 'seu aliis' is in the Sheriffs' Writs, II. i. 317; in the returns for Herefordshire it is specified that the persons elected are not knights; Lincolnshire returns a 'serjaunt;' the number of belted knights made out by Prynne belongs to the parliament of 1325; ib. pp. 346, 347; when the persons not knighted have only 3s. a day.

⁴ Lords' Report, iv. 383; Prynne, Reg. ii. 79, 80.

⁵ Prynne, Reg. ii. 85, 86; Rot. Parl. ii. 443.

to the proposed grant without having recourse to their constituencies, asked for a new election in which the sheriff should be told 'que deux de mielx vauex chivalers des contez'¹ should be chosen, and the sheriffs and other servants of the crown should be excluded. This proposition was accepted; and in the writs for the next parliament the king, after remarking that the perfunctory transaction of the elections has been a serious hindrance to business, enjoins the election of two knights girt with swords, for the county, and two burgesses for each borough, 'de discretioribus et probioribus militibus, civibus et burgensibus comitatus civitatum et burgorum et ad laborandum potentioribus'.² The sheriffs are not however yet excluded. The enforcement of knighthood as a qualification for election seems to have caused a difficulty; the words 'gladiis cinctos'³ occur in the writs for March 1340, but are omitted after that parliament, although the rest of the formula is retained. In 1342 the qualifications of the candidates are indicated by the words 'de discretioribus et legalioribus';⁴ in 1343 'probioribus' recurs.⁵ In 1347 occurs the curious and important notice that the king does not call the parliament with the intention of imposing aids or tallages, but that justice may be done to the people⁶; a very necessary undertaking at a moment when the king's recent proceedings had shaken public confidence. The assurance does not seem to have been satisfactory; at all events the parliament which met was not sufficiently pliable; and the writ for the next year orders the election to be made 'de aprioribus discretioribus et magis fide dignis'; the knights are again to be belted knights, 'gladio cinctos et ordinem militarem habentes et non alios'; and the sheriff is warned that he is so to conduct the election as not to risk being regarded as a hinderer of the king's business.⁷ In 1350 the writ issued for the parliament of 1351 reveals a new difficulty: it was impossible

An order for belted knights to be chosen.

Variations in the writ to the sheriffs.

¹ Rot. Parl. ii. 104; cf. p. 310, and Statutes, i. 394.

² Lords' Report, iv. 509; Prynne, Reg. ii. 88, 89.

³ Lords' Report, iv. 517; Prynne, Reg. ii. 90.

⁴ Lords' Report, iv. 543.

⁵ Lords' Report, iv. 547.

⁶ Lords' Report, iv. 573, 575; Prynne, Reg. ii. 90.

⁷ Lords' Report, iv. 580, 583; Prynne, Reg. ii. 91.

to secure the election of belted knights, but honest and peaceful country gentlemen might be hoped for; the king accordingly directs that such persons shall be chosen as are not pleaders or maintainers of quarrels, or men who live by such gains, but men of worth and good faith, and lovers of the public good. This form is observed until the year 1355¹. In the meantime two great councils were held, the writs for which are exceptionally worded; in 1352 the sheriff is to return one knight ‘de provectionibus discretioribus et magis expertis’², the number being reduced that the work of harvest may not be impeded; in 1353³ one belted knight of the same qualifications is to be returned. The regular order of parliaments, which had been interrupted by the plague, was resumed in 1355, and the writs omit the caution against maintainers and restore the clause ordering the return of belted knights; in 1356 both these are omitted, but the counties are warned that no one legally elected will be excused⁴; in 1357 the belted knights are again asked for, and both knights and burgesses are to be chosen ‘de elegantioribus personis’⁵. Between 1356 and 1371 the variations are unimportant; one writ for 1360 retains the warning against improvident elections, and another directs that the knights shall be chosen in full county court⁶; in 1362 the demand is for the choice of men ‘de melioribus, validioribus et discretioribus’⁷, varied in 1364 to ‘valentioribus’⁸. This qualification is in 1370 expanded still further; the knights are to be belted knights and more approved by feats of arms, circumstances and discreet⁹. In 1372 was issued the parliamentary ordinance¹⁰ forbidding the election of lawyers and excluding the sheriffs from candidature. In conformity with this rule the

Maintainers of quarrels are not to be chosen.

Qualifications of the knights insisted on.

Lawyers and sheriffs not to be chosen.

¹ Lords' Report, iv. 590, 593, 603, 605; Prynne, Reg. ii. 92.

² Lords' Report, iv. 595; Prynne, Reg. ii. 92, 93.

³ Lords' Report, iv. 600.

⁴ Lords' Report, iv. 608.

⁵ Lords' Report, iv. 616; Prynne, Reg. ii. 99: this writ also directed the members to be present personally on the first day of the parliament.

⁶ Lords' Report, iv. 623, 626; Prynne, Reg. ii. 100.

⁷ Lords' Report, iv. 632; Prynne, Reg. ii. 101.

⁸ Lords' Report, iv. 638, 641, 643, 646; Prynne, Reg. ii. 102.

⁹ Lords' Report, iv. 648; Prynne, Reg. ii. 106.

¹⁰ See above, vol. ii. p. 445.

writs of 1373 are very explicit, but the lawyers are not specifically excluded: the knights of the shire are to be belted knights or squires, worthier and more honest and more expert in feats of arms, and discreet, and of no other condition; the citizens and burgesses are to be chosen from the more discreet and more sufficient of the class who have practical acquaintance with seamanship and the following of merchandise; no sheriff or person of any other condition than that specified may be chosen¹. The form does not seem to have been approved. Two years later the simpler rule² prescribing 'duos milites gladii cinctos magis idoneos et discretos' appears; the prohibition of the sheriff continues to be a part of the writ. Yet in the Good Parliament half the county members were squires unknighthed. The petition of 1376 that the knights may be chosen by common election from the better folk of the shire, and not merely nominated by the sheriff without due election, was set aside by the king; but the request seems to have been regarded as a warning to the crown not to tamper with the elections. Under Richard II the direction to elect in full county court and by assent of the same was always inserted. From the year 1376 onwards the sheriffs are directed to cause to be elected 'duos milites gladii cinctos magis idoneos et discretos,' and for the towns two members 'de discretioribus et magis sufficientibus.' Although John of Gaunt was able the next year to pack the parliament with his own adherents, it is a long time before any new variation occurs in the writs. In one writ of 1381 the old form is reverted to³; in 1382 the knights to be returned are to be either the same as attended the last parliament, or others; a hint perhaps to return the same⁴; in 1387 Richard's unlucky attempt to secure men 'in modernis debatis magis indifferentes'⁵ was summarily defeated; and the following year the clause inserted in 1373, forbidding

Petition of 1376.

Variations become less frequent.

¹ Lords' Report, iv. 661; Prynne, Reg. ii. 114, 115.

² Lords' Report, iv. 664, 667; Prynne, Reg. ii. 116.

³ Lords' Report, iv. 693: discretioribus, probioribus et ad laborandum potentioribus.

⁴ Lords' Report, iv. 696.

⁵ Lords' Report, iv. 725, 726.

the election of persons of any other condition than that specified, was permanently omitted¹, the sheriffs alone being disqualified. With these exceptions the writs remain uniform until the year 1404, when Henry IV stirred up strife by excluding lawyers from his 'unlearned parliament'².

From this date all the changes in the writs are made in consequence of the statutes by which from time to time the elections were regulated, and they generally reproduce the exact language of the acts. The clause of the statute of 1406 ordering that the election be made by the whole county in the next county court³, and that the names chosen be returned in an indenture, appears as part of the writ: this example is followed down to the year 1429. In 1430, after the passing of the statute which fixes the forty shillings franchise, the same rule is followed, the clause of the act being inserted in the writ⁴. Again in 1445 the commons petitioned that the statutes touching elections should be better enforced: the king agreed, and added that the persons chosen should be notable knights of the shire which elected them, or else notable squires, gentlemen of birth capable of becoming knights, and that no man of the degree of yeoman or below it should be eligible⁵. The result of the petition and its answer was a long statute, all the essential clauses of which were inserted in the writs from the year 1446 to the end of the reign. Edward IV altered the form in his first year⁶, omitting specific references to the two statutes of Henry VI and the restrictions inserted in 1446, but retaining the more essential parts of the prescribed procedure. This form is observed to the end of the period before us.

It is difficult to draw any definite conclusions from the variations which occur in the writs of Edward III; they seem, however, to imply a mistrust of the influences supposed to be

¹ Lords' Report, iv. 731; Prynne, Reg. ii. 117.

² Lords' Report, iv. 792; Prynne, Reg. ii. 123.

³ 'Quod facta proclamatione in proximo comitatu tuo . . . libere et indifferenter per illos qui proclamationi interfuerunt;' Lords' Report, iv. 802; Prynne, Reg. ii. 126.

⁴ Lords' Report, iv. 877; Prynne, Reg. ii. 132.

⁵ Lords' Report, iv. 913, 920, 924, &c.; Prynne, Reg. ii. p. 135.

⁶ Lords' Report, iv. 951 sq.

Changes made in consequence of alterations in the law.

Final changes in the form.

General inferences from these variations.

at work in the county courts; and to have a general intention of urging the election of men of knightly rank and education, to the exclusion of professional lawyers and the maintainers of private suits. The mischief of faction and the danger of sacrificing public interest to private emolument were sufficient reasons for the restrictions inserted. The fact that the king could insert them without remonstrance does not prove that by dealing with the sheriffs he could procure their enforcement: the number of variations implies some power of resistance; the lawyers were not excluded and belted knights were not always chosen. Yet the king no doubt felt that his power, even thus liable to be thwarted, was safer as it was than it would be if it were hampered with any constitutional change in the body of electors. He maintained accordingly the customary right of the county courts. The changes introduced under the Lancaster kings have already been noticed: they possibly imply a more important change in the constitution of the country society, and claim a more distinct place in social history. We cannot question that the act of 1430 was demanded by the disorderly condition of the county courts, or that that of 1445 was the result of the choice of unfit and incompetent members. The lack of governance common to the whole Lancaster period is exemplified in both the complaints. The tenour of the history is enough, without a statutory rehearsal, to prove that there were riots even in the most solemn shiremoots, and that unworthy members sat in the fickle and subservient parliaments.

The writs to the sheriffs did not quite complete the composition of the lower house. Those cities and towns which were made counties by themselves, or had sheriffs of their own, London, Bristol, York, Norwich, Lincoln, Newcastle-on-Tyne, Hull, Southampton, Nottingham, Coventry, Canterbury, had writs addressed to their sheriffs; the constable of Dover and warden of the Cinque Ports had the writ for the election of the barons of the Cinque Ports; the duke of Lancaster, or more generally the chancellor of the duchy or county palatine of Lancaster, had the writ for Lancashire and its towns. None of these writs exhibit any important differences.

The king's power to alter the writs.

His wish to maintain custom;

and to enforce order.

Writs to the sheriffs of cities,

to the Cinque Ports and Lancashire.

420. The abbots, barons, and judges, on the receipt of their writs, had little to do except to obey: the bishops had besides this to order the election of the clerical proctors, which they did by forwarding the writ with a precept of their own to the archdeacons to enforce it¹; and, where the process was transacted at all, it was transacted in much the same way as the elections to convocation, by summoning the whole body of the beneficed clergy in the several archdeaconries. The work of the sheriffs was much more critical and complicated. The method of election to the house of commons, the questions of qualification and suffrage, and the theory as compared with the practice of the county court, open a wide field for discordant conjectures.

Proceedings on the receipt of writs.

The writ was returnable, as we have seen, in about forty days, and the election was to be made in the county court; and this is nearly all that can be certainly affirmed of the early elections. It would be a waste of ingenuity to speculate on the different courses that a sheriff, unguided by custom, may have adopted; and, for the sake of a definite view, we must advance at once to the period which was affected by the statute of 1406. This statute orders that proceedings shall begin in the first county court holden after the receipt of the writ, and that the election shall be made in full county court by the persons present; it specifies further the form of the return².

County
elections.

Proceedings
under the statute of 1406.

¹ Forms of electing clerical proctors under the 'praemunientes' clause will be found, in the case of cathedrals, Parl. Writs, I. 31, 34, 140, II. i. 293-296; and in the case of the diocesan clergy, one of A.D. 1304, Wake, State of the Church, app. p. 31. A list of the clerical proctors in the parliament of Carlisle is given, Parl. Writs, I. 184-186. Atterbury gives a long series of instances in which proctors were elected under this clause, coming down to the year 1678; Rights, Powers, and Privileges of Convocation, Additions to the first edition, addenda, pp. 81-93.

² 7 Hen. IV, c. 15, Statutes, ii. p. 156: 'Item nostre seigneur le roy al grevouise complaint de sa commune del non dewe eleccion des chivalers des countees pur le parlement, queux aucune foitz sont faitz de affeccion des viscountz et autrement encontre la forme des briefs as ditz viscountz directe, a grand esclandre des countees et retardacion des busoignes del communalte du dit countee, nostre sovereign seigneur le roy vuillant a ces purveier de remedie, de l'assent des seigneurs espirituelx et temporelx et de tout la commune en cest present parlement, ad ordeigne, et establiz que desore enavant les eleccions des tielx chivalers soient faitz en la forme quenseute; cest a saver que al proschein countee a tenir apres la livre du brief du parlement, proclamacion soit fait en plein countee de le jour et lieu de parlement, et que toutz ceux qui illeques sont presentz sibien

The plenus comitatus.

Unfortunately we have but few such data as would enable us to determine the nature of the 'plenus comitatus' thus recognised as the elective body. As the proceedings are to begin in the first county court held within the forty days that elapse before the return of the writ, it is obvious that the court in question must be the court held every month or every three weeks by the sheriff, and not the sheriff's tourn which was held but twice a year. That this was the practice appears from the cases in which the sheriff, having to account for not returning knights of the shire in time for the opening of the session, pleads that no county court occurred before that date, and is excused¹. This monthly or three weeks county court had however very much diminished in importance since the thirteenth century: by the statute of Merton every free man was empowered to appear by his attorney, and thus relieved from regular attendance at the ordinary sessions²; many of its Election in the ordinary county court.

sutrez duement somoines pur cele cause come autres, attendent la eleccion de lours chivalers pur le parlement; et adonques en plein counte aillent al eleccion liberalment et endifferement non obstant aucune prier ou commandement au contrarie; et apres quils soient esluz, soient les persones esluz presentz ou absentz, soient lour nouns escriptz en endenture dessoutz les seals de toutz ceux qui eux eslisent, et tacchez au dit brieve du parlement; quele endenture issint ensealez et tacchez soit tenuz pur retourne au dit brief quant as chivalers des countees, et que en briefs de parlement affairs en temps advenir soit mys cest clause; et electionem tuam in pleno comitatu tuo factam distincte et aperte sub sigillo tuo et sigillis eorum qui electioni illi interfuerint nos in cancellaria nostra ad diem et locum in brevi contentum certifies indilate.' Cf. Rot. Parl. iii. 601.

¹ This was the custom before the act was passed; in 1327 the sheriff of Surrey and Sussex reports that between the day on which he received the writ and the day fixed for the parliament no county court was held, and therefore no election was made. In 1314 the sheriff of Wilts received the writ only three days before the day of parliament, and on that day the members were 'celeriter electi;' Prynne, Reg. iii. 172; Parl. Writs, II. i. 149. A similar case occurred in Devon in 1449; Prynne, Reg. iii. 151: there no county court was held until two days before the parliament met. In Leicestershire in 1450 the election took place after the parliament met, for the same reason; ib. p. 163.

² The relaxation of the duty of attending the popular courts without special summons was the result of three acts; (1) the writ of Henry III in 1234, Ann. Dunst. p. 140, in which it was ordered that there should not henceforth be a 'generalis summonitio' to the hundred courts; (2) the statute of Merton in 1236 quoted above; and (3) the statute of Marlborough, which relieved all barons and religious persons from attendance on the Sheriff's tourn. When a general meeting was required the general summons continued to be issued; for example, to meet the itinerant justices; but by Stat. Marl. c. 24 those justices were forbidden to amerce

earlier functions had been handed over to the justices of the peace, and its ordinary judicial work was the decision of pleas of debt, which required the attendance of the parties to suits and the rota of qualified jurors, and of none others. As this would obviously be no true representation of the county, we expect to find that for the occasion of an election other persons were specially cited, and it is clear from the act of 1406 that this was the case; 'all that be there present as well suitors duly summoned for the same cause, as others, shall attend to the election.' From this it appears that although the court was the ordinary court, the persons composing it, or forming the most important part in it, were summoned for the purpose of the election.¹ On the rolls of the parliament by which the statute was passed there is an article, enjoined under oath on the members of the council, ordering that in the writs to the sheriffs they should be directed to have proclamation made in all the market towns of their counties, of the day and place of election, fifteen days before the day fixed for the election. But although enacted by the king and sworn by the council the clause was not incorporated in the statute². Some such warning was, however, absolutely necessary. Strictly speaking then, the proceedings must have begun not in the county court itself but in the citation of the electors by the sheriff which preceded the holding of the court, whether according to the article just mentioned or in conformity with established custom. And the discharge of this function lodged great power in the hands of the sheriff; he might issue a general notice, the 'summonitio generalis' such as was issued before the visits of the itinerant justices, or he might summon the suitors who were bound by their tenure to attend³, or he might cite his especial

Persons summoned to the election.

Order for fifteen days notice not incorporated in the statute.

Power of the sheriff to cite electors.

Possible misuse.

the townships for the non-attendance of all inhabitants over twelve years old to make the inquests.

¹ The electors specially summoned are 'ad eligendum . . . praeuniti,' and make the election 'assensu totius comitatus.' See Prynne, iii. 176; they are also 'singulariter examinati,' ib. 178.

² Rot. Parl. iii. 588.

³ On this point the Lords' Report (i. 149) expresses the opinion that the county court in which elections were held was the court baron of the county, and the proper suitors were only those who held land in the

The plenus comitatus.

Disorders of the county court,

Influence of the sheriff in making the returns.

friends, or he might cite no one at all, and so transact the election in the presence of the casual suitors as to deprive the county of its right for the time. But that the county court, however composed, was the 'plenus comitatus,' and that all persons present had the right of joining in the proceedings; seems certain from the wording of the statute, and the statute does not appear in these points to have made any change in law or usage. The petition of 1376, asking that the representatives might be chosen from among the better people of the shire, implies that the election was often carried through in their absence¹; the act of 1430 declares that it was often dispatched by the rabble²; the variations of the writs show that the persons whose influence was most dreaded were lawyers and promoters of litigation. The petition of 1376 again shows that the sheriffs exercised an influence which threw the electoral right of the suitors into the shade³; the act of 1382, which forbids the sheriff to omit the regular cities or boroughs from his returns⁴, proves that his influence was used even to extinguish the right of certain boroughs to return representatives; a petition of Rutland in 1406 shows that he was able county, as distinguished from the sheriff's tourn which was to be attended by all residents. The three weeks or six weeks or monthly court is certainly the one meant by the next county court; but it could hardly be regarded as a full county court if it contained only the persons legally liable to attendance, who were allowed moreover under the statute of Merton to appear by their attorneys. The reasons for holding that originally the fullest assembly of the shire was intended are given above, vol. ii. pp. 238 sq. If the theory of the Lords' Report went no further, it might be accepted as stating one at least of the intelligible ways in which the franchise was lodged in the hands of the freeholders; but the report inclines to the belief that the freeholders electing were freeholders holding directly under the king (p. 151), and that accordingly the article of Magna Carta ordering the general summons of the minor tenants was carried into effect. It is evident however that the elections were attended by many who were not freeholders, or even proper suitors. The subject is obscure, and the customs were probably various. On the theory maintained in vol. ii, the original electors under Edward I were the persons legally constituting the county court, all landowners and from every township the reeve and four men; before the close of the reign of Edward III the whole body of persons assembled made the election whether they were legal suitors or not; the act of 1406 does not venture to alter this, but that of 1430 reestablishes the right of the freeholders, although only in the persons of the 40s. freeholders.

¹ Rot. Parl. ii. 355; above, vol. ii. p. 453.

² Above, p. 265.

³ Above, vol. ii. p. 453.

⁴ Stat. 5 Rich. II, Stat. 2, c. 4.

occasionally to return members who had not been duly elected¹.

On any theory the conclusion is inevitable that the right of electing was not duly valued, that the duty of representation was in ordinary times viewed as a burden and not as a privilege; that there was much difficulty in finding duly qualified members, and that the only people who coveted the office were the lawyers who saw the advantage of combining the transaction of their clients' business in London with the right of receiving wages as knights of the shire at the same time. Thus, whilst in theory the right of election was so free that every person who attended the county court might vote, in practice the privilege was not valued, the power of the sheriff, and of the crown exercised through him, was almost uncontrolled in peaceful times, and in disturbed times the whole proceeding was at the mercy of faction². This is of course a view of the worst phase of the business: no doubt in many cases the sheriffs were honest and faithful men, and the elections were duly held, but custom and not law prescribed the process, and until the act of 1406 neither law nor custom remedied the abuse.

421. This consideration enables us to see the importance of the one change introduced by the act of Henry IV. It directs that after the election the names of the persons chosen 'shall be written in an indenture under the seals of them that did choose them;' this indenture is to be tacked to the writ and is to be holden as the sheriff's return. By this rule the arbitrary power of the sheriff is directly abolished; the return is made essentially by the voters, and the crown is enabled by examining the indenture to see at once the character of the persons who have taken part in the election. The indenture itself was not new; under that name or under the name of 'pannel' the sheriff's return had from the first been endorsed on or sewed to the writ; the novelty was in the security which the form of the indenture gave to the authenticity of the return.

A great number of these indentures are preserved³, and from

The privilege of representation not sufficiently valued Change under Henry IV.

Law for the return to be made on an indenture between the sheriff and the electors.

Importance of the indentures.

¹ See below, p. 436.

² See below, p. 429.

³ See Prynne, Reg. ii. 128-132; iii. 173-177, 252-312.

these some inferences more or less conclusive may be drawn. We must take it for granted that the persons who sealed the indenture were those who were specially cited by the sheriff, or drawn from the same class of society; and that the ordinary suitors or the persons who attended in consequence of any general proclamation must be regarded as included in the term 'plures alios' or 'cum multis aliis,' or 'in pleno comitatu,' in which the indenture embraces the residue of the electors¹.

Number of the persons sealing the indentures.

The number of persons who seal the indenture is in every case comparatively small: in 1407 the indenture for Cambridge was sealed by twelve persons, for Huntingdon by eight; in 1411 twelve join in the return for Kent, six 'cum multis aliis de communitate' for Derbyshire; in 1413 twenty-six persons elect for Wiltshire, thirty-four for Cornwall, twenty-four for Somerset; in 1414 fourteen elect for Cumberland, sixteen 'ex assensu totius communitatis' for Somerset, twelve for Kent, nineteen for Surrey, twenty-four for Sussex, eleven and many others for Warwickshire; in 1424, eighteen for Lancashire; in 1447, thirty-one for Gloucestershire, thirty for Surrey; the number of names rarely if ever exceeds forty.

Quality of the sealers.

The quality of the persons who seal the indenture is less easily tested. A comparison however of the names given in the indentures with the lists of sheriffs and knights of the shire for the respective counties seems to show that whilst a fair proportion of the electors belonged to the families that furnished sheriffs and knights, the majority of the names are of a less distinguished class; either ordinary squires who would not aspire to the office of sheriff, or, as possibly may be inferred from the character of the surnames, simple yeomen. Unfortunately the smallness of the number of indentures copied by Prynne makes it impossible to argue very confidently on this point.

Questions
as to the character in which they acted.

As for the character in which the persons who thus represent themselves as electors acted, opinions may differ. It is most probable that they acted primarily as certifying the return, and making themselves responsible for its correctness, and not as the only electors or as a body deputed by the county court to make the election for the whole constituency. Notwithstanding the terms of the act, directing that the indenture shall be sealed by all who have taken part in the election, it is certain that others who did not seal, and who probably had no seals, joined in it. One remarkable instance proves that such was occasionally the case, and suggests that it was also the rule.

¹ 'Plures alios;' see the indenture for Cornwall, Prynne, Reg. ii. p. 128; 'per assensum et consensum . . . et omnium aliorum fidelium ibidem existentium;' ibid. pp. 129, 130.

In 1450 the electors for Huntingdonshire suspected that the sheriff was going to make a false return, and accordingly sent in a letter to the king which is found in company with the return. The indenture contains the names of three squires and two other persons who with 'alii notabiles armigeri, generosi et homines libere tenentes qui expendere possunt quadraginta solidos per annum' had made the election. The letter to the king is sealed by 124 who declare that they, with 300 more good commoners of the same shire, had elected two knights; 70 others had voted for a person whom they regarded as disqualified by his birth¹. Besides the interest of this document, which is an important illustration of a contested election, it proves that whilst five names were sufficient for the indenture, 119 more were included in the general clause 'alii notabiles,' and that 300 more freeholders had voted in the majority against 70 in the minority. In the election then for this small county, which had in 1741 about 1600 voters, and in 1852 contained only 2892 registered electors, in 1450, 494 freeholders voted.

But although this case conclusively proves that the right of election was not exercised by those only who sealed the indenture, it is quite possible that in some instances they were delegated representatives of the whole body of suitors. In 1414 the indenture for Somersetshire states that the sealers made the election 'ex assensu totius communitatis²,' a form borrowed no doubt from the ancient return by the sheriff; but possibly implying that the election, like the ecclesiastical election 'per compromissionem,' passed through two stages. And although there are no words in the returns that imply such to

Election for Huntingdonshire in 1450.

In some cases the sealers may have been a committee for election.

¹ Prynn, Reg. iii. pp. 156-159.

² Ibid. p. 171.

have been the case, at the same time it must not be forgotten that the custom of electing committees for various purposes had long existed in the county courts, and that the analogy of the borough elections, which went sometimes through two or three stages of the kind, may have affected the county elections also. Here again no evidence is at present forthcoming. But there can be little doubt that the indenture was intended rather as a check on the sheriff than as a restriction on the body of electors: like the manucaption, it served to secure due compliance with the writ. Occasionally the sealers may have quietly 'cooked' the return. The same inference may be drawn from the fact that the borough members were occasionally returned by the same sealers as the knights of the shire: not that they were chosen by them, but that the return was certified by their authority. Unquestionably the power of the magnates whenever it was exerted, the influence of the crown exercised through the sheriff, the risk of popular tumult, and the persistence of local usage, as well as the freedom of the county courts, must be allowed to balance one another, and to affect the result.

The strangest instance of local usage is found in the indentures of return for Yorkshire, which are quite unlike those of the other counties, but so consistent with one another for a series of years as to prove continuity of usage¹. The indentures of the reigns of Henry IV and Henry V, and of Henry VI down to his twenty-third year, show that the electors who sealed the return were the attorneys of the great lords of the franchises. The indentures for 1411 and 1414² may

General object served by the indenture.

Indentures for the Yorkshire elections from 1407 to 1445.

¹ Pryne, Reg. iii. pp. 152-154, 155.

² The form in 1411 is this: The indenture made between the sheriff of the one part and the attorneys of the lords 'sectatorum communium [i.e. the lords] annuatim ad comitatum Ebor. de sex septimanis in sex septimanas, ex parte altera, testatur quod facta proclamatione per dictum vicecomitem in comitatu praedicto, virtute cujusdam brevis &c. &c. praedicti attornati unanimi assensu et voluntate in praedicto comitatu existentes et plenariam potestatem de sectatoribus praedictis separatim habentes, libere et indifferenter elegerunt duos milites,' &c. After the act of 1445 the form is changed: it then becomes an indenture between the sheriff and forty-three squires and others 'electores militum ad parlamentum,' &c.; but these persons still make the election 'unanimi assensu et consensu,' without any reference to the remainder of the county court.

serve as specimens of the series: in 1411 the electors are the attorneys of Ralph earl of Westmoreland, Lucia countess of Kent, Peter baron de Mauley, William baron de Roos, Ralph baron of Greystoke, Sir Alexander de Metham, and Sir Henry Percy; they represent their masters as common suitors to the county court of Yorkshire from six weeks to six weeks; in 1414 the indentures are sealed by the attorneys of the archbishop of York, the earl of Westmoreland, the earl Marshall, the lord le Scrope of Masham, Peter de Mauley, Sir William Metham, the lord de Roos, Margaret lady Vavasour, and Henry Percy. These indentures differ from the others not only in the character of the electors but in the nature of the interest they represent; for in the other counties it is rarely that any one above the rank of esquire appears as a party to the election. One conclusion that can be safely drawn is that the sheriff of Yorkshire in 1411 understood the writ differently from the other sheriffs, and that his successors followed slavishly in his steps. Of course it is possible that the Yorkshire county court jurisdiction may have been long broken up among the courts of the wapentakes and great franchises, so that recourse in petty causes was seldom had to it; and it will be remembered that in 1220¹ the stewards of the lords were the leading members of it. But although the great size of the county, and of the private jurisdictions embraced in it, may have led to such an attenuation of the six weeks' court, the assizes of the justices were always largely attended, and there could have been no difficulty in assembling a very large body of yeomen freeholders. The simplest solution is to view the return simply as a certificate of an uncontested election. The anomaly, whatever its cause, was remedied by the act of the 23rd Henry VI; after which date the returns were made in the common form.

The changes in the forms of the county elections made by the later Lancastrian legislation may be briefly stated: the act of 1410 placed the conduct of the elections under the cog-

Yorkshire elections.

Curious features of these returns.

Legislation
under the House of Lancaster on elections.

Prynne seems to imply that the first form was followed down to 1445, but he gives no instances between 1429 and 1447.

¹ Vol. ii. p. 225.

nisance of the justices of assize and established the penalty of £100 on the sheriff, and forfeiture of wages as the punishment of the members unduly returned¹; the act of 1413² enforced residence as a qualification of both electors and elected; and that of 1427 gave the accused sheriff and knight the right to traverse the decision of the justices³. The act of 1430⁴, besides establishing the forty shillings freehold as a qualification for electors, gave the sheriff power to examine on oath the persons who tendered their votes, as to the extent of their property; and that of 1432 ordered that the freehold qualifying the elector should be situated within the county⁵. By the act of 1445 it is further ordered that the sheriff shall send to the magistrates of the several cities and boroughs within their counties a precept for the election to be made by the citizens and burgesses and returned by indenture between them and the sheriff⁶; the penalty on the negligent sheriff is £100 to the king

Precepts for borough
elections.

Penalties for non-observance.

¹ See above, p. 264; St. 11 Hen. IV, c. 1; Statutes, ii. 162.

² St. 1 Hen. V, c. 1; Statutes, ii. 170.

³ St. 6 Hen. VI, c. 4; Statutes, ii. 235. There is a good example of the form of the precept in Prynne, iii. 291.

⁴ St. 8 Hen. VI, c. 7: 'que les chivalers des countes deins le roialme D'engleterre a esliers a venir a les parlementz en apres a tenirs, soient esluz en chescun counte par gentz demeurantz et receantz en icelles dount chescun ait frank tenement a le valu de xls. par an al meins outre les reprises; et que ceux qui serront ensy esluz soient demeurantz et receantz deins mesmes les countes; et ceux qui ont le greindre nombre de yeuxl que poient expendre par an xls. et outre, come desuis est dit, soient retournez par les viscontz de chescun countee chivalers pur le parlement par endenturs ensealles parentre les ditz viscontz et les ditz elisors ent affaires; et eit chescun viconit d'Engleterre poair par auctorite suisdite examiner sur les seintz Evangelies chescun tiel elisor come bien il poet expendre par an;' Statutes, ii. 243.

⁵ St. 10 Hen. VI, c. 2; Statutes, ii. 273.

⁶ The statute of 1445 states that of late divers sheriffs have not made due election, or returned good and true men; sometimes no return has been made of the persons really chosen, but persons have been returned who have not been chosen; and the returns of the boroughs have been altered by the sheriffs; they have sent no precept to the boroughs, and the penalties were not sufficient to insure obedience. And this neglect has resulted from the use of the words in the writs 'quod in pleno comitatu tuo eligi facias pro comitatu tuo duos milites et pro qualibet civitate in comitatu tuo duos cives et pro quolibet burgo in comitatu tuo duos burgenses.' It will appear probable that on the use of these words was based the custom of electing town members in the county court, noticed on the following page. See St. 23 Hen. VI, c. 14; Statutes, ii. 340. Compare the petition of 1436, below, p. 429. Unfortunately, for the election of 1445, the returns of only one county, Norfolk, are forthcoming; Return of Members, p. 334.

and £100 to the offended party, on the negligent mayor or bailiff £40 to each; the hours of the elections are fixed between eight and eleven in the morning; the persons to be elected are not to be of or below the degree of yeoman¹; and these directions are to be inserted in the writs. If we may argue from the later indentures none of these regulations made much change in the form of the proceedings: the same class of men seal the returns before and after the act of 1430, and the same class of men are returned before and after the legislation of 1445.

Exclusion of yeomen from being returned.

422. The variations of the process of city and borough elections are, if not more extensive, at least more intelligible than those of the county elections; the electoral bodies were more definitely constituted and the factors more permanent. Yet the historical difficulties of the subject are very great, and the materials for a trustworthy conclusion very scanty.

City and borough
elections.

As it would seem certain that the formal election of the borough members took place, in some instances, in the county court², and as the returns were made in the same document as those of the knights of the shire³, the causes which disturbed the regular and orderly elections of the latter, influence, custom and faction, would also affect those of the former; and to these was added the fact that many towns felt a great reluctance to send members at all, and so to put themselves to the cost of their wages and acknowledge themselves liable to the higher rate of taxation. Accordingly in some of the earlier returns it is possible that the sheriff, or the persons who joined with him in electing the knights of the shire, elected the borough members also⁴; that both were elected 'in pleno comitatu' in a very

Power of the sheriff to omit boroughs.

¹ In 1447 the indenture for Surrey is in English, and the sealers say that they 'as notable squires and gentlemen,' have elected: Sussex makes a like return in Latin; Prynne, Reg. iii. 173, 174.

² Dr. Riess, Geschichte der Wahlrechts zum Englischen Parlament, has clearly pointed out that this was not the rule, p. 59: cases in which it was done are given in Prynne, Writs, iii. 175 sq., 255 sq. Prynne's conclusion is that in sundry counties it was the usual custom; ib. p. 252: he gives instances of the usage in Hunts, Cambridge, Devon, Dorset, Somerset, Surrey, Sussex, and Warwick, pp. 255-261; Cumberland, Gloucester, Kent, and Wilts, pp. 176-178.

³ See the form of return of the reign of Elizabeth; Prynne, ii. 136-138: and cf. iii. 175 sq.; Acts of Privy Council, 1559; vol. vii. p. 41.

⁴ Returns made by the bailiffs of places where the bailiffs had the perfunctory way ; and that the sheriff omitted towns that he wished to favour and exercised that irresponsible authority which the statute of 1382 was intended to abolish¹. But as a rule it is more probable that a delegation of burghers from each town attended the county court or the sheriff himself, and either announced to the sheriff their own choice made on the spot, or declared the names of those whom their townsmen had chosen in their own town-meeting. From the returns of the reign of Edward II it is clear that the sheriff communicated the royal writ to the towns of his county and awaited their answer, before recording the names of their members ; if they neglected to answer he noted the fact on the writ². And this may be regarded as the legal method of proceeding ; the town authorities received notice to prepare for the formal election at the time when they were cited to the county court. This notice or mandate of the sheriff to the towns was known as the sheriff's precept, and we learn from the act of 1445 that although at that date many of the sheriffs neglected to send the precept to their boroughs, the rule that it should be done was held binding, and by that act it was enforced³. However negligently or perfunctorily then the sheriff might conduct the business, the legal plan varied little ; it was his duty to transmit a copy of the writ with his precept to the town magistrates ; they superintended the real election ; and by their messengers or deputies the returns, are in Parl. Writs, i. 67 ; and others made by the sheriff where no such intermediate transaction took place, ib. i. 70, 75. Instances in which the return for the boroughs was made not only in the county court but by the sealers of the indenture of the knights are given by Prynne, Reg. iii. pp. 175 sq. Possibly these were the sole electors and the boroughs had neglected their duty, but far more probably the return is to be regarded as a mere certificate of election.

¹ See above, vol. ii. p. 648.

² A very good instance of this practice occurs in 1322 ; the sheriff of Suffolk gives on a schedule annexed to the writ not only the names of the elected members and their manucaptors, but the names of the bailiffs of the boroughs who sent in the returns. The next year the same plan is adopted, and, one of the elected knights not having a manucaptor, the sheriff issued a 'precept' to the steward of the liberty of S. Edmund's, who replied that the knight in question was away on duty in the north ; Prynne, Reg. iii. 181-184. The 'precept' is the document by which the sheriff directs the execution of the writ. The common return by the sheriffs 'Ballivi nullum mihi dederunt responsum' proves that this was the rule.

³ See above, p. 426.

Borough elections reported in the county court.

The writ notified to the borough officers.

The sheriff's precept.

Sheriff's precept ordered by law.

formal announcement, or declaration of return, was made to the sheriff or in the county court; and the same messengers or deputies, after the act of 1406, were parties to the indenture of return. Of the part of the work done in the county court the indenture for Dorsetshire in 1414 may be taken as an illustration; in that year in the shire moot the members for Dorchester were elected by the assent of the whole community of the borough of Dorchester by burghers of the town; those for Bridport by four burghers of Bridport; and those of the rest of the towns in exactly the same way; all are returned on one indenture, but the process takes place in each case uniformly¹; four representative burghers attend, like the four men and the reeve in the ancient folk moots, and on behalf of their neighbours transact the business of the day. That business may have been the primary election; but in many cases and perhaps in all it was only the report of the election made at home. It is probable that in the larger and better organised towns this formality was always observed, whilst in those which had no chartered government the sheriff would be left to manage the election as he pleased. It certainly appears from a petition presented in 1436, that the interference of the sheriffs in the town elections was both arbitrary and vexatious; they returned members who had not been duly elected; the commons prayed that they might be compelled to do right, or be fined².

Instance of the borough elections returned on the indenture.

When the time comes for the ancient towns of England to reveal the treasures of their municipal records, much light must be thrown upon the election proceedings of the middle ages. At present what little is known of them is to be gathered from a few scattered sources; but it would appear certain that the whole order of proceeding rested upon local usage and might be altered by local authority, and that the rule adopted in the municipal elections of the particular town was generally followed. The custom of London in the reign of Edward I, described in a former chapter, was that the election should be made by the mayor, the aldermen and four Uncertainty as to the customs of boroughs in the matter of elections.

London elections.

¹ Prynne, Reg. iii. p. 255.

² Rot. Parl. iv. 511.

London
elections.

or six good men of each ward¹; a method likewise adopted for the election of the mayor himself. In 1346 an ordinance was passed in the city directing that twelve, eight, or six persons from each ward should come to the assemblies for electing the mayor, sheriffs, and members of parliament. In 1375 another change took place; the elections were to be made by the common councilmen, and the common councilmen were to be nominated by the trading companies. Notwithstanding an alteration made in the appointment of common councilmen, the elections were transacted, from this date to the fifteenth year of Edward IV, by a body summoned by the lord mayor from a number of persons nominated for the purpose by the companies; and in the latter year the franchise was formally transferred to the liverymen of the companies².

Custom at Bristol.

It can hardly be supposed that the smaller chartered cities whose privileges were modelled on those of London would follow these changes, but the earlier custom might very well be followed in places like Oxford. At Bristol, after the town was made a county by Edward III, the election seems to have followed the custom of the county elections; accordingly, when the forty shillings suffrage was established the members were returned by the forty shillings freeholders only³; of these from twenty to thirty seal the indentures; it may be inferred that the proceeding was direct and went through only one stage. At York, which was likewise a county, a somewhat similar practice appears as soon as there is any direct evidence, in the reign of Elizabeth. On October 28, 1584, thirty-six freeholders and commoners appeared and heard the writ in the council chamber; they then went into the exchequer court and voted privately; four names, the result of this conclave,

Elections
at York.

Double process of election at York.

¹ See above, vol. ii. p. 244. The London election of 1296 is described in Parl. Writs, i. 49; that of 1300, ib. p. 85. In 1314, the mayor, aldermen, and probi homines of each ward chose three citizens, out of whom the mayor and aldermen chose two; and the commons three, of whom again they chose two; these four or two of them had full powers given them; ib. II. i. 129; yet only two were summoned in the writ.

² See below, chap. xxi; Norton, Commentaries on London, pp. 114, 115, 126.

³ Prynn, Register, iii. pp. 360, 368.

were laid before the assembled freeholders, who chose two by a majority of votes; on the 9th of November the names were submitted to and approved by the county court of the city¹. Traces of the same form may be found in the earlier York records, although in 1484 the proceedings seem to have occupied but one sitting of the council², and there is no notice of any approbation of the county court; earlier still, in 1414, the indenture shows that the lord mayor and thirteen 'co-citizens,' having full power from the whole community, chose two citizens³. Unfortunately the ambiguity of the word 'community' deprives this and many other similar instances of any great significance. Other instances seem to suggest that the favourite way of making the election was a double one; a small committee or jury of electors was chosen, or otherwise nominated, or a pretaxation was made by the ruling officers of the community. At Leicester, from the time of Edward IV to the Restoration, the mayor and twenty-four chose one member, the commons the other⁴. At Norwich in 1414 agreement was made that the election should be made by the common assembly and reported in the county court⁵. At Shrewsbury in 1433 it was agreed that the burgesses should be chosen in the same way as the auditors; that is, after three peals of the common bell, by the assembled commons, and not by a bill 'afore contrived in disceit of the said commons⁶.' At Worcester in 1466 the rule was that the members should be chosen openly in the Guildhall by the inhabitants of the franchise, 'by the most voice, according to the law and to the statutes in such case ordained, and not privily⁷.'

Elections at Leicester, Norwich,

Shrewsbury, and Worcester.

In towns of simple constitution the election may have been transacted by the older machinery of the leet; and the leet jury would elect the members. In others it was very complex.

¹ Drake, Eboracum, pp. 358, 359.

² Davies, York Records, pp. 138, 144, 181, 184. In 1482 the entry is, 'Dec. 13, &c. At thys day be the advise of the holl counsell my lord the mair, Richard York, and John Tong war chosyn citizins and knights of the parlement for this honorabill cite and the shir of the same;' p. 138.

³ Prynne, Reg. iii. 268.

⁴ Nichols' Leicestershire, i. 432.

⁵ Blomfield's Norfolk, ii. 95.

⁶ Rot. Parl. iv. 478; v. 175.

⁷ Smith's Gilds, p. 393.

Complex elections at Lynn and Cambridge.

At Lynn in 1384 the members were elected by John a Titles-hall and eleven others forming a jury¹. How this jury was chosen we learn from the Lynn records of 1432 and 1433: the mayor, with the assent of the town meeting, nominated two of the twenty-four, and two of the common council; these four chose four more, two out of each body; and these eight co-opted two more, and the ten two more; these twelve, being sworn according to custom to preserve the liberty of the town, chose two burgesses to go to parliament². A similar rule was adopted at Cambridge, whence probably it had been borrowed by Lynn; in 1426 the members were elected by a select body of eight burgesses; this election by eight is described in the year 1502: the mayor and his assessors nominated one person, and the commonalty another, these two elected eight, and the eight elected the members. The custom had been maintained, and is called the custom of the borough, notwithstanding an ordinance of the corporation made in 1452 directing that the election of the burgesses of the parliament should be made 'by the most part of the burgesses in the guildhall at the election, and not one for the bench by the mayor and his assistants and another by the commonalty as of old time hath been used³.'

Variety of qualification of voters.

These instances are sufficient to prove that the exercise of the local franchise was a matter of local regulation until the cognisance of elections was claimed and recognised as a right and duty of the house of commons. As it is difficult even conjecturally to realise the formal process of the election, it is more difficult to say in whom the right of suffrage in the boroughs was supposed to lie: the whole of our mediæval

¹ Beloe, Our Borough, p. 25.

² '1433, June 17. The king's writ was then publicly read for electing members of parliament. And for electing them the mayor called two of the twenty-four and two of the common council, which four chose two more of the twenty-four and two of the common council, and they chose four others, who all unanimously chose John Waterden and Thomas Spicer to be burgesses in parliament.' 1437, Jan. 7, a similar election was held, the mayor nominating the first two by the assent of the whole congregation; Extracts from the Records of Lynn, Archæologia, xxiv. 320. Very full and interesting details of the proceedings at the Lynn elections will be found in the Appendix, part iii, to the eleventh report of the Historical MSS. Commission.

³ Cooper, Annals of Cambridge, i. pp. 173, 205, 272.

history scarcely furnishes more than one or two instances of a contested county election: the town histories too are nearly silent. And the differences and difficulties, which arise as soon as political life wakes again in the seventeenth century, show that this obscurity is not new. The franchise, as soon as its value was ascertained, became a subject of dispute between different classes of men, or different candidates for the representation, in every town: the great addition of borough members to the house of commons, caused by the measures of the Tudor sovereigns, brought an influx of strange novelties; the old towns which had never been troubled with a contest had no precedents of custom to allege; in some instances the rules for municipal elections were applied to the parliamentary elections, in others the custom of the county courts was followed, and in others the inhabitants were left to follow their own political instincts of freedom or repression. The increased strength and exclusiveness of the corporations in the chartered towns had in some instances withdrawn the choice of the members altogether from the body of townsmen: in others the weakness of the magistrates had let it slip altogether into the hands of the freemen. In all cases the elections were becoming direct and primary.

Obscurity arising from diversity of qualification.

It is impossible to argue back from the parliamentary judgments of the seventeenth century to the practice of the middle ages: but, as it is improbable that any completely new system of franchise was introduced in the sixteenth century, we may briefly indicate the several theories or customs which are found in working when our knowledge of the subject begins. The most ancient, perhaps, of the franchises was that depending on burgage tenure; this was exactly analogous in origin to the freeholder's qualification in the counties; but as the repressive principle extended, the right of a burgage vote had become in many places attached to particular houses or sites of houses, probably those which were originally liable for a quota of the firma burgi; in others the right still belonged to the whole body of freeholders; and this may be regarded as a second sort of franchise. A third custom placed the right to vote in the

Illustrations from more modern procedure.

Diversities of franchise.

freemen of the borough, or of the guild which was coextensive with the borough; the character of a freeman being personal and not connected with tenure of land or contribution to the public burdens. A fourth gave the electoral vote to all householders paying scot and lot; that is, bearing their rateable proportion in the payments levied from the town for local or national purposes. A fifth lodged the right in the hands of the governing body, the corporation; the constitution of which again varied from comparative freedom in one place to oligarchic exclusiveness in another. The newer the constitution of the town was, the less liberal the constitution seems to have been, and several places, which must in early times have enjoyed fairly free institutions, had, by accepting new charters, lost their liberties, at all events in this particular. As the towns were constantly purchasing new charters, the perpetual changes in their constitutions add a further element of difficulty to our inquiry; but it is obvious that the tendency to restriction set in from the first institution of charters of incorporation in the fifteenth century. The ancient cities of Winchester and Salisbury saw their electoral rights confined to the small body of the corporation, sixty in one and fifty-six in the other¹. Old Sarum retained the burgage franchise, its desolation saving it from a new charter. Twenty-three persons returned the members for Bath. But for our purpose no further conclusions need be drawn from such premises. The antiquity of the borough was no guarantee for its freedom; its municipal symmetry no security for the soundness of its political machinery. Aylesbury, a new borough of Mary's creation, did not even care to maintain its corporate character, and in the days of Elizabeth the lord, or even the lady, of the manor returned the members². Aldborough and Boroughbridge, two boroughs in

Changes in particular places.

Anomalies not to be reduced to rule.

¹ These and the following instances will be found, illustrated by the reports of the election committees of the house of commons upon them, in Browne Willis's Notitia Parliamentaria, in Carew on Elections, in the Appendices to the Royal Kalendars of the last century, and in local histories generally. The primary authority of course is the Commons' Journals.

² In 1572 Dame Dorothy Packington, lady of the manor, returned the two members; Return of Members, p. 407.

the same parish, had different franchises; scot and lot gave the right in one, burgage tenure in the other. Both of these were members of the great liberty of Knaresborough, and that town also returned two members and retained the burgage vote. In the Cinque Ports, where at least symmetry might have been looked for, equal variation is found; at Hastings, Dover, Sandwich, Rye and Seaford, the constitution was open; at New Romney, Winchelsea and Hythe, it was closed. These anomalies grew up in the new boroughs as well as in the old ones: the older and larger cities, with the exceptions already noted, maintained their liberties; Norwich, Bedford, Reading, Cambridge, Gloucester, Northampton, Newcastle-on-Tyne, Coventry, and York, retained the scot and lot franchise. But every borough has had a history that was all its own; and some had constitutions and mixtures of franchise as confused as their obscure history.

423. Medieval history records little about contested or disputed elections. In an age when the office of representative was regarded rather as a burden than as a privilege, it is not surprising to find that contested and disputed returns were caused rather by the difficulty of finding candidates than by the rivalry of the competitors themselves. Such was the case in the early days of parliament; in 1321 the mayor of Lincoln writes to the Keeper of the Rolls of parliament, that one of the two elected members, who had gone so far as to assent to his election, would not deign to attend the parliament¹. But the sheriff was generally the person to blame. In 1319 Matthew of Crauthorn, who had been elected by the bishop of Exeter, and Sir William Martyn, by the assent of the other good people of the county, to be knight of the shire for Devon, petitioned the council against the undue return made by the vice-sheriff, who had substituted another name; Crauthorn obtained a summons for the offending officer to answer for the false return in the Exchequer². In 1323 it was alleged by the grand jury of West Derby wapentake that William le Gentil, when sheriff, had early disputed elections.

Cases of

The sheriff in fault in Devon, and Lancashire.

¹ Parl. Writs, II. i. 252. They had elected Henry de Hakethorn and Thomas Gamel; Thomas would 'ne se deygne venir pur riens que nous savons faire;' so they had chosen Alan of Huddleston instead.

² Prynne, 4th Inst. p. 31; Hallam, Middle Ages, iii. 109.

returned two knights of the shire without the consent of the county, whereas they ought to have been elected by the county; he had also levied twenty pounds for their wages, although the county could have found two men who would have gone to parliament for ten marks or ten pounds; his predecessor, Henry de Malton, had done the same¹. In 1362 the county of Lancashire was again in trouble: the king wrote to tell the sheriff that there was a great altercation concerning the last election, and directed him to hold an examination in full county court as to the point whether the two persons named in the return were duly elected; and, if they were, to pay them their wages; if not, to send in the names of the persons who had been so elected. On examination it was found that the two knights whose names had been returned were themselves the lieutenants of the sheriff; they had kept the writ, returned themselves without election, and levied the wages to their own use: the king, puzzled apparently at so impudent a pretension, had to apply to the justices of the peace to ascertain the facts and stop the proceedings of the sheriff². In 1384 the burghers of Shaftesbury petitioned the king, lords and commons, in respect of their election; the sheriff of Dorset had substituted the name of Thomas Camel for that of Thomas Seward, whom, with Walter Henley, they had elected, and whom the sheriff believed to be too much devoted to the king; and they prayed a remedy³. In 1385 the bailiffs of Barnstable refused to pay the wages of John Henrys, one of their members, alleging that he was not a native or landowner in their county, and that without their assent or knowledge he had been returned by the sheriff, at the pressure of his friends and for the sake of gain⁴. In 1404 the county of Rutland elected John Pensax and Thomas Thorpe; the sheriff returned John Pensax and William Ondeby; on a representation made by the house of commons to the king, the lords were directed to examine the parties; Thorpe was declared duly elected; the sheriff was ordered to amend the return and

Contested elections.

Shaftesbury.

Rutland.

¹ Parl. Writs, II. pt. i. p. 315.

² Prynne, Reg. iv. p. 259; Hallam, Middle Ages, iii. 109.

³ Return of Members, p. 220; Prynne, Reg. iv. p. 1114; Carew, on Elections, p. 118.

⁴ Return of Members, p. 225.

removed from office¹. In 1429 it is recorded that Nicolas Styvecle and Roger Hunt were elected for Huntingdonshire by the 'homines generosi' of the county, Robert Stoneham and William Wauton having been previously improperly elected by non-residents of the county and their election being consequently void². The case however which is most closely parallel to more modern usage is that which has been already noticed as illustrating the proceedings at elections. In 1450, in Huntingdonshire, the sheriff returned two knights, Robert Stoneham and John Styvecle; but annexed to the indenture of return was a memorial from 124 freeholders, who declared that they, with more than 300 good commoners of the shire, had voted for Stoneham and Styvecle, whilst seventy others had voted for one Henry Gimber, a man not of 'gentill birth' as the royal writ prescribed; their right was clear, but, the under-sheriff having attempted to hold an examination on oath, Gimber's friends had threatened a riot; not knowing how the sheriff would act, the memorialists had determined to make the matter sure; fortunately for himself the sheriff had made the right return³. No doubt the sheriff frequently had hazardous work; in 1439 no return was made for Cambridgeshire; the sheriff was called up and ordered to publish the writ with a prohibition against the appearance of armed men at the election; it may be fairly inferred that the former election had been prevented by force⁴.

Huntingdonshire.

Precautions against a false return.

Case of no return made.

These few instances serve to illustrate the more general complaints against the sheriffs which are from time to time made the basis of legislation on this point. They further show that the house of commons had not yet thought of asserting any claim to determine the validity of elections. Until the act of 1406 the sheriff had to return the writ in full parliament; and

Right of determining disputed elections.

¹ Rot. Parl. iii. 530; Hallam, Middle Ages, iii. 110: the other case noticed by Hallam, the election of Camoys a baron and banneret as member for Surrey, and that of Berners, who was elected for Surrey when he was already knight of the shire for Kent, are not cases of disputed election but of the choice of disqualified persons; Prynn, Reg. ii. 118, 119.

² Return of Members, p. 316.

³ Prynn, Reg. iii. 157.

⁴ Prynn, Reg. ii. 139; Hallam, Middle Ages, iii. 110. In 1453 the king had to write to the chancellor of the University not to allow the scholars to impede the election; Cooper, Annals, i. 206.

the king, in or out of parliament, took direct cognisance of complaints¹. After that Act the writ was returnable in Chancery, and by the Statute of 1410 the judges of assize were authorised to inquire into the undue returns. But the validity of the return was still, it would seem, a question for the king to consider, with the help of the lords, as in the Rutland case, or with the help of the judges. The right of the commons was first distinctly asserted in 1586²: in 1604, in reference to the election for Buckinghamshire, the commons, in the apology addressed to James I, represented the question as one in dispute between their house and the chancery³: from the time of the Restoration to the Grenville Act in 1770 election petitions were determined by the whole house; that act provided for the formation and regulation of election committees; and very recent legislation has returned to something like the ancient practice by placing the determination of these disputes, and the infliction of penalties resulting from them, in the hands of select judges.

Claimed by the house of commons.

The persons elected to be resident.

Scarcely any point more forcibly illustrates the intention of the crown and of the legislature, to make the house of commons a really representative body, than the measures taken both in the writs and by statute to secure the election of persons bona fide resident among their constituents. From very early days the writ had ordered that the knights of the shire should be men of the county that elected them. The statutes of Henry IV and V enforced residence as a requisite for electors and elected alike, and that of Henry VI prescribed that the qualification of both must lie within the shire. The same rule applied to the boroughs. And it was for the most part strictly observed; the members were generally 'co-citizens' or 'com-burgesses'; for although the more strictly senatorial theory of modern times declared the statute of 1413 unfit to be observed⁴, the medieval communities were justly jealous of their relation to their paid representatives. At Lynn, and probably in other places, the members, after the session of Parliament was over, brought

The members give account of their work to their constituents.

¹ Prynne, Reg. ii. 119, 122.

² Hallam, Constitutional History, i. 274 sq.

³ Hatsell, Precedents, i. 233. ⁴ See Hallam, Middle Ages, iii. 119.

down a full account of its proceedings and reported them publicly. It was after the rise of the political jealousies of the Tudor times that strangers began to covet and canvass for the borough membership: and the statute of Henry V was then evaded by admitting them to the free burghership. Thus at Lynn, in 1603, Robert Hitcham, Esquire, elected Burgess for parliament is required to attend to be made a free Burgess of the town. In 1613, Hitcham and Sir Henry Spelman, two persons foreign to the town, prayed to be elected Burgesses¹. The corporation replied that they intended to act upon the statute of Henry V, and elected two of their neighbours. At Cambridge, in 1460, the magistrates, probably with the intention of warning off political candidates, published an ordinance directing that for the future no non-resident should be elected Burgess².

Strangers excluded from election.

Other measures of exclusion or restriction, the prohibition of the sheriffs, of lawyers, of maintainers, of ignoble persons, and the like, have been already noticed in our account of the writs; the points of social importance which are connected with them belong to another chapter.

Other restrictions.

424. When the process of election had been completed, provision was made for securing the attendance and competence of the newly-chosen representatives. For each of them manucaptors or bailsmen were provided, who were bound for their obedience to the writ, and the names of the manucaptors were entered in the return. This manucaption was intended to secure the attendance of the members. To assure their full powers, they had letters of commission or of 'ratihabition,' or powers of attorney, such as were usually furnished to proctors or representative officers³. After the Act of 1406 the import-

Security for the attendance of the members elected.

¹ Archaeol. xxiv. 372; Hist. MSS. Report xi. App. iii. p. 151.

² Cooper, Annals, i. 211.

³ The form in which the full powers were given was not always the same: in 1290 the sheriffs of Devon, Lincoln, and Northumberland mentioned in their returns the bestowal of the 'plena potestas;' Parl. Writs, i. 21-23. See also pp. 39, 41, 59, 60, 66 sq. The mayor and sheriffs of London gave their members a separate commission over and above the return endorsed on the writ, in 1304; Parl. Writs, i. 146; and afterwards; ib. II. i. 7, 30, &c. At Lynn in 1433 the election took place on Jan. 7: the letters of authority were sealed with the common seal, Jan. 16; and generally a few days after the election; Archaeol. xxiv. 321.

ance of the manucaption was much diminished, the names of the electors entered on the indenture of return being a sufficient warrant for the responsibility of the persons elected; but the indenture likewise contained an equivalent to a power of attorney. Besides this the assembly which elected the members frequently passed a vote determining the sum to be paid to them as travelling expenses or wages. This was done by the citizens of London in 1295 and by those of York in 1483; it may therefore have been continuously regarded as a grant in the power of the represented communities to determine; but the payment was also provided for by a royal writ, issued at the close of the session to the several sheriffs and bailiffs, which fixed the amount to be paid to each according to the number of days of session, the length of the journey, and a fixed rate per diem¹. The constituents seem in some cases to have made a bargain with their representatives to do the work for less.

Vote of wages by the constituents.

Assembly of the parliament.

425. The newly-elected knights, citizens and burgesses, thus bound over to appear, fully empowered, fairly well provided for, and further invested with the sanctity of ambassadors by the sacred privilege of parliament², took their journey to Westminster or the other place of meeting, and presented themselves before the king or his representative on the day fixed. Their writs were produced with them by the sheriff himself or his messenger, and this, with the letters of commission, completed the verification of their powers. At the appointed time and place they met the lords spiritual and temporal, and in the king's presence the parliament was constituted.

The ceremony of opening the parliament generally took place in the Painted Chamber³, where the king's throne was

¹ See below, § 447.

² See below, § 452.

³ The lords Ordainers in 1310 took their oath in the Painted Chamber; vol. ii. p. 340; and there in 1337 the king received the pope's ambassadors; Ad. Murim. p. 84. It is first mentioned, as the place of meeting of parliament, in 1340; Rot. Parl. ii. 107, 117; again in 1341, ib. p. 127; cf. vol. ii. p. 405. In 1343 the session opened in the Painted Chamber, April 30; the commons met in the same chamber May 12, the lords in the White Chamber; the next day both houses met the king in the White Chamber; Rot. Parl. ii. pp. 135, 136. The king met the two houses in the White Chamber in 1344; p. 148. In 1351 the two houses met in the 'Chambre Blanche pres de la Chambre Peynte' where the placed at the upper end; the bishops and abbots were arranged according to their proper precedence on the king's right hand, the lords temporal in their several degrees on the left; at the lower end of the room the knights of the shires and representative citizens and burgesses took their stand. In front of the throne were the wooolsacks on which the judges sat, and the table for the clerks and other officers of parliament. Occasionally the session is said to have been opened in the White Chamber, near the Painted Chamber, no doubt the room afterwards used for the house of lords. Henry VII used the Chamber of the Holy Cross. The king was almost always present in person; when he was not, the commission under which his representative, whether the regent of the realm or some great officer of state, acted, was read before the proceedings commenced¹. A proclamation to insure peace was also made in Westminster Hall.

Arrangement of the estates in the parliament chamber.

The king generally present.

The first act of the meeting was to call over the names of the elected knights, citizens and burgesses, so as to identify them with those returned by the sheriffs². Possibly the roll commission for opening the parliament was read, and afterwards in the Painted Chamber where the causes of summons were declared; ib. p. 225. In 1365 both met in the Painted Chamber, where the commons stayed, the king and lords returning to the White Chamber; ib. p. 283: after the lords had deliberated the commons were called in; p. 284: so also in 1366 and 1373; pp. 289, 316. In 1368 the commons sat in the lesser hall, p. 294. In 1382 the meeting was in a chamber 'arraiez pur parlement;' but the opening speech was made in the Painted Chamber; ib. iii. 132. In 1386 the impeachment of Michael de la Pole took place in the Chamber of Parliament; p. 216. In 1383 Nicolas Brember was sentenced in the White Hall; iii. 238.

The returns called over.

¹ In 1307 Edward I commissioned the bishop of Lichfield and the earl of Lincoln to open parliament at Carlisle; Parl. Writs, i. 184; in 1313 Edward II empowered the earls of Gloucester and Richmond; Rot. Parl. i. 448: see other cases ib. pp. 450, &c. Instances under Edward III are given by Prynne, Reg. i. 425 sq.; Rot. Parl. ii. 106, 225, &c. In 1316 William Inge, a justice, was ordered by the king to announce the cause of summons on the day of meeting: the proxies were then examined, petitions received, triers and auditors appointed; but the political business was delayed until the earl of Lancaster came; the king's place in the parliament being in the meantime supplied by a commission of lords. When the earl came, the cause of summons was again read and the estates retired to deliberate; Rot. Parl. i. 350, 351. This is important as being the form observed in the first extant Roll.

² In the parliament of Lincoln in 1316, the chancellor, treasurer, and a justice were appointed to examine the excuses and proxies of the absent of the lords summoned may have been called over at the same time. Such was the case in 1316 when they were dilatory in arriving, but the regular adoption of the practice may have been somewhat later. The statute of 1382¹ ordered an amercement to be laid on all who failed to obey the summons, but both before and after the passing of this act it frequently happened that lords and commons alike showed themselves unpunctual. In 1377, for instance, a few lords met in the White Chamber and waited until the late hour of noon for their brethren; it happened that many had not come to town, and some sheriffs had not sent in their returns; the king, who was kept waiting likewise, postponed the ceremony to the next day². This sometimes was done day by day for a week³. When however there was a sufficiently large muster, the names were called and the cause of summons⁴ declared in a solemn speech by the chancellor, by the Archbishop of Canterbury, the lord chief justice, or by some other great officer of state, at the command of the king⁵. The speech, of which many specimens lords, and to report to the king the names of those who had sent none or only insufficient excuses, 'ita quod ipse inde posset percipere quod deberet;' Rot. Parl. i. 350. The names of the lords were called over in 1344 for the king to learn who had come and who not; ib. ii. 147. For the proceedings in 1379, see Rot. Parl. iii. 55: in 1380 the knights of the shire, citizens, and burgesses were called by name; ib. pp. 71, 88: in 1384 it had become an established practice: 'nominatim invocatis prout moris est;' ib. 184.

¹ 5 Rich. II. st. 2. c. 4; Statutes, ii. 25; Rot. Parl. iii. 124. No oaths were taken until 1 Eliz.; Prynne, Reg. i. 406.

² Rot. Parl. iii. 1.

³ See instances in 1340; and almost every year of Richard II; Rot. Parl. ii. 107, 112, &c.

⁴ The first occasion on which the commons are expressly said to be present at the 'exposition' of the cause of summons is in 1339; Rot. Parl. ii. 103; cf. i. 350. In January 1340 the cause is specially declared to the commons; Rot. Parl. ii. 107. In March 1340 the cause is declared first to the lords specially, and then to the lords and commons generally; ib. p. 112. In July 1340 they are again mentioned as present. In April 1341 the cause is declared to the lords and council, but the commons seem to have been there; ib. p. 127.

⁵ In 1275 the chief justice Roger Seton stated the cause of summons; Cont. Gerv. ii. 281. In 1316 William Inge did it. From 1347 to 1363 the chief justice makes the opening speech; the chief justice of the Common Pleas in 1401; the archbishop of Canterbury in 1344, 1368, 1377, 1399, and 1422; the chancellor in 1343, 1363 (in English) and generally after 1368; the bishop of Winchester in 1410; the bishop of Lincoln in 1453 and 1467, the bishop of Rochester in 1472, and the keeper of the Privy Seal in 1431, supplied the place of the absent chancellor.

Fines on absentees.

Adjournment for fuller attendance.

have been given in the foregoing pages, usually began with a text of Scripture or some thesis chosen by the orator himself, and partook more or less of the nature of a sermon; the application of the doctrine came at the close, and generally contained a statement of the royal difficulties, a demand for supplies, and a promise of redress for grievances personal or national; immediately after this promise the king appointed receivers and triers of petitions and the two houses separated. Now and then a second speech was made to the conjoint assembly a day or two later by the chancellor or some officer of the household; and even a third exposition of the cause of summons was occasionally vouchsafed¹; but more frequently they separated on the first day; the commons being ordered to withdraw to their regular place of meeting and choose a speaker, and both estates being warned that they must get early to work. The morning hours were very precious; in 1373 the commons were directed to meet at the hour of prime; in 1376 and 1378 at eight; in 1397 and 1401 the chancellor fixed ten in the morning for the meeting in the Painted Chamber; in 1406 the commons were ordered to meet at eight, the lords an hour later; in 1413 the commons had to meet at seven and to present their speaker at eight². The apartment to which the commons usually withdrew was the Chapterhouse of Westminster Abbey³;

Opening speech or sermon.

Appointment of triers.

Withdrawal of the commons.

Their place of deliberation.

The longest recorded sermon is that of bishop Houghton in 1377; Rot. Parl. ii. 361: but Michael de la Pole made quite as long an address in 1383; ib. iii. 149, 150. See Elsyng, Ancient Method of holding Parliament, pp. 131 sq.

¹ In 1378, at the Parliament of Gloucester, the chancellor on two different days addressed the whole parliament, and the speaker of the commons had to repeat the main points of the speech to them; Rot. Parl. iii. 35. In 1381 the chancellor made the first statement; a day or two after, the treasurer repeated it, and a few days later lord le Scrope, the newly appointed chancellor, made a third exposition; Rot. Parl. iii. 98-100.

² Rot. Parl. ii. 316, 321; iii. 33, 338; iv. 9, 34, 495.

³ The first time that the commons were directed to withdraw to the Chapterhouse seems to be in 1352, when they were told to elect a committee to confer with the lords, and the rest to retire to the Chapterhouse and wait for their companions; they did not comply with the first direction, and so the second was superfluous; Rot. Parl. ii. 237; vol. ii. p. 444. The next time the Chapterhouse is mentioned is in 1376, when the commons, who had met generally in the meanwhile in the Painted Chamber (above, p. 440), were ordered to withdraw 'a lour aunciene place en la maison du chapitre de l'abbe de Westmostier;' Rot. Parl. ii. p.

which is termed in the Rolls their ancient and accustomed place; very often however they met in the Refectory, which was specially assigned for their use by Henry V in 1414 and 1416¹. The Chapterhouse was, until the reign of Edward VI, their withdrawing-room or place of separate deliberation. Their communications with the king or lords were held in the Painted Chamber, in the White Chamber, or in the Little Hall of the palace. Edward I, in 1297, is found gathering the knights in his own private chamber to obtain a separate vote of money²; the Black Prince, in 1372³, assembled the borough members in his chamber, when he wanted a vote of tunnage and poundage; and Henry VI, in 1450, after the impeachment of Suffolk, collected the lords 'in his inmost chamber with a Gavill window over a cloister within his palace of Westminster⁴.' But these are exceptional cases, and it is believed that, as a rule, the ordinary place for the session of the lords was the Chamber of Parliament or White Chamber, lying immediately south of the Painted Chamber; and that the Chapterhouse or Refectory was the recognised chamber of the commons.

Conferences with the king.

House of lords.

Historical question as to the division of the two houses.

426. At how early a date the two houses separated and began to deliberate apart is a question of considerable antiquarian interest, and was once debated with some acrimony⁵. The point looked at in the fuller light of published records becomes one of very small importance. If the proper incorporation of the three estates in parliament be allowed, as it now is, to date from the year 1295, the possible practice of earlier years becomes unimportant by way of precedent. That the baronage, whether assembled in parliament or not, could hold sessions apart from the clergy or the commons, is a fact as clear as that the clergy could and did meet apart

322; also in 1377; p. 363, iii. 3. In 1395 they were told to assemble in the Chapterhouse or Refectory to elect a speaker; p. 329; and they met in the Refectory in 1397; ib. 338.

¹ Rot. Parl. iv. 34, 94.

² Vol. ii. p. 141.

³ 'En une chambre pres la Blanche Chambre;' Rot. Parl. ii. 310.

⁴ Rot. Parl. v. 182.

⁵ See Prynn, Register, i. 233; Coke, 4 Inst. p. 4.

from the baronage. On the analogy of the clerical assemblies, it might seem a natural conclusion that the commons, from the year 1295, could meet and deliberate alone. But on the other hand the barons had their own assembly as a great council, and the clergy theirs in synod and convocation; the representatives of the commons had no such collective organisation; they never met but as an estate of parliament. The first place in which the parliament records distinctly notice a separate session is in the rolls of 1332¹, when the prelates, the lords temporal, and the knights of the shire are described as deliberating apart. The deliberations may have taken place in one chamber, in Westminster Hall possibly, but it is more probable that each body retired to a room of its own. The fact that money was voted by the different estates in different proportions might suggest even a wider distribution; possibly the prelates and clergy, the lords temporal, the knights of the shire, and the borough members, may have sat in four companies and in four chambers. In 1341 the 'grantz' and the commons seem to have definitely assorted themselves in two chambers²; and in 1352 the chapterhouse is regarded as the chamber of the commons³. The practice, then, of scarcely forty years is all that is touched by the question before us; and in the absence of any authoritative evidence from documents, together with the proved worthlessness of the modus tenendi parliamentum, on which alone the doctrine of the ancient union of the two

Probability that such division existed from the first incorporation of the commons.

¹ The notices which have been given above (vol. ii. p. 393) may be recapitulated here: in September 1331 the prelates, earls, barons, and other grantz 'conseilerent pur le mielz, uniement et chescun par lui severalment;' Rot. Parl. ii. 60. In March 1332 the prelates and proctors of the clergy debated by themselves, the earls, barons, and other grantz by themselves; ib. p. 64. In September 1332 the prelates by themselves, the earls, barons, and other grantz by themselves, and the knights of the shires by themselves; ib. p. 66; so also in December 1332; p. 67. In January 1333 a separate session of the lords, probably as the council, sat apart; the rest of the lords, and the proctors by themselves; the knights, citizens, and burgesses by themselves; ib. p. 69. In 1339, and ever after, the division into the two houses seems clear enough.

² 'Ad il chargez et priez en chargeante manere les ditz grantz et autres de la commune, qu'ils se treissent ensemble, et s'avisent entre eux; c'est assaver les grantz de par eux, et les chivalers des counteez, citeyns et burgeys de par eux;' Rot. Parl. ii. 127.

³ See above, p. 443, note 3.

Probability that the lords and commons always deliberated apart.

houses seems to rest, the theory of Prynne that the two never deliberated together is prima facie as tenable as that of Coke that they did. If, to go a step further, we give due weight to the influence of custom, and consider that, as soon as we have any evidence at all, we find the estates deliberating apart, we shall incline to the belief that they had done so from the beginning; or, in other words, that it was only in the presence of the king, or to hear a message from him, or when called together for special conferences, that the lords and commons ever formed parts of one deliberative assembly. Their arrangement in the two existing and historical chambers is another point, but the further we look back, more traces of division than of union seem to be discoverable.

Different usage in Scotland.

The Scottish Estates, throughout their parliamentary history, sat in one chamber and as one assembly; but, important as are the illustrations which may be drawn from Scottish constitutional history as to the usage followed in England at the moment that the sister kingdom adopted a particular practice, the growth of parliamentary institutions in Scotland is so different in character and so much later in time, that no inference can be drawn from it here. Our evidence for the division of the assemblies in England is almost, if not quite, as early as the evidence for any proper parliament in the northern kingdom.

Number of the two houses.

427. Of the numbers and special qualifications of the persons who composed what may by a slight anticipation be called the house of lords, not much has now to be added to what has been said in preceding chapters: and that little concerns points of dignity and precedence more than matters of constitutional importance. The house consisted of the lords spiritual and temporal, the 'prelatz et autres grantz,' and, more circumstantially, contained the prince of Wales, the archbishops and bishops, the abbots and priors of certain monasteries, the dukes, marquesses, earls, viscounts, and barons. Of these titles some are much more ancient than others, and all have some slight political significance. They may be taken in the order given.

Ranks among the lords.

The highest rank after the king himself belonged to the prince of Wales; and throughout medieval English history the prince of Wales is the only person who bears the territorial title of prince. Of the native princes of Wales, who became extinct shortly before the parliament took its permanent form, none is recorded to have been summoned to a council of the barons, although they were cited to do homage, and the last of them, David, the brother of Llewelyn, was tried and condemned before the English baronage. Edward I created his eldest son prince of Wales in 1301¹. Edward III never bore the title; the Black Prince in 1343 was invested as prince of Wales with a circlet, ring and rod: his son Richard, Henry of Monmouth, and the three Edwards, sons of Henry VI, Edward IV, and Richard III, bore the title, in each case by special creation either in parliament or by charter immediately reported to parliament. The eldest son of the king was likewise duke of Cornwall, a title which was created with that special settlement. He was also created earl of Chester, a dignity which since the accession of Henry IV was annexed to the principality. Richard II raised the earldom of Chester into the dignity of a principality to be held with Wales; but the act was repealed by Henry IV². Aquitaine was also constituted a principality for the Black Prince, but, although he was summoned to parliament by that designation, it can hardly be regarded as an English title. The rank of prince however is not the highest that has been borne by members of the English peerage. John Balliol, as an English baron, but also as king of Scotland, attended an English council in 1294; and Edward Balliol, as king of Scotland, was summoned to the parliaments of 1348 and 1349³. The lordship of Man was

The prince of Wales.

Scottish kings in parliament.

¹ On Feb. 7, 1301, the king granted to his son his lands in Wales and the earldom of Chester; and on the 10th of May he settled the lands on him and his heirs, by the name of prince of Wales and earl of Chester; Lords' Fifth Report, pp. 9-11. Edward I had himself held under his father Chester and part of North Wales, Perfeddwlad, between the Dee and Conway; the son is to hold his lands by the same service as Edward I had paid to Henry III.

The investiture of the Black Prince is described in the charter 'per sertum in capite et annulum in digito aureum ac virgam argenteam;' Lords' Fifth Report, p. 44; cf. p. 126.

² Lords' Fifth Report, p. 120; Rot. Parl. iii. 353.

³ Lords' Report, iv. 58, 577, 579.

The lords of Man and Wight.

accounted as a royalty and conveyed within the island itself certain sovereign rights¹; but, although from the reign of Edward III onwards it was held by an English lord, no lord or king of Man was ever summoned by that title. Henry duke of Warwick was, if we may believe the family chronicle, crowned king of the Isle of Wight, of Jersey and Guernsey, by Henry VI². The only other subjects who bore the sovereign title were Richard, earl of Cornwall and king of the Romans, and John of Gaunt, duke of Lancaster, king of Leon and Castille; both these, as a matter of courtesy doubtless, received their full titles in council or parliament³.

The dukes.

Cornwall and Lancaster.

428. Next in rank among the lords temporal were the dukes. This title, sufficiently well known to the English as the designation of foreign potentates, was first bestowed on a subject in 1337, when Edward III founded the dukedom of Cornwall as the perpetual dignity of the king's eldest son and heir-apparent⁴. The dukedom of Cornwall had been known for at least two centuries from the legendary history of Geoffrey of Monmouth. The duchy of Lancaster was founded in 1351 for the younger branch of the royal house, and refounded in 1362 in the person of John of Gaunt. In 1362 Lionel was made duke of Clarence. In 1385 the two younger sons of Edward III, Edmund of Langley and Thomas of Woodstock, were made dukes of York and Gloucester; in 1386 Robert de Vere was created duke of Ireland; and in 1397 Richard II created the dukedoms of Hereford, Norfolk, Surrey, Exeter and

¹ Man had been a kingdom, and was, in the hands of its English lords, a separate regality; but the title of king was not borne by them: and the great earl of Derby refused to assume the title of king, though he says that it had been borne by his ancestor the first of the Stanley lords of Man; see Peck's Desiderata Curiosa, pp. 431, 436. Cf. Fryne, 4th Inst. pp. 200-205.

² Mon. Angl. ii. 63; from the History of Tewkesbury: 'coronatur a rege in regem de Wight manu regia, et nominatur primus comes totius Angliæ.' The truth was that the lordship of the Isle of Wight was a regality, like that of the counties palatine; but the story rests on this evidence only. Coke, 4th Inst. p. 287.

³ John of Gaunt is summoned under the royal title as well as that of duke; Lords' Report, iv. 708.

⁴ See the grants in the Lords' Fifth Report; Cornwall by charter, p. 35; Lancaster for life, by patent, ib. p. 47; Clarence by charter, p. 53; Lancaster, p. 53; Ireland to Robert de Vere, ib. p. 79.

Aumâle or Albemarle. Of these, Norfolk and Exeter reappear in the later Plantagenet history. Under Henry VI Somerset was made a duchy for the Beauforts, Buckingham for the Staffords, and Warwick for Henry Beauchamp, the king's fellow pupil. In all these cases, except those of Clarence, Ireland, and Aumâle, the title is taken from either a county of England or a county town; of the exceptions the island of Ireland and the honour of Aumâle were distinctly territorial lordships; and the title of Clarence, obscure as it is, bore some reference to the ancient honour of Clare¹. All of them may be termed provincial or territorial designations. The forms of the investiture were not always alike, but it became the rule for a duke to be created by the girding on of the sword, the bestowal of a golden rod, and the imposition of a cap of maintenance and circlet of gold². The duke generally received a pension of forty pounds per annum on his promotion, which was known as creation money³.

Creation of dukes.

Their territorial designations.

Investiture and creation
money.

The dignity of marquess was of somewhat later growth and less freely bestowed. The title derived from the old imperial office of markgrave, 'comes marchensis,' or count of the marches, had belonged to several foreigners who were brought into relation with England in the twelfth century; the duke of Brabant was marquess of Antwerp, and the count of Maurienne marquess of Italy⁴; but in France the title was not commonly used until the seventeenth century, and it is possible that it came to England direct from Germany. Edward III had made the Creation of marquesses.

¹ The honour of Aumâle consisted of the baronies accumulated by that branch of the house of Champagne which bore the title of count, or earl, of Aumâle, and transmitted the title and honour through females until the middle of the fourteenth century. The chief possession of the house was the lordship of Holderness. The title of Clarence is sometimes, but fancifully and without any real authority, connected with Chiarenza in the Morea. See Finlay's Greece, iv. 192.

² John of Gaunt was made duke of Aquitaine 'per appositionem cappae suo capiti ac traditionem virgae aureae'; Lords' Fifth Report, p. 110: so also the dukes made in 1397, ib. p. 118; and the duchess of Norfolk, p. 119; cf. p. 171. The dukes of Warwick and Buckingham, in 1443, have the cap and the gold circlet also, p. 224.

³ See below, chapter xxi; Rot. Parl. iv. 308.

⁴ Selden, Titles of Honour, pp. 758-762. The title of marchio is given by William of Malmesbury to Brian Fitz Count, lord of Wallingford: it was often used loosely for count or duke.

Marquesses. margrave of Jülich earl of Cambridge; Sigismund, the brother of Anne of Bohemia, queen of Richard II, was margrave of Brandenburg. Richard made Robert de Vere marquess of Dublin¹, and, undeterred by the fate of the first who bore the title, he, in 1397, created John Beaufort marquess of Dorset. Having in 1399 shared the degradation of the dukes created by Richard on the same occasion, John Beaufort, in 1402, declined to be restored to his marquessate on the ground that it was a strange title, unfamiliar and unwelcome to English ears²; it was however revived in favour of his son Edmund, who was made marquess of Dorset in 1443; William de la Pole was made marquess of Suffolk in 1444; Edward IV made John Neville marquess of Montague, and gave the marquessate of Dorset to his stepson. The title was not legally and formally given, as it might have been, to the lords marchers or to the earl of March; and the fact that, within a century of its introduction into England, it was used in so unmeaning a designation as the marquess of Montague, shows that it had lost all traces of its original application. The marquesses were invested with the golden circlet and the girding of the sword, and from the year 1470 by the gift of the cap of maintenance. The creation money was thirty-five pounds³.

Investiture and creation
money.

The earls.

The ancient dignity of the earl has in former chapters been traced throughout its history. In very few instances was the title annexed to a simple town or castle, except in the case of the earldom of Arundel, which probably represents an earldom of the county of Sussex, of which the earl of Arundel received the third penny: the earl of Warenne in the same way was properly earl of Surrey, although he took his title from his Norman lordship; and the earls of Pembroke, of the house of

Their territorial designation.

¹ See the charter of creation, Rot. Parl. iii. 210; Lords' Fifth Report, p. 78; and the investiture 'per gladii cincturam et circuli aurei suo capiti impositionem,' ib. p. 77; John Beaufort was made marquess of Dorset 'per cincturam gladii' simply, ib. p. 117; Edmund Beaufort in 1443 has the circlet, ib. p. 241; and the marquess of Suffolk likewise, p. 251. Montague and Dorset have the cap and sword, ib. pp. 378, 403

² Rot. Parl. iii. 488.

³ Ibid. v. 308.

Clare, are frequently called earls of Striguil; otherwise the title throughout medieval history belongs to a county or the county town, although it involved no local authority. The earldom of March, which was the only exception to this rule, was endowed with a pension from the issues of the counties of Stafford and Salop, the latter of which was a march or border county. The earl's creation money, twenty pounds, was a Creation money, substitute for the third penny of the county, of which little is heard after the thirteenth century; and the retention of this payment probably suggested the bestowal of creation money on those who were raised to the newer ranks of peerage¹. The earl was created either by charter, or by patent, or by Form of creation and investiture. formal act in parliament, and was invested as of old by the girding of the sword². The cap and coronet were late additions.

The rank of viscount was a novelty in the fifteenth century; The viscounts. the first English peer who bore the title being the viscount of Beaumont, John, a lineal descendant of that Henry of Beaumont who took so prominent a part in the history of Edward II³. It was given him probably, as was the French viscounty which he likewise held, as the representative of the ancient viscounts of Beaumont in Maine, with the intention of securing to him a precedence over the older barons; the lord Bouchier, the next created viscount, was likewise earl of Eu in Normandy; John Talbot was made viscount de l'Isle in 1451, and the lord Berkeley was created viscount in 1481. The title has little or no meaning in English history, and in its Latin form was and is still used as the designation of the sheriffs of town or county.

The dignity and title of baron did not during the latter

¹ See grants of the third penny in the Lords' Fifth Report, pp. 1-17; letters patent for the earldom of Carlisle, p. 18; the charter for the earldom of Winchester, p. 18; of March, p. 21; Huntingdon, p. 29; Northampton, p. 30; the last two, by assent of parliament; see above, vol. ii. § 296. The third penny is mentioned in the grant of the Devonshire earldom to Hugh Courtenay in 1336, Lords' Fifth Report, p. 27; the creation money by Madox, Bar. Angl. p. 141; Rot. Parl. v. 308.

² See for instance the charter of creation of Michael de la Pole, earl of Suffolk, Lords' Fifth Report, p. 69.

³ Ibid. p. 235; Madox, Baronia, p. 143.

The barons.

middle ages undergo any change, further than was caused by the superposition of the new dignities of duke, marquess and viscount over it. The method of creation was to some extent affected by the same influences. The year 1295 has been marked as the point of time from which the regularity of the baronial summons is held to involve the creation of an hereditary dignity, and so to distinguish the ancient qualification of barony by tenure from that of barony by writ¹. As the earls and dukes of the reign of Edward III were created by patent or charter, and generally in parliament, the example was at some distance of time followed in the case of barons with a special designation of title. In 1387 Richard II created John Beauchamp of Holt a baron by patent², and in 1432 John Cornwall was created baron of Fanhope in parliament, his creation being subsequently confirmed by patent³. From the twenty-fourth year of Henry VI barons were generally made by patent⁴. The importance of the distinction seems to lie in the fact that the patent of creation defined the line in which the hereditary peerage was to run, generally to the heirs male of the body of the person promoted, whilst the barony created by ancient writ of summons may descend to heiresses. The political intention of the change has been differently interpreted: it has been regarded, on the one hand, as an attempt to establish the right of peerage on more than a mere prescriptive basis, and to control the royal power of continuing or discontinuing the issue of the summons to the heirs of former

Creations by patent.

Importance of the creation by patent.

Theories as to the creation of barons by patent.

¹ Vol. ii. pp. 189-192.

² Lords' Fifth Report, p. 81: 'in unum parium ac baronum regni.' There was no settled sum of creation money for a baron, nor any distinct form of investiture unless by robes; see Elsynge, Parliament, p. 36.

³ Lords' Fifth Report, p. 213: Ralph Boteler is made baron of Sudeley by patent in 1441; ib. p. 239: the lord L'Isle is made by charter in 1444; ib. p. 245: Beauchamp of Powick by patent; ib. p. 256: so also Rivers; p. 263.

⁴ In the 27 Henry VI Henry Bromfielde was created a baron by his writ of summons, which contained the words 'volumus enim vos et heredes vestros masculos de corpore vestro legitime exeuntes barones de Vescy existere;' Prynne, Reg. i. 229. In 1444 'by one of the most extraordinary charters on record, the barony of L'Isle of Kingston L'Isle was limited to the person created 'and to his heirs and assigns for ever being tenants of the manor of Kingston L'Isle;' Nicolas, Hist. Peerage (ed. Courthope), p. 291.

recipients, a practice tending to make the balance of the house of lords depend on the court party of the moment; on the other hand, it has been regarded as a restraint or limitation of the peerage to a direct line of succession¹. The two ideas are not incompatible, and the result has certainly been a limitation on the descent of peerages; but it may be questioned whether the advisers of Henry VI, who during the period of the change were playing a very haphazard game, had any deep political object in view. After this, as before, the older baronies descended to heiresses who, although they could not take their places in the assembly of the estates, conveyed to their husbands a presumptive right to receive a summons. Of the countless examples of this practice, which applied anciently to the earldoms also, it may be enough to mention Sir John Oldcastle, who was summoned as the husband of the heiress of Cobham, and in common parlance bore the title of lord Cobham; Ralph of Monthermer, husband of the widowed Johanna of Acre, countess of Gloucester, sat as earl of Gloucester during the minority of his stepson; Richard Neville gained the earldom of Salisbury and his son that of Warwick as husbands of the heiresses. The lords Molines, Willoughby, Fitz Walter, and many others whose names occur somewhat confusingly during the wars of the Roses, reached the peerage in this way, and although some royal act of summons, or creation, or both, was necessary to complete their status, the usage was not materially broken down until the system of creation with limitation to heirs male was established. The descent of the peerage through females, and the creation of new titles by patent, alike helped to put an end to the practice of calling the peer by his family name. Even at the accession of Henry VII very few of the ancient baronies by writ were held by the direct representatives in the male line of the barons so summoned by Edward I.

Baronies held by the husbands of heiresses.

No lady of any rank whatever was ever summoned either in person or by proxy to a full and proper parliament. There are instances of countesses, baronesses, and abbesses being summoned to send proxies to council, or to furnish their mili-

No ladies in parliament.

¹ See Nicolas, Historic Peerage (ed. Courthope), p. xlii.

tary service, but not to attend parliament as peeresses¹. The nearest approach to such a summons is that of four abbesses, who in 1306 were cited to the great council held to grant an aid on the knighting of the prince of Wales; an assembly which, although not properly constituted, exercised some of the functions of a parliament.

Question of life peerages.

Although instances occur in which a person not qualified to receive a summons as judge or councillor has been summoned to parliament and yet has not transmitted a hereditary peerage to his descendants, it is not probable that the crown ever contemplated the creation, by such single summons, of a barony for life only². The higher ranks of the peerage were occasionally granted for life; such was the first dukedom of Lancaster, the creation of the duchess of Norfolk in 1397, of Thomas Beaufort duke of Exeter in 1416, of Robert de Vere as marquess of Dublin and duke of Ireland; John of Lancaster was made earl of Kendal and duke of Bedford, and Humfrey earl of Pembroke and duke of Gloucester, in the first instance for life³; and in 1377 Guichard D'angle was made earl of Huntingdon for life⁴. No baron however was ever created for life only

Dukes and earls for life.

¹ See above, vol. ii. p. 427. The summonses to furnish military service are numerous and will be found on the parliamentary writs passim. The abbesses summoned in 1306 were those of Barking, Wilton, Winchester, and Shaftesbury; Parl. Writs, I. 164. The countesses summoned in 1361 were those who had estates in Ireland; Lords' Report, vi. 628, 630.

² In the long lists of barons summoned to parliament between 1295 and 1485 occur a number of names of persons summoned either once only, or irregularly, not hereditarily, although in writs worded exactly like those of the hereditary peers. On these Prynne founds an argument that they were the mere nominees of the king (Reg. i. 232, 233) and combats Coke's doctrine of the hereditary right to the writ. On careful examination Prynne's list shrinks into very small proportions; some of the names are those of judges whose writs have been confusedly mixed with those of the barons; some occur only in lists of summons to councils which were not proper parliaments. In most of the other cases the cessation of the summons is explained by the particular family history; for example, the son is a minor at the time of his father's death, and dies or is forgotten before he comes of age. In others, nothing is known of the later family history, and it must be supposed to have become extinct. The ingenious distinction drawn by Elsynge between barons and peers, the latter including bannerets and life peers, has no foundation.

³ Lords' Fifth Report, pp. 171, 172.

⁴ Ibid. p. 62.

without a provision as to the remainder, or right of succession after his death¹. The case of a son summoned to the house of lords as a peer in his father's lifetime is not understood as the creation of a new peerage: the first recorded instance of this practice occurs in 1482, when the heir of the earl of Arundel was summoned in his father's barony of Maltravers.

Sons summoned during their fathers' life.

It may be observed finally that, although all the 'grantz' summoned in the class of barons were no doubt peers and must have had a right to the title of 'baron' in both the ancient and the modern sense, that title is given in a special way to some few among them², the more general denomination being 'seigneur,' 'sieur,' or 'chivaler'³. The exceptions seem to be the barons of Stafford and Greystoke, who share the designation with the non-parliamentary barons of the two great palatinates of Chester and Durham. This fact has never been explained⁴, and it is the more curious as the title of 'lord' does not in England imply a dignity created by the crown, but is simply a descriptive or honorary appendage to some other dignity⁵.

Questions as to the title of baron.

¹ Nicolas, Hist. Peerage, pp. xlv, xlvii. In two cases, the barony of Hay in 1606, and of Reede in 1644, the creation was for life, but it was provided that the bearers of the title should not sit in parliament. One baroness, lady Belasyse in 1674, was created for life; similar creations of higher ranks of the peerage, duchesses, &c., were not uncommon.

² Prynne, Reg. i. 220 sq.; Lords' Third Report, ii. 330: so the title of Dominus is said to be given only to Mowbray dominus de Axholm, and Talbot dominus de Furnival, until the reign of Henry VI; ibid.

³ Madox explains the usage of styling a baron 'chivaler' in the summons to parliament as implying three things, (1) that he was of aetas legitima or aetas tenendi terram, (2) that he was 'extra custodiam,' and (3) that he had taken knighthood; Baronia Anglicana, p. 61.

⁴ Mr. Horace Round has suggested that the reason why the barons of Stafford and Greystoke seem to monopolise this special designation among the ancient peers, is that it properly belonged to them as tenants of a barony under a palatine earldom, and must not be understood, in their case, as a title of peerage; the baron of Stafford for instance being so called, before as well as after he received a summons to parliament. The barons however created by patent or charter, p. 452, note 4, receive the name as a title just as the earls do: a fact which shows that the other lords regularly summoned were barons in the modern sense.

⁵ The puerile dispute about giving the title of lord bishop to colonial and suffragan bishops could not have arisen had this been kept in mind. The title of lord belongs to all bishops in all churches, and not merely to those who possess a seat in the English house of lords: nor has it anything to do with a royal prerogative of conferring titles, nor being a recognised grade of peerage.

Dignity of banneret.

Banneret not a rank of peerage.

Another curious point, which more directly affects the house of lords, is the dignity of banneret, which has been sometimes regarded as a rank of peerage inferior to a barony¹. This however was not the case; the rank of banneret was simply a degree of knighthood, superior to that of knight bachelor, and entitling its possessor to use a square pennon, but conveying no right of peerage, although of course many peers were, in virtue of their degree of knighthood, bannerets also. On this point much discussion has arisen; but it is one capable of summary proof; in very many cases barons were also bannerets; but the existence of a single English banneret who is never summoned to parliament would be enough to prove that the dignity conferred no peerage. Sir John Coupland, who took king David prisoner at Neville's Cross, was made a banneret by Edward III, with a pension of five hundred pounds a year to maintain his rank; but he never sat in parliament². There are many such instances throughout the whole period during which bannerets are heard of at all: but as the title of baron is, as we have just seen, very sparingly given to the peers, that of banneret or chivaler is frequently bestowed on those who were peers as well³.

¹ Pryne, Reg. ii. 117, 118; Madox, Baron. Angl. p. 160; Lords' Report, i. 329, 340, 350, 354; Selden, Titles of Honour, pp. 737, 790. John Cobham, made a banneret by Edward III, had 100 marks allowance to maintain his state, 42 Edw. III; Madox, Bar. Angl. p. 181: his father and grandfather had sat in parliament as barons, and their barony descended to his daughter. Geoffrey le Scrope in 1340 had a settlement of 200 marks per annum, on himself and his heirs, to maintain their estate of banneret, but he died immediately after, and his son was not summoned to parliament until 1350; Lords' Report, i. 354, 355. In this case an hereditary banneretcy must have been contemplated. In 1344 and 1372 bannerets are mentioned on the rolls as present in parliament; Rot. Parl. ii. 147, 309.

² Foedera, iii. 102; Coke, 4th Inst. p. 5; Camden, Britannia (ed. 1600), p. 138.

³ This seems to be very conclusive; but Hallam thought the point still unsettled; Middle Ages, iii. p. 126. As however we have the complete lists of summons to identify the hereditary peers, there need really be no further question. The writ of 1378 in which it is stated that John Camoys, being a banneret, could not be elected as knight of the shire for Surrey is explained by the fact that he was also a baron; Pryne, Reg. ii. 117, 118. According to Selden, Titles of Honour, pp. 790-792, a banneret was a person knighted on the field of battle when the king is present or the royal standard displayed; the pennon of a banneret was

At the head of the barons of England, taking a sort of clerical precedence, were the English chiefs of the military orders, the Temple and the Hospital. Of these the Master of the Temple disappears in 1308, at the suppression of the order; the Prior of S. John's, Clerkenwell, the Master of the Hospitallers of England, took his due place in parliament down to the date of the dissolution of monasteries; although he occupied the seat of a lord temporal, he was summoned among the lords spiritual¹.

The priors of the great orders.

429. The number of the temporal lords varied in almost every parliament; and, from time to time, we have traced the political or other causes of this fluctuation: during the reign of Henry IV the number never exceeded fifty; under Henry V it only once reached forty; under Henry VI, beginning with twenty-three in 1422, it reached fifty-five in 1450; and under Edward IV the maximum was fifty in the year 1466. The variations were caused by extinction, abeyances, minorities and attainders on the one hand, by new creations and restorations on the other. In some cases we may conjecture that the omission of a name from the list of summonses was caused by the neglect of its bearer to obey former citations². There are many instances of barons being relieved from the duty of attending parliament as a privilege due to old age or high favour³; without some such licence or other good excuse, and

Number of lords temporal.

Exemptions from attendance.

cut square into the shape of a banner, whence the name. Of the bannerets in arms in 1322 (Parl. Writs, II. ii. 196 sq.) Sir Warin de l'Isle, Sir Robert de Lidle, Sir Gilbert de Aton, Sir Thomas de Vere, were not barons of parliament. In the Wardrobe Accounts of Edward I, most of the persons receiving pay as bannerets were also barons receiving special summons to parliament; but Sir John Bottetourt who is called a banneret in 1300 is not summoned to parliament until 1305; and among the others are Sir Richard Siward, Sir Simon Fraser, Amanenus de la Bret, Arnold de Gaveston, and Elie de Cavapenna, all of them aliens. It cannot be denied that the subject has some puzzling aspects, but the authority of Selden, Prynne, and the Lords' Report, will probably be sufficient for most investigators.

¹ Mon. Ang. vi. 799. The Master of the Gilbertines, or order of Sempringham, ceased to be summoned in 1332. The prior of Clerkenwell sat until 1536; he was allowed in 1539 to appoint a proxy. He sat for the last time under Philip and Mary.

² See above, p. 454, note 2.

³ See Prynne, 4th Inst. pp. 33-37.

Fines for non-attendance.

Resignation of peerage.

Number of bishops permanent.

the mission of a proxy, the lords who absented themselves from parliament were liable to a heavy amercement, such as was enforced in the parliament of 1454, when archbishops and dukes were subjected to a fine of £100; earls and bishops of 100 marks; abbots and barons of £40¹. The fact of any formal renunciation of the dignity of peerage, on the ground of a want of baronial tenure or other, may well be doubted. In one instance we find a duke, George Neville, of Bedford, degraded by act of parliament as not having sufficient property to maintain his dignity²; Lewis of Bruges, created earl of Winchester by Edward IV, resigned his patent to Henry VII³: both these are exceptional cases. Henry de Pinkeni, a baron of 1299 and 1301, sold his barony in the latter year to the king, and it was thus extinguished; the earls of Gloucester, Norfolk and Hereford likewise made over their estates and dignities to Edward I in order to obtain a resettlement; and in the case of Norfolk the king took the opportunity of excluding the presumptive heir⁴. But such resignations and resettlements do not amount to a resignation of a right which from the very first was as precious as it was burdensome.

430. The number, degrees and dignities of the spiritual lords require less notice. The two archbishops and the eighteen bishops formed the most permanent element in the house of lords: when a see was vacant, the guardian of the spiritualities was summoned in the place of the bishop, and showed by his compliance with the writ that the seat of the bishop did not depend on the possession of a temporal barony, as was the case with that of an abbot or prior⁵. With respect to this, the

¹ Rot. Parl. v. 248.

² Lords' Fifth Report, p. 409; Rot. Parl. vi. 173.

³ Lords' Fifth Report, p. 392.

⁴ See above, vol. ii. p. 159.

⁵ The house of lords in 1692 resolved 'that bishops are only lords of parliament but not peers, for they are not of trial by nobility;' E. May, Treatise on Parliament, p. 15. Whatever force such a resolution may legally have, it is of no historical authority; for it is certain that from the beginning of the use of the term 'peers' the bishops were recognised as peers, and that it was by one of them, archbishop Stratford, that the right of trial was chiefly won; see above, vol. ii. p. 406. The doctrine of ennobled blood, by which this theory has been supported, is historically a mere absurdity; it is impossible to regard the blood as ennobled by law, second class of lords spiritual, the case was different. The abbots and priors, like the smaller boroughs, felt the burden of attendance to be a severe strain on their resources; and they were satisfied with their position in the spiritual assemblies of their provinces. Hence their attempts, by proving themselves not to be tenants in barony under the crown, to relieve themselves from the burden of peerage. Of these deeds of renunciation many are still extant. In 1318 the abbot of S. James, Northampton, in 1325 the prior of Bridlington, in 1341 the abbot of S. Augustine's, Bristol, in 1350 the abbot of Osney, in 1351 the abbot of Leicester, declared that they held their estates by no tenure that involved the duty of parliamentary attendance, and they were accordingly relieved. Osney escaped because it was not a royal foundation, Beaulieu because it held in frankalmoign, Thornton because it did not hold in chief or by barony. This process had probably been going on for some time before it is heard of in record. To take, however, only the state of affairs from the reign of Edward I downwards; we find summoned to the normal parliament of 1295 sixty-seven abbots and priors, besides the Masters of the Temple, the Hospital, and the Gilbertines; in 1300 seventy-two abbots and priors; in 1301 eighty; in 1302 forty-four; in 1305 seventy-five; and in 1307 forty-eight abbots. Under Edward II, down to 1319, the number varies, between forty and sixty; but from that year the number rapidly declines. Under Edward III, with the exception of the year 1332, when fifty-eight were summoned, the average gradually settles down to twenty-seven, which thenceforward becomes the normal number¹. The year 1341 seems to be the point from which the permanent diminution dates². A close examination of the list summoned to when the nobility of the blood is restricted to the bearer of the title and does not extend even to his younger children.

Diminution in the number of abbots and priors.

Varying number of abbots and priors.

The normal number.

¹ The numbers may be verified by reference to the Appendix of the Lords' Report, or to Parry's Parliaments of England, under the several dates.

² Edward III by letters dated Oct. 20, 1341, and again June 7, 1347, relieved the abbot of Osney, that house being of the foundation of Robert D'Oilli and not of one of the king's ancestors; Rawlinson Charters, Bibl. Bodl.; Lords' Report, iv. 554. The petition of the abbot of S. James, Northampton, in 1319, is in Parl. Writs, II. i. 199; the licence for the last parliament of Henry VI shows that all the Cistercian, Cluniac and Præmonstratensian houses had been relieved from a duty which the extent of their foreign connexions must have made somewhat dangerous; the Master of the Gilbertines is no longer summoned; only two houses of Augustinian canons, Waltham and Cirencester, appear in the list. Of the rest, twenty-three are Benedictine abbeys of royal or reputed royal foundation; one cathedral priory, that of Coventry, still sends its prior; and the prior of Clerkenwell completes the list¹. Many of these were mitred abbots: that is, abbots who had received from the pope the right of wearing the mitre and other vestments proper to the episcopal office; but the mitred and parliamentary abbeys were not identical; and some priors who were mitred were not summoned to parliament. The abbot of Tavistock, who in the reign of Henry VI had received permission to apply to the pope for the mitre, was in the fifth year of Henry VIII made a spiritual lord of parliament by letters patent. This has been said to have been a unique exercise of prerogative power; but the abbot of Tewkesbury was also summoned in 1512 and the abbot of Burton in 1532², and such a case is scarcely to be distinguished in point of principle abbots.

Mitred

Summons of the abbot of Tavistock.

S. Augustine's, Bristol, is in the Lords' Report, iv. 528: and that of the abbot of Thornton, ib. p. 529; both in 1341; that of the abbot of Beaulieu, the same year, ib. p. 533; Crowland, Spalding, p. 535; Thorney, p. 579. See also Prynne, Reg. i. pp. 141-144; Madox, Baronia Angl. pp. 110 sq.; where it is remarked that other onerous services besides parliamentary attendance were escaped by proving that the lands were held in frankalmoign.

¹ The list of parliamentary abbots and priors summoned in 1483 is this: Peterborough, Colchester, S. Edmund's, Abingdon, Waltham, Shrewsbury, Cirencester, Gloucester, Westminster, S. Alban's, Bardney, Selby, S. Benedict of Hulme, Thorney, Evesham, Ramsey, Hyde, Glastonbury, Malmesbury, Crowland, Battle, Winchcomb, Reading, S. Augustine's, S. Mary's York, Pr. Coventry, Pr. S. John of Jerusalem; Lords' Report, App. pp. 946, 985. Reyner, Apostolatus Benedictinorum, p. 212, makes twenty-four, adding Tavistock and omitting the Augustinian abbots and the two priors; and adds a list of sixteen, who, although they were not summoned to parliament, were counted among the barons. In 1332 Edward III summoned twenty-eight heads of houses, to whom 'non solebat scribi in aliis parliamentis;' Lords' Report, p. 409. See also Prynne, Reg. i. 108 sq., 141 sq., 147.

² Domestic State Papers, i. pp. 314, 634, 725; Rot. Parl. 24 Hen. VIII, p. cexxxix.

from the creation of a new temporal barony¹. The bishops whose sees were created later in the reign had their seats virtually secured by the liberal terms of the legislation which empowered the king to erect the new sees. These prelates had no baronies and cannot be said to have sat in the right of temporal lordships.

431. The justices, and other councillors summoned to assist the parliament, completed, with the clerks and other officers, the personnel of the Upper Chamber of parliament. Of these the judges, whatever may have been the intention with which Edward I added them to the parliament, seem to have taken a more or less prominent part in the public business of the house, but not to have succeeded in obtaining recognition as peers, or the right of voting. They were not regular or essential members of the house; their summons did not imply an equality or similarity of functions to those of the peers; they were summoned in varying numbers, and they had no power to appear by proxy². Yet they had very considerable functions as counsellors; in assisting all legislation that proceeded primarily from the king, and in formulating the statutes which proceeded from the petitions of the subject; they were ready to give their opinions on all legal and constitutional questions that came before the parliament; they contributed an important quota to the bodies of receivers and triers of petitions; and on some occasions they may have exercised a right of voting³. In our survey of medieval history they have appeared principally as giving or refusing opinions on constitutional procedure; but on certain important occasions one of the chief justices has acted as spokesman for the whole parliament. Whatever was the qualification of Sir William Trussell, who as proctor of the parliament announced the deposition of Edward II, it was a

Judges and councillors.

Functions of the judges in the house of lords.

¹ Monast. Angl. iv. 503; Coke, 4th Inst. p. 45; Prynne, 4th Inst. p. 28; Register, i. 145.

² See Prynne, Reg. i. p. 379; Coke, 4th Inst. p. 4; above, vol. ii. pp. 199, 270.

³ See Erskine May, Treatise on Parliament, p. 234. In the decision on the claim of the duke of Norfolk in 1425 the advice of the judges is mentioned co-ordinately with that of the lords and commons; Rot. Parl. iv. 274.

chief justice of the Common Pleas, Sir William Thirning, who declared that Richard II had forfeited his right to the crown. Thirning also opened the parliament of 1401 instead of the chancellor¹.

Clerical assembly in parliament.

432. The position of the clerical proctors summoned under the praemunientes clause has been sometimes regarded as analogous to that of the summoned judges and councillors². For this supposition there does not seem to be any warrant. They were originally summoned to complete the representation of the spiritual estate, with an especial view to the taxation of spiritual property³; and in that summons they had standing-ground from which they might have secured a permanent position in the legislature. By adhering to their ecclesiastical organisation in the convocations they lost their opportunity, and, almost as soon as it was offered them, forfeited their chance of becoming an active part of parliament. Although, therefore, the kings continued to summon them to all parliaments, that the pretext of their absence might not be allowed to vitiate the authority of parliamentary acts, they, after a short struggle, acquiesced in the maintenance of convocation as the taxing assembly of the church. Hence, on the occasions on which the clerical proctors are known to have attended, their action is insignificant, and those occasions are very few. We are not told where room was found for their sessions; it would most probably be in some chamber of the abbey, and, if we may argue from the history of Haxey's case, in 1397, in close propinquity to the house of commons. In the year 1547 the lower house of convocation

Continuance of the 'praemunientes' clause.

Clergy in parliament.

¹ See above, pp. 29, 442.

² Coke, 4th Inst. p. 4.

³ In the proxy given by the clerical estate in parliament to Sir Thomas Percy in 1397, they describe themselves thus: 'Nos Thomas Cantuariensis et Robertus Eboracensis archiepiscopi ac praelati et clerus utriusque provinciae Cantuariensis et Eboracensis, jure ecclesiarum nostrarum et temporalium earundem habentes jus interessendi in singulis parliamentis domini nostri regis et regni Angliae pro tempore celebrandis, necnon tractandi et expediendi in eisdem, quantum ad singula in instanti parlamento pro statu et honore domini nostri regis, necnon regaliae suae, ac quiete, pace et tranquillitate regni judicialiter justificanda, venerabili viro domino Thomae de Percy militi nostram plenarie committimus potestatem ita ut singula per ipsum facta in praemissis perpetuis temporibus habeantur;' Rot. Parl. iii. 348, 349.

petitioned the archbishop that, 'according to the custom of this realm and the tenour of the king's writ,' 'the clergy of the lower house of convocation may be adjoined and associate with the lower house of parliament.' We have here, possibly, a trace of a long-forgotten usage¹.

433. The questions affecting the personal composition of the house of commons, though more interesting in themselves, demand a less detailed description. They chiefly concern the number and distribution of the borough members. The knights of the shire continue unaltered in number to the close of the middle ages; thirty-seven counties return two knights apiece; Cheshire and Durham retain their palatine isolation, and Monmouth has not yet become an English shire. Monmouth acquired the right of sending two knights in 1536; Cheshire in 1543; and Durham in 1673². The act which gave two members to Monmouthshire gave one to each of the Welsh counties. The number of knights in the medieval parliaments was seventy-four. The northern counties seem to have envied the immunities of Durham and Cheshire. In 1312, 1314, and 1327, Northumberland, and in 1295 Westmoreland, alleged the danger of the Scottish borders as a reason for neglecting to send knights; they could not afford to pay the wages, and the knights themselves were employed elsewhere³.

Numbers of knights of the shire permanent.

Later additions.

Attempts to evade the duty of attendance.

The number of city and borough members fluctuated, but showed a decided tendency to diminish from the reign of Edward I to that of Henry VI. The minimum was reached in the reign of Edward III; and the act of 1382 prevented any further decrease, and all irregularity of attendance. The largest number of parliamentary boroughs is found in the reign of Edward I.

Variation in the number of borough members.

¹ Burnet, Reform. ii. 47, app. p. 117: see above, vol. ii. p. 514.

² Stat. 27 Hen. VI, cc. 26 and 34; 35 Hen. VIII, cc. 13, 26; Stat. 25 Charles II, c. 9.

³ In 1295 the sheriff of Westmoreland writes that his knights cannot possibly attend, as they are bound under penalty of forfeiture to appear before the bishop of Durham and the earl Warenne at Emmotbridge two days before that fixed for the parliament; Parl. Writs, i. 44. In 1312 the sheriff of Northumberland says that the state of the border is such that the men of the county do not care to send knights or burgesses to the parliament; Prynne, Reg. iii. 165; and in 1327 that they are so impoverished by the Scots that they cannot pay the wages.

Distribution of parliamentary
boroughs.

The whole number of boroughs summoned to the various parliaments of that reign was 166; but the highest number that attended any session of which the returns are extant was 116¹. From 1382 to 1445 the normal maximum was ninety-nine, including London². The number of burgesses, including the four members for London, was just two hundred; but this was reduced, by the imperfect representation of some dozen small towns, to about 180. These were very unequally distributed; from three counties, Lancashire, Rutland, and Hertfordshire, no borough members were sent between the reign of Edward III and that of Edward VI. Fifteen counties sent up, during the same period, only the two representatives of their chief town³; and seven of the others contained two parliamentary boroughs each⁴. The remaining twelve counties were more abundantly supplied; Yorkshire, Berkshire, Norfolk, and Hampshire contained each three boroughs⁵; Surrey four; Somerset and Cornwall six each; Devon and Dorset seven; Sussex nine, and

¹ The returns of the reign of Edward I are all imperfect; the number of boroughs for which returns exist is, in 1295, 110; in 1298, 82; in 1301, 85; in 1305, 105; in 1306, 82; and in 1307, 94. If six boroughs be added for the missing returns from Norfolk and Suffolk, the great parliament of 1295 must have contained the representatives of 116 boroughs.

² The numbers of summoned towns are variously given, the returns being imperfect and confusing: Prynne (Reg. iii. 225) makes 170 towns in all summoned, and 161 occasionally represented. The returns in the reigns of Edward I and Edward II, the period during which the maximum of representation was reached, may be ascertained from the Parliamentary Writs; 166 are mentioned in the former reign, 127 in the latter; but of these many towns although summoned made no return.

³ The fifteen counties with their chief towns were:—Bedfordshire, Bedford; Buckinghamshire, Wycombe; Cambridgeshire, Cambridge; Cumberland, Carlisle; Derbyshire, Derby; Gloucestershire, Gloucester; Huntingdonshire, Huntingdon; Leicestershire, Leicester; Northamptonshire, Northampton; Northumberland, Newcastle; Nottinghamshire, Nottingham; Oxfordshire, Oxford; Warwickshire, Warwick; Westmoreland, Appleby; Worcestershire, Worcester; to which may be added Middlesex as containing London, and making sixteen in all.

⁴ These are:—Essex—Colchester and Maldon; Herefordshire—Hereford and Leominster; Kent—Canterbury and Rochester; Lincolnshire—Lincoln and Grimsby; Salop—Shrewsbury and Bridgenorth; Staffordshire—Stafford and Newcastle under Lyme; Suffolk—Ipswich and Dunwich.

⁵ Yorkshire—York, Hull, and Scarborough; Berkshire—Reading, Walingford, and Windsor; Norfolk—Norwich, Lynn, and Yarmouth; Hampshire—Portsmouth, Southampton, and Winchester.

Wiltshire twelve¹. The Cinque Ports altogether returned sixteen members². After the minimum had been reached, Henry VI added eight new boroughs, four of which were in Wiltshire, and one each in Devon, Dorset, Surrey, and Warwickshire. Edward IV added or restored five³.

The causes of this strange distribution are very obscure. To some extent they may be, so far as legal and technical details go, explained by the varieties of local constitutions, by the ancient or customary means of evading the action of the sheriff, or the positive restraints on his authority. But the further influences can only be conjectured. The amount of maritime or manufacturing industry which had made Devonshire, Dorset, Kent, Wiltshire, and Sussex the wealthiest counties of England may help to account for the fulness of their representation⁴. The Possible reasons for the uneven distribution.

¹ Surrey—Bletchingly, Guildford, Reigate, and Southwark; Somerset—Bridgewater, Taunton, Wells, Bristol, Bath, and perhaps Ilchester; Cornwall—Bodmin, Launceston, Helston, Liskeard, Lostwithiel, and Truro; Devon—Barnstaple, Dartmouth, Exeter, Plympton, Tavistock, Totnes, and Torrington (see below); Dorset—Bridport, Dorchester, Lyme Regis, Melcomb, Shaftesbury, Wareham, and Weymouth; Sussex—Arundel, Bramber with Steyning, Chichester, East Grinstead, Horsham, Lewes, Midhurst, Shoreham; Wiltshire—Bedwind, Calne, Chippenham, Cricklade, Devizes, Downton, Ludgarshall, Malmesbury, Marlborough, Salisbury, Old Sarum, and Wilton. The names in Italics denote the towns which were least regularly represented.

² The Cinque Ports, which in 1265 were ordered to send representatives, during the reigns of Edward I and Edward II were directed to elect two barons each; but their actual representation seems to date from 40 Edw. III; see Prynn, Reg. iv, and Willis, Notitia Parl. p. 71; Return of Members, p. 178. The eight ports were—Dover, Hastings, Sandwich, Hythe, Romney, Winchelsea, Rye, and Seaford. The first five were the original Cinque Ports.

³ In the reign of Henry VI the irregular boroughs seem to have returned their members more frequently, and that king added Coventry, Gatton, Poole, Plymouth, Hindon, Heytesbury, Westbury, and Wootton Bassett; Edward IV, Grantham, Ludlow, Wenlock, Stamford, and perhaps Ilchester.

⁴ Dr. Riess, after a very careful examination of the Parliamentary Writs, has rejected the considerations conjecturally given above, and formed some definite conclusions on the subject which are partially accepted by Dr. Gneist, and explained by him as follows: 'A recent searching inquiry leads to the inference that the exclusion of many towns from the right of election was to be accounted for by the form of the summons. London had from the first been honoured by a special summons, like that addressed to the great barons, and in the course of this period ten other cities also received the honour of a special invitation. Consequently in the case of these towns a neglect of the summons and the loss of their right of election causes.

Conjectural

distance from London was an important element in the consideration of the boroughs themselves, many of which felt the wages of the members as a heavy tax. A cause of diminution might be supposed to be the depopulation of the ancient towns by the Great Plague; and this doubtless did in a small degree affect the returns, but the lowest point of diminution had been reached before the visitation of the Black Death. Another may have been, at all events until the incidence of taxation was stereotyped on the model of 1334, the desire of the country towns to be taxed with their country neighbours, to be rated to the fifteenth with the shires and not to the tenth with the boroughs¹. But the most influential cause was probably the desire to avoid could not occur. As to other towns, the writs of summons were addressed to the sheriffs to be transmitted to the local authorities (ballivi civitatum). To such towns as formed a separate hundred, the sheriff sent the summons direct asking for a report thereon which he remitted to the state authorities with the "return" of the county. For those towns on the other hand which formed only a part of a hundred, the writs appear to have been sent to the district authorities of the hundred (ballivi hundredi). In such cases no reports were returnable to the sheriff, so that under these circumstances neither the sheriff nor the state authorities could exercise any control over the proceedings. Hence such towns easily succeeded in escaping the summons.' Gneist, English Parliament (transl. 1887), page 180.

Dr. Riess's formal conclusions are briefly stated at p. 35 of his essay: the summons was kept up (1) in the towns coordinate with hundreds, and (2) for the towns included in hundreds in the counties of Wilts, Devon, Somerset, Dorset and Cornwall. The summons was lost (1) in the towns included in hundreds in other counties; and (2) in the towns contained in liberties.

Considerable force is given to these generalisations by the tables contained in the Introduction to the Alphabetical Digest, in Palgrave's Parliamentary Writs, vol. ii. division iii. But the conclusions are given much too positively, and, at the utmost, only throw back the difficulty one step. For there can be no doubt that the sheriff could, by obtaining a writ with the clause 'non omittas,' have compelled the local officers to make a return; the crown could have issued such a writ, as it did to compel the attendance of the clergy under the praemunientes clause; and the towns might have executed the precept if they had been willing. These conclusions then amount to little more than a formulating of results for which more remote causes must be sought: some of which are conjecturally put in the text; I have, however, from respect to Dr. Gneist's authority, somewhat modified them.

¹ It is difficult to get evidence on this point, the time in question being so very short: but on the whole the conclusion seems to be, that whether or no the unrepresented towns expected to be rated for the fifteenth, they were obliged to pay the tenth: if they were content to be represented by the knights, they must have been bound, on any theory, to agree to the general scheme of taxation of towns.

the expense of the members' wages. It was much cheaper for a town to pay its fifteenth and contribute to the payment of the knights than to pay the tenth and remunerate its own burgesses. The petition of the borough of Torrington, in Devonshire, presented to Edward III in 1368, declared that the burden of the members' wages was very grievous, and prayed that the town might be relieved from the duty of representation. Although this town had been represented in the parliaments of the last two reigns, the burgesses declared that, until the 24th year of Edward III, they had not been ordered to send members; and the king, having searched the rolls, allowed that no returns could be found before the 21st year. He therefore granted the prayer, and Torrington ceased to be a parliamentary borough¹. S. Alban's and Barnstaple showed as little regard for truth when, in order to prove themselves free from the demesne rights of their lords, they declared that they had sent members in the days when there were no parliaments, and, in the latter case, from the days of Athelstan². But the petition of Torrington is unique; a much simpler way of evading the duty was to disregard the sheriff's precept, and this was adopted in a large proportion of cases. In others probably the sheriff purposely omitted the smaller towns. On a close examination of the returns, most of the omitted boroughs are found to have made only one or two elections, or to have returned members in only one reign. In the reign of Edward I, as has been already stated, 166 boroughs were represented once or twice³; of these 33 were not again summoned, and 38 more ceased until they were restored to the list in modern times; about a dozen

Cases of Torrington,
S. Albans, and Barnstaple.

Numbers
and dates.

¹ See Rot. Parl. ii. 459; Prynne, Reg. ii. 239; iv. 1175, 1176; 4th Inst. p. 32. There are some cases in which permission was granted, for a number of years, to dispense with attendance, but these are unimportant.

² On the S. Alban's case see above, vol. ii. p. 231; Rot. Parl. i. 327; Hallam, Middle Ages, iii. 28; and on the Barnstaple case, Hallam, Middle Ages, iii. 32.

³ These numbers may be verified or corrected by reference to Prynne, or to Browne Willis's Notitia Parliamentaria; but the recent publication, in a Return to the House of Commons, of the names of all members returned to Parliament from the earliest times, for which the thanks of historical students are due to Mr. Gerard Noel and Sir William Fraser, has placed the means of testing these generalisations within the reach of all. A good deal of uncertainty hangs over the whole calculation.

Amount of borough representation.

dropped out in the next two reigns; thus about eighty of Edward's boroughs continued to send members. Under Edward II ten new boroughs appear, some of which made but one return. Edward III added the Cinque Ports and about six short-lived boroughs. The bulk of the borough representation was thus formed by the parliamentary boroughs in which political interest was so strong, or over which the hold of the executive was so firm, that they either would not or could not shake off the burden, but survived to modern times. The number of these at the close of the reign of Edward IV was about 112; two members represented each borough except Much Wenlock which had only one and the city of London which had four¹; these constituencies may be estimated as returning 226 representatives, who, with the 74 knights of the shire, would compose an assembly of 300 members².

Clerk of the crown;

and of the parliament.

434. The business of parliament was recorded by clerks specially appointed for the purpose. Of these the clerk of the crown superintended the issue of writs and the reception of the returns; he also attested the signature of the king attached to bills when they became statutes. The clerk of the parliament registered the acts of the session; his place was in the house of lords, where he sat at the central table: to this office William Ayremin was specially named and deputed by Edward II in 1316³; but some such official must have been

¹ The representation of London by four members was a matter of historical growth or assumption: originally the writ directed the election of two citizens, but it was very common to nominate four in order to make sure that two would attend. So in 1299 four were returned, in 1312 three, in 1320 four, and in 1318 and 1322 three for two, in 1319 four for three, and in 1326 six for two. In 1315, 1322, and 1324 two were returned. After several other variations, the number was permanently raised to four by the writs from 1378 onwards; see Parl. Writs, i. 80; II. i. 78, 108, 128, &c.; Prynne, Reg. iv. 1041; iii. 369 sq.; Lords' Report, iv. 682. In the year 1483, York elected four citizens for the parliament of Edward V; Davies, York Records, p. 144; this was in compliance with the writ, which must have been unique.

² Fortescue states the amount of parliamentary wisdom as 'plusquam trecentorum electorum virorum'; De Laudibus, c. 18. In 1509 there were 296 members; Hatsell, Prec. ii. 413.

³ 'Memoranda de parlamento . . . facta per Willelmum de Ayreminne clericum de cancellaria prae-fati regis per eundem regem ad hoc nominatum et specialiter deputatum'; Rot. Parl. i. 350. In the parliament held at Mid-Lent, 1340, the first business done was the appointment of Thomas employed from the earliest times ; probably the chancellor was allowed to employ any clerk he chose. The clerk of the house of commons, 'the common clerk of the house,' appears in the year 1388 as a person of established position ; he was probably an assistant of the clerk of the parliament, and had similar duties in the lower house¹. Each house had also its serjeant-at-arms, an officer whose duty it was to execute the warrants and orders of the house while in session, and its usher, or ostiarius, who kept the doors of the house and carried messages between the two assemblies. The existence of these offices is shown by occasional mention in the rolls, but the development of their functions, and all matters of constitutional importance connected with them, are of later growth.

Clerk of the house of commons.

Serjeants and ushers.

As soon as the opening speech of the chancellor was ended, the names of the receivers and triers of petitions were read by the clerk of the crown. The receivers were clerks or masters in chancery ; the triers were selected by the king from the list of the lords spiritual, the lords temporal, and the justices. The triers sat in two divisions, in two smaller chambers adjoining the house of lords² : they could call to their assistance the chancellor, treasurer, steward, and chamberlain. Of the two committees, one examined the petitions for England, Ireland, Wales, and Scotland ; the other those for Gascony and the foreign possessions of the crown. By them was determined the court to which the particular petitions ought to be referred, and, if any required parliamentary hearing, the triers reported them to the parliament³.

Receivers and triers of petitions.

de Drayton to be 'clerk du Parlement ;' Rot. Parl. ii. 112 : in 1347 it is ordered that petitions be delivered to him ; ib. p. 202. In 1371 the clerk of the parliament reads the answers to the petitions ; Rot. Parl. ii. 304 : in 1388 he calls over the names of the receivers and triers ; iii. 228.

¹ Rot. Parl. iii. 245 : 'le roi . . . granta d'aider Geoffrey Martyn clerk de la corone ; et granta auxint a la requeste des communes d'aider John de Scardesburgh, leur commune clerk.' The 'modus tenendi parliamentum' makes two chief clerks of parliament and five assistants, one for each of the five grades (bishops, proctors, temporal lords, knights, and burgesses) into which that tract divides the parliament. On the later duties of the clerks see E. May, Treatise on Parliament, pp. 185 sq., 236 sq.

² Generally the chamberlain's chamber and Marculf's chamber ; Rot. Parl. iii. 323.

³ Triers are still appointed ; but the lords spiritual are not now nominated to serve ; E. May, Treatise on Parliament, p. 542.

Election of speaker.

Early cases of the action of a spokesman.

Regular election of speakers.

435. The commons, having been directed, in the last clause of the opening speech, to withdraw and choose their speaker, retired as soon as the triers had been nominated, and on the same or following day made their election. Although some such officer must have been necessary from the first, the position and title of Speaker becomes settled only in 1377. The silence of records cannot be held to prove that an organised assembly like that of the commons could ever have dispensed with a recognised prolocutor or foreman. It can scarcely be doubted that Henry of Keighley, who in 1301 carried the petition of the parliament of Lincoln to the king, was in some such position¹. Sir William Trussell, again, answered for the commons in the White Chamber in 1343²: Trussell was not a member of the house of commons; he was not a baron, but apparently a counsellor and had in 1342 received a summons to council with the barons. It is possible that the commons employed him as counsel, or chose as prolocutor a person external to their own body, as the clergy did in 1397 when they empowered Sir Thomas Percy to act as their proxy³, or as the two houses had done on the deposition of Edward II in 1327. Any such irregularity was, however, impossible after 1377. In 1376 Peter de la Mare, a knight for Herefordshire, acted as speaker without the title; but this is given to his successor, Thomas Hungerford, who is said 'avoir les paroles' for the commons⁴; Peter de la Mare is similarly described in 1377;

¹ See above, vol. ii. p. 156.

² 'Et puis vindrent les chivaliers des countees et les communes et responderent par Monsieur William Trussell en la chambre Blanche : ' Rot. Parl. ii. 136. Trussell had been an envoy from the king to the parliament in 1340, and had carried messages between them; ib. pp. 121, 122. The returns for 1343 are imperfect, but contain the names of all the knights of the shires except those of Devonshire; and Trussell's name is not among them. It is stated in the Historic Peerage that he was summoned to parliament in 1342, but this is a mistake; the summons is to a great council to which ninety-six barons and councillors were cited; Lords' Report, iv. 537, 538. He was probably son of the William Trussell who acted as proctor for the whole parliament in 1327; he had been member for Northamptonshire in 1319, but his name does not occur after that date in the extant returns except as sent up from Staffordshire and Northamptonshire to a great council in 1324; so that a similar question may be raised about both father and son. See Foss, Biog. Jurid. p. 678.

³ See above, p. 462.

⁴ Above, vol. ii. p. 456; Rot. Parl. ii. 374.

and from that date the list is complete. The speaker was chosen by the free votes of the members, but there is during the middle ages no instance in which any but a knight of the shire was elected. The first exception to this usage is found in the reign of Henry VIII; in 1533 Humfrey Wingfield, member for Yarmouth, succeeded Audley as speaker: under queen Mary, in 1554, Robert Brooke, one of the members for London, was chosen speaker, and his successor in 1555 was Clement Higham, burgess for West Looe¹.

The day after the election, or the first day of business, the speaker-elect was presented to the king by the commons or some leading member of the house as their chosen 'parlour et procuratour.' The custom was for the speaker to protest his insufficiency for so great an office, but in spite of the protest the king vouchsafed his approval. In the case of Sir John Cheyne, the speaker elected in 1399, the excuse of ill-health was accepted by the king as valid; the clergy had in fact objected to the nomination; Sir John Cheyne withdrew, and John Doreward was chosen in his place². This however is the only case of the kind that occurred before the reign of Charles II; although on more than one occasion, as we have seen in the cases of Peter de la Mare and Sir Thomas Thorpe, the choice of a speaker was in a high degree important. In 1413 William Stourton had to resign the speakership after he had held it for a week, on plea of illness, and John Doreward again was substituted³: in this case there was a political difficulty; the speaker had acted without the authority of the house. In 1437 Sir John Tyrrell resigned on the same plea, after having been speaker for two months⁴. In 1449 Sir John Popham, the speaker-elect, excused himself on the ground of old age and infirmity, and the king admitted the excuse, but in this case there seems to have been no ulterior motive⁵. Generally the excuse was a mere formality.

The speaker-elect is presented to the king.

Excuses generally overruled.

After the royal approval had been expressed, the speaker proceeded to request that his utterances might be regarded ¹ Browne Willis, Not. Parl. iii. p. 113.

² Rot. Parl. iii. 424.

³ Ib. iv. 4, 5.

⁴ Ib. p. 502.

⁵ Ib. v. 171.

Petition of the speaker for the free customs of the house.

as the utterances of the house, that no offence might be taken at his words, that if he omitted to say what he ought to say, or said what he ought not to say, he might have equitable allowance, and other like favours. We have seen in the history of Henry IV that the freedom of language which some of the speakers used on this occasion roused the jealousy of the king; and the whole proceeding, solemn as it was, somewhat later took a settled form: the speaker simply petitioned that he might bring forward and declare all and singular the matters to be brought forward and declared by him in parliament in the name of the commons, under the following protest: that if he should have declared any matters enjoined upon him by his companions in any way otherwise than they have agreed, be it in adding or omitting, he might correct and amend the matters so declared by his aforesaid companions; and he prayed that this protest might be entered on the roll of the parliament¹. The king, by the mouth of the chancellor, returned the equally formal reply: that the speaker should enjoy and have the benefit of such protest as the other speakers had been wont

¹ The following is the form given in the Rolls of 1435 and 1436; Rot. Parl. iv. 482, 496: 'supplicavit quatenus omnia et singula per ipsum ex parte dictorum communium in Parlamento praedicto proferenda sub protestatione posset proferre; ut si quid de sibi injunctis omittendo vel eis addendo, aut aliter quam sibi per eosdem communes injunctum fuerit contigerit declarare, tunc ad praefatos communes resortiri, et se per eorum avisamentum et assensum corrigere posset et emendare, et omnimoda alia libertate gaudere qua aliquis hujusmodi Praelocutor ante haec tempora melius et liberius gavisus est.' In 1406 the speaker asked for leave to send for any bills that required amendment, from the lords; Rot. Parl. iii. 568. The usage given by Sir Erskine May, as followed now and since the sixth year of Henry VIII, is for the speaker, 'In the name and on behalf of the Commons, to lay claim by humble petition to their ancient and undoubted rights and privileges; particularly that their persons [estates, dropped in 1853] and servants might be free from arrests and all molestations; that they might enjoy liberty of speech in all their debates, may have access to her majesty's royal person whenever occasion shall require, and that all their proceedings may receive from her majesty the most favourable construction;' Treatise on Parliament, p. 65. These claims are not however all so old as the sixth of Henry VIII: the claim for access to the king appears first in the records of 1536 and 1541; Lords' Journals, i. 86, 167; and that for freedom from arrest is described by Elysnge as 'never made but of late days;' Ancient Method of holding Parliaments, p. 173: it is first recorded in 34 Hen. VIII; Hatsell, Precedents, ii. 77.

to use and enjoy in the time of the king and his noble progenitors in such parliaments.

The acceptance of the speaker completed the constitution of the house of commons; in the house of lords the chancellor generally fulfilled the duties of a prolocutor in the absence of the king¹, and in his presence he acted as his mouthpiece: but his position was in some important respects different from that of the speaker of the commons, who, in addition to the general superintendence of business and his authority as 'procurator' and prolocutor of the house, had also to maintain order. This function, which was typified by the mace, was unquestionably attached to the speaker's office from the first, but it receives little or no illustration from medieval records².

The chancellor presided in the house of lords.

436. The two houses being thus constituted, their first duty on proceeding to business was to consider the matters laid before them in the opening speech, generally in the order in which the chancellor had arranged them. Those matters took sometimes the form of questions; they were frequently repeated by the chancellor or some officer of state, or by the speaker himself, to the commons; the answers might either be communicated to the king by the speaker, as soon as the commons had considered them; or they might be made the subject of a conference with the lords; or they might be reported to the lords, and be sent up with the answers of the lords; or they might be kept in suspense till the conclusions of the lords were known, and then be drawn up in concert with or in opposition to them. On this point, which was one of some importance, both opinions and practice differed; the occasions on which those differences illustrate constitutional history have been noticed as we have proceeded. The causes of the calling of parliament were in 1381 repeated to the commons by the lord treasurer in the king's presence, and then at their request

Discussion of matters mentioned in the opening speech.

Special exposition to the commons

¹ In 1332 we find Henry de Beaumont acting as foreman or speaker of the lords, possibly of the whole parliament; 'les queux countes barouns et autres grantz puis revinderent et responderent touz au roi par la bouche Monsieur Henri de Beaumont;' Rot. Parl. ii. 64.

² See Hatsell's Precedents, ii. 230-238. The precedents there alleged begin in 1604; see also speaker Popham's speeches in 1580; ib. p. 232.

explained by the chancellor¹; in 1382 the bishop of Hereford laid before lords and commons together 'in more especial manner' the occasions of summons²; in 1377 Richard le Scrope, Steward of the household, repeated the charge to the commons in the presence of the king and the bishops³; and in 1401 Sir Arnold Savage⁴, when admitted as speaker, repeated to the king and lords the matter of the opening speech, 'to assure his own memory, in brief words, clearly and in accordance with its essence.' When the matter of the questions was then ascertained, the commons might ask for the nomination of a committee of lords to confer with them: in 1377 we have seen them naming the lords whose advice they desired; in 1381 the lords insisted that the commons should report their advice to them and not they to the commons; in 1378 the lords proposed a conference by a joint committee; and in 1383 the king chose the committee⁵. In 1402 Henry IV made it a matter of favour to allow the communication⁶; but after his concession made, in 1407, that the money grants should be reported to him by the speaker of the commons, the royal objections, which no doubt arose from the wish to balance the two houses against one another in order to obtain larger money grants, were withdrawn. If no question arose upon the subject of the opening speech, the commons sometimes returned an address of thanks to the king for the information given them. This may have been always done, but it is only now and then mentioned in the rolls⁷.

Joint deliberations of lords and
commons.

¹ Rot. Parl. iii. 99, 160: in all these points it is needless to give more than a single illustration; the practice from the reign of Edward II to that of Henry V varied so frequently that to attempt a complete classification of instances would be to give an abstract of the whole of the Rolls of parliament. See also above, p. 442, note 4.

² Rot. Parl. iii. 133.

³ Rot. Parl. iii. 5.

⁴ Rot. Parl. iii. 455.

⁵ See above, vol. ii. pp. 623, 624.

⁶ See Rot. Parl. iii. 486. In 1404 Sir Arnold Savage asked that the king would send certain lords to confer with the commons, and when that was granted, that certain commons might go to confer with the lords; Rot. Parl. iii. 523.

⁷ In 1401 the commons (under Arnold Savage) thanked the king for the speech with which Sir William Thirning had opened parliament; Rot. Parl. 455. In 1402 there was an address a few days after the opening of the session, chiefly of gratitude; ib. p. 487.

437. Although the subjects of the royal questions and of the conferences of the two houses would necessarily embrace all matters of policy and administration of which the crown required or allowed itself to be advised, the most frequent and most definite points discussed in them were supply and account. On these points, when the king was present, generalities alone, as a rule, were uttered; it was only in some great strait or in contemplation of some grand design that figures were mentioned. It would seem to have been usual for the king to send a commissioner or two to discuss his necessities with both houses; just as he communicated with the clerical convocations when he wanted a grant. Thus in 1308 we find Thomas of Lancaster and Hugh le Despenser carrying a message from Edward II to the lords¹; in 1343 and 1346 Bartholomew Burghersh acted as the king's envoy; and in 1372 Guy Brian laid the king's financial condition before the lords and commons together². But the most perfect illustration of this proceeding is that of the year 1433, when lord Cromwell made the interesting financial statement from which we learn so much of the nature of the revenue³. On the 18th of October, 1433, Lord Cromwell, being then treasurer, laid before the king a petition containing certain conditions on which he had undertaken the office: he explained that the royal revenue was insufficient by a sum of £35,000 for the royal expenditure, but as this fact could not be understood without an examination of the accounts of the exchequer, he prayed that the lords might be charged to examine the accounts and have the record enrolled, and to give diligence that provision should be made for the king's necessities; that he himself should be authorised to give a preference in payment to the debts of the household, the wardrobe, and necessary works; that no grants should be made without information to be laid by the treasurer before the council, and that he should in his office of treasurer act as freely as his predecessors, receive the help of the lords, and incur no hin-

Money
questions discussed privately.

Financial statements laid before parliament.

Lord Cromwell's statement
in 1433.

¹ See above, vol. ii. p. 333.

² See above, vol. ii. p. 444; Rot. Parl. ii. 137, 157.

³ See above, p. 121.

drance or odium in the discharge of his duties. The king granted the petition: thereupon the accounts were read before the lords: subsequently the treasurer was by advice of the lords charged to lay the state of the kingdom, in the same way, before the commons in their common house on the following day: and this was done¹. Although the occasion was exceptional, the manner of proceeding was probably customary.

Forms of grants of money.

Grants made by the two houses together:
by the commons with the consent of the lords.

Money bills thrice read.

438. The result of the conferences with the lords and with the treasurer on financial questions was the grant of money. On this point we have circumstantial documentary evidence from the very first; both in the writs by which the king, whilst ordering the collection of the taxes, carefully explains the occasion of the grant and states by whom and in what proportions it is granted; and very frequently in the 'form of grant,' the schedule of directions for collection, which the grantors have drawn up and presented, sometimes as a condition, sometimes as an appendage to the grant. After the date at which the two houses began to make their grants on one plan, ceasing to vote their money independently, and clothing the gift in the form of tenths and fifteenths, wool, tannage and poundage, and other imposts which affected all classes alike, the money grant took a more definite form; and from the end of the reign of Richard II all grants were made by the commons with the advice and assent of the lords in a documentary form which may be termed an act of the parliament. Of these we have had many examples; we know them to have been the result of a conference between the lords and commons, but, with the exception of the discussions on the poll-tax in 1377 and 1380², we have very seldom any details of debate upon them, or of the exact steps of the process by which they became law. The practice of three readings in each house, the possible speaking, suggestion of alterations and amendments, all the later etiquette of procedure on money bills, will be sought in vain in the rolls of the medieval parliaments. The practice of thrice reading the bills appears however in the journals of the two houses so early, and is from the very first parliament of Henry VIII regarded so clearly as an established rule, that it must have full credit for antiquity : it was a matter of course¹.

¹ Rot. Parl. iv. 432-439.

² See above, vol. ii. pp. 459, 470.

439. Scarcely more light is shed on the details of legislative procedure. On this point we have already concluded that both the king and the several members of both houses and the houses themselves had the right of initiation²: Edward III of his own good will proposed to remedy the evils of purveyance³; the lords proposed the legislation by which peers are entitled to be tried by their peers in parliament⁴, and on the petition of the commons most of the legislation of the middle ages is founded. The king's projects for the alteration of the law would be laid by the chancellor before the house of lords, and after discussion they would go down to the commons: a similar course was adopted in all cases in which the legislation began in the house of lords or on petition addressed to them. When the act, petition, or bill had reached the requisite stage, that is, as it must be supposed, had been read three times, it was endorsed by the clerk of the parliament '*soit baille*⁵ aux commons;' it was then sent down to the lower house by the hands of some of the judges or legal advisers of the parliament, with the message informing the commons of the subject of the bill and asking their advice⁶.

Legislative proceedings.

Initiation of legislation.

Bills sent down from the lords to the commons.

¹ In the first parliament of Henry VIII, on the 23rd day of the session 'adducta est a domo inferiori' 'billā de concessione subsidii quae lecta fuit semel cum proviso adjungendo pro mercatoribus de ly hansa Theutonico- rum.' On the 24th day the proviso was read and expedited; on the 27th it was sent down to the commons; on the 29th the bill of the subsidy was delivered to Sir Thomas Lovel and his companions. The plan was thus in full working. Lords' Journals, i. pp. 7, 8.

² See above, vol. ii. pp. 619 sq.

³ Above, vol. ii. p. 435.

⁴ Above, vol. ii. p. 408.

⁵ See Rot. Parl. Hen. VIII, pp. cxcvii, ccvi, ccix, &c.

⁶ See below, p. 489. The form in the Lords' Journals of 1510 was this: 'Jan. 24 Receptae sunt quatuor billae legendae, una pro libertatibus ecclesiae Anglicanae, una pro retornis falsis, &c. Billa pro reformatione ecclesiasticae libertatis bis lecta tradita fuit attornato et sollicitatori regis reformanda et emendanda,' &c. 'Die 5^o Lecta est Billa concernens ecclesiasticas libertates et jam bis lecta; Item,' &c. 'Die 7^o Item eodem die lecta est tunc tertia vice billa concernens libertates ecclesiae Anglicanae quae unanimi omnium dominorum tunc praesentium fuit approbata et admissa;' 'Item per dominos datae erat in mandatis clerico parlamenti et attornato et sollicitatori regis quod crastino in mane deferrent ad domum inferiorem billam de ecclesiasticis libertatibus,' &c. 'Die 8^o Billa de

Bills in the house of commons.

Private petitions.

Bills sent up by the commons to the lords.

Common petitions of the house of commons.

The practice of the house of commons was analogous; there also a proposition for the change of the law, or for the remedy of a grievance, might originate in either a private petition of an individual aggrieved, or a proposition by a particular member, or a general petition of the house. The custom of presenting private petitions to the house of commons, desiring them to use their influence with the king, came in first under Henry IV¹. These petitions would require to be sorted, as did those addressed to the king and lords; but the house did not yet, so far as can be seen, appoint a committee of petitions; the matter was arranged between the clerk and the whole house. Such private petitions as seem to merit the consideration of the commons were after examination sent up to the lords with the note prefixed '*Soit baillé aux seigneurs*²,' and there passed through the further stages before receiving the king's assent; 'soit fait comme il est désiré.' All these are of the nature of what are now called private bills; a proceeding half legislative and half judicial; the result may be termed an act of parliament, but it was not a statute, and instead of appearing among the laws of the realm was established and notified by letters patent under the great seal.

440. The common petitions of the house were a much more weighty matter. They were the national response to the king's promise to redress grievance. They were the result of deliberation and debate among the commons themselves, whether they originated in the independent proposition of an individual member, adopted by the house as a subject of petition, or in the complaints of his constituents, or in the organised policy of libertatibus ecclesiasticis, &c., missae sunt in domum communem; nuncii clericus parliamenti et attornatus regis;' vol. i. pp. 4-6. Bills relating to the crown were sent down by two judges; other messages by masters in chancery; the commons sent up their bills by one member, either the chairman of committee of ways and means or the member in charge of the bill, accompanied by seven others. This was altered in 1817 and 1855; see E. May, Treatise on Parliament, pp. 435-437.

¹ Rot. Parl. iii. 564. Every possible variation is found in the heading of the petitions; some are to the king, others to the king and council, to the king, lords, and commons, to the lords and commons, and to the commons alone. The latter request the commons to mediate with the king and council.

² See instances in Rot. Parl. iv. pp. 159, 160 sq., and generally from the reign of Henry V onwards.

a party, or in the unanimous wish of the whole house. Unquestionably they went through stages of which the rolls contain no indication before they were presented as the 'common petitions'.¹ The history of this branch of parliamentary work has already been illustrated as fully as our materials allow; the articles of the barons at Runnymede and at Oxford, the petitions of the whole community at Lincoln in 1301, at Westminster in 1309 and 1310, mark the first great stages of political growth in the nation. They are initiations of legislative reform, as much as the great statutes of Edward I. The common petitions of the fifteenth century, the petty gravamina, the minute details of amendments of law, are the later developments of the principles boldly enunciated in those documents: and the statutes based on the common petitions bear on the face evidence of their unbroken descent. It is not improbable that this process was identical with that by which in the discussions of the ecclesiastical convocations the gravamina of individuals, the reformanda or proposed remedies, and the articuli cleri or completed representations sent up to the house of bishops, are and have been from the very first framed and treated². The gravamina of individual members of convocation answer to the initiatory act of the individual member in the commons, and the 'articuli cleri' to the 'communes petitiones'; both expressions may be traced back to the earliest days of representative assemblies. In the reign of Henry III we find gravamina and articuli among the clergy; in the reigns of John, Henry III, and Edward I we have articuli and occasionally gravamina among the laity. From the reign of Edward III the king promises in the opening speech to redress the grievances of his subjects; and from the year 1343 the petitions of the commons are presented in a roll of articles,

Parallel drawn from the proceedings of convocation.

¹ In 1423 the merchants of the Staple sent in a petition to the lords; 'la quelle petition depuis fust mande par mesmes les Seigneurs as ditz communes pour ent avoir leur avys, les queux communes mesme la petition rebaillerent come une de leur communes petitions;' Rot. Parl. iv. 250. It is very rarely that we find such an amount of detail.

² See the standing orders of the lower house of convocation, drawn up it is believed in or about 1722 by bishop Gibson; and Gibson's Synodus Anglicana, cc. xii, xiii.

Obscurity of the method of proceeding.

Adoption of the form of bills.

almost exactly resembling the articuli cleri. Yet here again except for this glimpse of light we are in complete darkness as to the exact steps of proceeding. There was a roll of petitions, on which, as we learn from Haxey's case, it was not very difficult to obtain the entry of a gravamen, which the prudence of the house, were it wide awake, could scarcely have allowed to pass. It cannot be believed that the articles of Haxey's petition, touching the number of ladies and bishops at court, could have been read three times and approved by the house, or, as is the practice in convocation, had been adopted by two-thirds of the members; yet if it were not, it is difficult to understand how the custom of three readings can be regarded as an established rule. By some such process however the common petitions must have been authenticated; they were adopted by the house as its own, and sent up through the house of lords to the king. Even this we only learn from the enacting words of the statutes, and from a rare mention on the rolls of the cases in which the lords joined in the king's refusal. The statutes are made by the king with the advice and consent of the lords spiritual and temporal; the petitions are answered 'le roi le veut' or 'le roi s'avisera' with the advice of the lords. Towards the close of our period the form of bill drawn as a statute has begun to take the place of petition. This custom was introduced first in the legislative acts which were originated by the king; the law proposed was laid before the houses in the form which it was ultimately to take. It was then adopted in private petitions which contained the form of letters patent in which a favourable assent was expressed¹. The form was found convenient by the commons in their grants, and by the king in bills of attainder; it became applicable to all kinds of legislation, and from the reign of Henry VII was adopted in most important enactments².

¹ A good instance is the king's act on purveyance in 1439; Rot. Parl. v. 7, 8: 'quaedam cedula sive billa communibus praedictis de mandato ipsius domini regis exhibita fuit et liberata sub hac verborum serie.' The act for the attainder of Henry VI and his partisans in 1461 was brought forward as 'quaedam cedula formam actus in se continens;' Rot. Parl. v. 476. Private petitions in this form are found ib. iv. 323, etc.

² See Rot. Parl. vi. 138, &c. It is to this form of initiation that the

We have already traced the efforts made by the commons to secure the honest reproduction of the words of their petitions in the statutes founded upon them; that object was more perfectly secured by the adoption of the new form, the promulgation of a new law or act in the exact form in which it was to appear, if it passed, eventually in the statute roll. In this form we can more distinctly trace its progress: after the due readings and final adoption by the commons, it was sent up with the inscription 'Soit baillé aux seigneurs,' and was considered and adopted or rejected by the lords¹. If they accepted it, it was again indorsed 'Les seigneurs sont assentus' and then submitted to the king. The same process was observed in statutes that originated with the lords: the commons recorded their assent, 'Les communs sont assentus,' and the bills went up to the king and his council.

Process of carrying a bill through the commons.

Mutual assents.

441. The legislative act, when it had received the final form in which it was to become a part of the national code or statute roll, appeared as the act of the king. The enacting words as they appear in the first statute of Henry VII are these: 'The king . . . at his parliament holden at Westminster . . . to the honour of God and Holy Church and for the common profit of the realm, by the assent of the lords spiritual and temporal process of readings, committals, and report are most easily applied; and they appear very early in the Journals; thus 2 Edw. VI, Dec. 10, 'The bill for levying of fines in the county palatine of Chester; committed to Mr. Hare.' Jan. 8th: 'To draw a bill for the absence of knights and burgesses of parliament—Mr. Goodrick, Mr. Arundel;' Commons' Journals, i. 5, 6.

Enacting words of the king.

¹ The first proofs of the three readings occur in the first Journals of the Commons; the first reading is simply noted; on the second reading follows the direction 'Ingrossetur;' on the third the note 'Judicium;' see Commons' Journals, i. 12, &c. The form however in which the three readings are recorded before the royal assent is given runs thus, 'Qua quidem perfecta et ad plenum intellecta eidem per dictum regem &c. &c. fiebat responsio;' Lords' Journals, i. p. 9. This form occurs early in the reign of Henry VI and must be understood to have then the same meaning as in the first of Henry VIII. See Rot. Parl. v. 363: 'Quae quidem petitio et cedulae transportatae fuerunt et deliberatae communibus regni Angliae in eodem parlamento existentibus; quibus iidem communes assensum suum prae buerunt sub hac forma, "a ceste bille et a les cedules a ycest bille annexez les Commyns sont assentuz;" quibus quidem petitione, cedulis et assensu, in parlamento praedicto lectis auditis et plenius intellectis, de avisamento et assensu dominorum spiritualium et temporalium in eodem parlamento existentium, auctoritate ejusdem parlamenti respondebatur eisdem in forma sequenti.'

and the commons in the said parliament assembled and by authority of the same hath do to be made certain statutes and ordinances Be it enacted by the advice of the lords spiritual and temporal and the commons in this present parliament assembled and by the authority of the same¹. Sometimes assent as well as advice was again expressed, and the threefold expression of assent, advice, and authority may be regarded as the declaration of the function of the estates in legislation. We have in former chapters dwelt on the importance of these formulae; we have seen how, during the fourteenth century, petition or instance was the word used of the commons' share, and that it expressed the truth that most of the legal changes were suggested by their petitions. Under Richard II the mention of petition drops out, and occasionally the full equality of the commons is expressed by the form 'assent of the prelates, lords, and commons.' The statutes of Henry IV and Henry V are passed 'by the assent of the prelates, dukes, earls, barons, and at the instance and special request of the commons,' or 'by the advice and assent of the lords spiritual and temporal, and at the prayer of the commons.' The same form is observed during great part of the reign of Henry VI in the statutes; but the assent of the commons is put forward in the act by which the protector is appointed in 1422², and in other acts of a less public character: the assent, or advice and assent, of the commons as well as of the lords is likewise expressed in the borrowing powers granted to the council³. In the 11th year of this king the expression 'by the authority of parliament' first appears among the words of enactment in the preamble of the statutes⁴. This particular form seems to have been used some years earlier in the separate clauses of statutes, although not in the heading of the roll: and in this way it is found as early as the year 1421⁵: it was also used in petitions, in letters patent drawn up in compliance with private petitions, and in the bills introduced in the form of statutes: thus in

Introduction of the form 'by authority of the same.'

¹ Stat. 1 Hen. VII, preamble, Statutes, ii. 500.

² Rot. Parl. iv. 174.

³ Ibid. iv. 276; see above, p. 260.

⁴ Statutes, ii. 278.

⁵ Rot. Parl. iv. 130.

1442 a petition passed the commons for the endowment of Eton College, in which that house was requested to pray the king to grant letters patent under his great seal by the advice and assent of the lords spiritual and temporal in this present parliament assembled, and by authority of the same parliament¹: in 1439 the bishop of S. David's and the dean and chapter of S. Paul's had letters patent in which the same form was used; in 1423 the executors of Henry V had letters patent under the great seal by the authority of the parliament². From the year 1445 it becomes a regular part of the enacting and ordaining words which head the roll³. The form used by Henry VII has lasted with few unimportant variations down to the present day.

In modern times—that is, since parliamentary machinery has been matured—a bill before becoming an act has to go through several distinct stages. In the house of commons the proposer asks leave to introduce it, and it is ordered; it passes its first reading, in most cases without being discussed on its merits; it comes to the second reading; its principle is discussed, resolutions affecting its character may be debated, and then it passes into committee: it is committed, discussed clause by clause and amended; reported and perhaps recommitted; it is brought up for a third reading, debated again if necessary, read a third time and passed. It goes through a similar process in the house of lords, where however the bills are presented without formal notice. If it has originated in the upper house it does not escape like manipulation in the lower. After the report is brought up it is printed, or, as was until recently the case, ingrossed. After passing both houses it is still subject to the royal veto, although for more than a century and a half that right has not been exercised⁴.

Modern procedure on bills.

¹ Rot. Parl. v. 45. Instances of the form in petitions will be found as early as the reign of Henry IV, if not earlier; see Rot. Parl. iii. 530, 656; iv. 35, 40, 43, &c., 323, 325, 546. The indorsement on writs 'by authority of the parliament' does not imply that the parliament was sitting at the time, but that the king was acting in virtue of some power bestowed by the parliament by a special act. See Nicolas, Ordinances, &c., vi. p. ccv, and also Elsyng, pp. 282 sq.

² Rot. Parl. iv. 206, 207; v. 8, 9, 13.

³ Statutes, ii. 326; Rot. Parl. v. 70.

⁴ Sir T. Erskine May, Treatise on Parliament, pp. 468 sq.

Probable antiquity of these processes.

442. Of the minute points of this carefully arranged proceeding some are doubtless of modern growth; but the substance of the programme must be ancient. The three readings of the bills are traceable as soon as the form of bill is adopted; the committees for framing laws find a precedent as early as 1340, when a committee of the two houses was appointed to draw up the statutes framed on the petitions¹; they are spoken of by Sir Thomas Smith as an essential part of legislative process; 'the committees are such as either the lords in the higher house or the burgesses in the lower house do choose to frame the laws upon such bills as are agreed on and afterwards to be ratified by the same houses;' after the first or second reading the bill is ordered to be ingrossed; it is read a third time, then the question is put; and traces of this procedure are found in the earliest journals of both houses: the silence of the rolls implies nothing as to the novelty of the practice.

We look in vain for illustrations of the rules of debate, and of the way in which order was maintained, or for any standing orders. Yet as soon as the journals begin, order, debate, and the by-laws of procedure, are all found in working. We are compelled to believe that many of them are ancient.

Sir Thomas Smith's account of the session of parliament.

In default then of anything like contemporary evidence, we may accept Sir Thomas Smith's account of the holding of parliament, notwithstanding the strong infusion of Tudor theory with which it is inseparably mixed, as approximately true of the century that preceded: the extract is long, but it needs no apology, and will supply all that is wanted here in respect of the procedure of the two houses:—

Constitution of the parliament.

443. 'The most high and absolute power of the realm of England consisteth in the parliament: for as in war where the king himself in person, the nobility, the rest of the gentility and the yeomanry are, is the force and power of England; so in peace and consultation where the prince is, to give life and the last and highest commandment, the barony or nobility for the higher, the knights, esquires, gentlemen and commons for the lower part of the commonwealth, the bishops for the clergy, be present to advertise consult and show what is good and necessary for the commonwealth and to consult together; and upon mature deliberation, every bill or law being thrice read and disputed upon in either house, the other two parts, first each apart, and after the prince himself in the presence of both the parties, doth consent unto and alloweth. That is the prince's and the whole realm's deed, whereupon justly no man can complain but must accommodate himself to find it good and obey it.

¹ Rot. Parl. ii. 113; above, vol. ii. p. 401.

‘That which is done by this consent is called firm, stable and sanctum, and is taken for law. The parliament abrogateth old laws, maketh new, giveth order for things past and for things hereafter to be followed, changeth rights and possessions of private men, legitimateth bastards, establisheth forms of religion, altereth weights and measures, giveth form of succession to the crown, defineth of doubtful rights whereof is no law already made, appointeth subsidies, tailles, taxes and impositions, giveth most free pardons and absolutions, restoreth in blood and name, as the highest court, condemneth or absolveth them whom the prince will put to trial. And to be short, all that ever the people of Rome might do either in centuriatis comitiis or tributis, the same may be done by the parliament of England, which representeth and hath the power of the whole realm, both the head and body. For every Englishman is intended to be there present, either in person or by procuration and attorney, of what pre-eminence, state, dignity or quality soever he be, from the prince, be he king or queen, to the lowest person of England. And the consent of the parliament is taken to be every man's consent.

Power of the parliament.

Representative character.

‘The judges in parliament are the king or ‘queen's majesty, the lords temporal and spiritual; the commons represented by the knights and burgesses of every shire and borough town. These all or the greater part of them, and that with the consent of the prince for the time being, must agree to the making of laws.

Judges of parliament.

‘The officers in parliament are the speakers, two clerks, the Officers.

one for the higher house the other for the lower¹, and committees.

The speaker. 'The speaker is he that doth commend and prefer the bills exhibited into the parliament, and is the mouth of the parliament. He is commonly appointed by the king or queen though accepted by the assent of the house².

The clerks. 'The clerks are the keepers of the parliament rolls and records, and of the statutes made, and have the custody of the private statutes not printed.

Committees. 'The committees are such as either the lords in the higher house, or burgesses in the lower house do choose to frame the laws upon such bills as are agreed upon, and afterward to be ratified by the said houses³.

Writs of summons. 'The prince sendeth forth his rescripts or writs to every duke, marquess, baron and every other lord temporal or spiritual who hath voice in the parliament, to be at his great council of parliament such a day (the space from the day of the writ is commonly at the least forty days⁴); he sendeth also writs to the sheriffs of every shire to admonish the whole shire to choose two knights of the parliament in the name of the shire, to hear and reason and to give their advice and consent in the name of the shire, and to be present at that day; likewise to every city and town which of ancient time hath been wont to find burgesses of the parliament, so to make election, that they might be present there at the first day of the parliament. The knights of the shire be chosen by all the gentlemen and yeomen of the shire present at the day assigned for the election; the voice of any absent can be counted for none. Yeomen I call here, as before, that may dispend at the least forty shillings of yearly rent of free land of his own. These meeting at one day, the two who have the more of their voices to be chosen knights of the shire for that parliament; likewise by the plurality of

¹ See above, p. 468.

² This is a mark of Tudor innovation. See Coke, 4th Inst. p. 8: 'for avoiding of expense of time and contestation the use is, as in the congé d'eslire of a bishop, that the king doth name a discreet and learned man whom the commons elect.'

³ See above, p. 483.

⁴ See above, p. 364.

the voices of the citizens and burgesses be the burgesses elected.

‘The first day of the parliament the prince and all the lords, in their robes of parliament, do meet in the higher house, where, after prayers made, they that be present are written and they that be absent upon sickness or some other reasonable cause, which the prince will allow, do constitute under their hand and seal some one of those who be present as their procurer or attorney, to give voice for them, so that by presence or attorney and proxy they be all there; all the princes and barons, and all archbishops and bishops, and, when abbots were, so many abbots as had voice in parliament¹. The place where the assembly is, is richly tapessed and hanged; a princely and royal throne, as appertaineth to a king, set in the midst of the higher place thereof. Next under the prince sitteth the chancellor, who is the voice and orator of the prince. On the one side of the house or chamber sitteth the archbishops and bishops each in his rank, on the other side the dukes and barons.

Meeting of parliament.

The parliament house.

‘In the midst thereof upon woollsacks sitteth the judges of the realm, the master of the rolls, and the secretaries of state. But these that sit on the woollsacks have no voice in the house, but only sit there to answer their knowledge in the law, when they be asked, if any doubt arise among the lords: the secretaries do answer of such letters or things passed in council whereof they have the custody and knowledge: and this is called the upper house, whose consent and dissent is given by each man severally and by himself, first for himself, and then severally for so many as he hath letters and proxies; when it cometh to the question, saying only Content or Not Content, without further reasoning or replying.

Arrangement of the house of lords.

‘In this meantime the knights of the shires and burgesses of parliament, for so they are called that have voice in parliament and are chosen (as I have said before), to the number betwixt three and four hundred², are called by such as it

Meeting of the commons.

¹ See above, p. 460.

² The additions to the representative body made between the time of

Choice of speaker.

His admission.

Privileges claimed by the speaker.

pleaseth the prince to appoint, into another great house or chamber, by name, to which they answer; and declaring for what shire or town they answer, then they are willed to choose an able and discreet man to be as it were the mouth of them all, and to speak for and in the name of them, and to present him so chosen by them to the prince: which done, they coming all with him to a bar which is at the nether end of the upper house, there he first praiseth the prince, then maketh his excuse of inability, and prayeth the prince that he would command the commons to choose another. The chancellor in the prince's name doth so much declare him as able as he did declare himself unable, and thanketh the commons for choosing so wise, discreet and eloquent a man, and willeth them to go and consult of laws for the commonwealth. Then the speaker maketh certain requests to the prince in the name of the commons; first that his majesty would be content that they may use and enjoy all their liberties and privileges that the common house was wont to enjoy; secondly, that they might frankly and freely say their minds in disputing of such matters as may come in question and that without offence to his majesty; thirdly, that if any should chance of that lower house to offend, or not to do or say as should become him, or if any should offend any of them being called to make his highness' court, that they themselves might, according to the ancient custom, have the punishment of them: and fourthly, that, if there come any doubt whereupon they shall desire to have the advice or conference with his majesty or with any of the lords, they might do it¹; all which he promiseth in the commons' names that they shall not abuse but have such regard as most faithful true and loving subjects ought to have to their prince.

Smith and that of Fortescue were in Henry VIII's reign the knights of the shire for Cheshire, Monmouthshire, and the Welsh counties; and burgesses for Buckingham, Chester, Berwick, Orford, Calais, and the Welsh county towns; under Edward VI, eight towns in Cornwall, Maidstone, Boston, Westminster, Thetford, Peterborough, and Brackley were added, and S. Albans, Lancaster, Preston, Wigan, Liverpool, Petersfield, Lichfield, Thirsk, and Hedon, which had sent members to the early parliaments, were revived as parliamentary boroughs; under Mary, Abingdon, Aylesbury, S. Ives, Castlerising, Higham Ferrers, Morpeth, Banbury, Knaresborough, Boroughbridge, and Aldborough were added, and Woodstock, Ripon, and Droitwich revived; under Elizabeth twenty-four new boroughs were added and seven revived. See Browne Willis, Not. Parl. iii. 92-101.

'The chancellor answereth in the prince's name as appertaineth. And this is all that is done for one day and some time for two.

'Besides the chancellor there is one in the upper house who is called the clerk of the parliament, who readeth the bills. Process upon bills. For all that cometh in consultation either in the upper house or in the nether house is put in writing first in paper²: which being once read, he that will riseth up and speaketh with it or against it; and so one after another so long as they shall think good. That done they go to another, and so another bill. After it hath been once or twice read³, and doth appear that it is somewhat liked as reasonable, with such amendment in words and peradventure some sentences as by disputation seemeth to be amended; in the upper house the chancellor asketh if they Form of passing bills. will have it ingrossed, that is to say, put into parchment⁴; which done and read the third time, and that eftsoones, if any be disposed to object, disputed again among them, the chancellor asketh if they will go to the question. And, if they agree to go to the question, then he saith, "Here is such a law or act concerning such a matter, which hath been thrice read here in this house; are ye content that it be enacted or no?" If the Non-Contents be more, then the bill is dashed; that is to say, the law is annihilated and goeth no farther. If the Contents

¹ This form does not exactly agree with any of those recorded, but it gives the general spirit of the petition. See above, pp. 470, 471; Lex Parliamentaria, pp. 137, 138; Coke, 4th Inst. p. 8.

² Lords' Journals, i. 4: 1510, Jan. 25, 'Billa de apparatu, in papiro, lecta est jam primo et tradita attornato et sollicitatori domini regis emendanda.'

³ Bills of general pardon and of clerical subsidies were read but once in each house; Lex Parliamentaria, p. 178.

⁴ See above, p. 480, note. In 1401 the commons pray that the business of parliament may be ingrossed before the departure of the justices; Rot. Parl. iii. 457, 458: and in 1420 that the petitions may not be ingrossed until they have been sent to the king in France; ib. iv. 128. In 1404 they allege that an error had been made in the ingrossing of the grant of subsidy; ib. iii. 556. None of these passages seem to refer to anything like the ingrossing after second reading. See Coke, 4th Inst. p. 25; Lex Parliamentaria, p. 186.

Bills sent down to the commons.

be more, then the clerk writeth underneath "Soit baillé aux commons." And so when they see time they send such bills as they have approved, by two or three of those which do sit on the woollsacks¹, to the commons; who asking licence and coming into the house with due reverence, saith to the speaker, "Master Speaker, my lords of the upper house have passed among them and think good that there should be enacted by parliament" such an act, and such an act, and so readeth the titles of that act or acts; "they pray you to consider of them and show them your advice:" which done they go their way. They being gone and the door again shut, the speaker rehearseth to the house what they said. And if they be not busy disputing at that time in another bill, he asketh them straightway if they will have that bill, or, if there be more, one of them.

Procedure
in the house of commons.

'In like manner in the lower house; the speaker, sitting in a seat or chair for that purpose somewhat higher than he may see and be seen of them all, hath before him, in a lower seat, his clerk who readeth such bills as be first propounded in the lower house, or be sent down from the lords. For in that point each house hath equal authority to propound what they think meet, either for the abrogating of some law made before, or for making of a new. All bills be thrice, in three divers days, read and disputed upon, before they come to the question. In the disputing is a marvellous good order used in the lower house. He that standeth up bare headed is understood that he will speak to the bill. If more stand up, who that is first judged to arise is first heard; though the one do praise the law, the other dissuade it, yet there is no altercation. For every man speaketh as to the speaker², not as one to another, for this is against the order of the house. It is also taken against the order to name him whom ye do confute but by circumlocution, as he that speaketh with the bill or he that spake against the bill and gave this and this reason. And so with perpetual oration not with altercation he goeth through till he do make an end. He that once hath spoken in a bill, though he be confuted straight, that day may not reply, no

Practice in debates.

Standing
orders.

¹ See above, p. 476.

² Lex Parliamentaria, p. 150.

though he would change his opinion ; so that to one bill in one day one may not in that house speak twice, for else one or two with alteration would spend all the time. The next day he may, but then also but once¹. No reviling or nipping words must be used ; for then all the house will cry “ it is against the order ;” and if any speak unreverently or seditiously against the prince or the privy council, I have seen them not only interrupted, but it hath been moved after to the house and they have sent them to the Tower. So that in such multitude and in such diversity of minds and opinions there is the greatest modesty and temperance of speech that can be used. Nevertheless with much doulce² and gentle terms they make their reasons as violent and as vehement one against the other as they may ordinarily, except it be for urgent causes and hasting of time. At the afternoon they keep no parliament. The speaker hath no voice in the house, nor they will not suffer him to speak in any bill to move or dissuade it. But when any bill is read, the speaker’s office is as briefly and as plainly as he may to declare the effect thereof to the house. If the commons do assent to such bills as be sent to them first agreed upon from the lords [they send them back to the lords] thus subscribed “ les commons ont assentus ;” so if the lords do agree to such bills as be first agreed upon by the commons, they send them down to the speaker thus subscribed “ les seigneurs ont assentus.” If they cannot agree, the two houses, for every bill from whencesoever it doth come is thrice read in each of the houses, if it be understood that there is any sticking, sometimes the lords to the commons, sometimes the commons to the lords, do require that a certain of each house may meet together and so each part to be informed of other’s meaning ; and this is always granted. After which meeting for the most part, not always, either part agrees to other’s bills.

Maintenance of order.

Office of speaker.

Cases of difference between the two houses.

‘ In the upper house they give their assent and dissent, each man severally and by himself, first for himself, and then for so

¹ Lex Parliamentaria, p. 186.

² So in the reign of Richard II, the commons urged that the petitions should be ‘ par amyable manere debatez ;’ Rot. Parl. iii. 14.

Different form of voting.

many as he hath proxy. When the chancellor hath demanded of them whether they will go to the question after the bill hath been thrice read, they saying only Content or Non-Content without further reasoning or replying, and as the more number doth agree so it is agreed on or dashed.

No proxies in the commons.

'In the nether house none of them that is elected, either knight or burgess, can give his voice to another, nor his consent or dissent by proxy. The more part of them that be present only maketh the consent or dissent.

Second and third readings.

'After the bill hath been twice read and then ingrossed and eftsoones read and disputed on enough as is thought, the speaker asketh if they will go to the question. And, if they agree, he holdeth the bill up in his hand and saith, "As many as will that this bill go forward, which is concerning such a matter, say 'Yea.'" Then they which allow the bill cry "Yea," and as many as will not say "No;" as the cry of yea or no is bigger, so the bill is allowed or dashed. If it be a doubt which cry is bigger they divide the house, the speaker saying "As many as do allow the bill go down with the bill, and as many as do not, sit still." So they divide themselves, and being so divided they are numbered who made the more part, and so the bill doth speed. It chanceth sometime that some part of the bill is allowed, some other part hath much contrariety and doubt made of it; and it is thought if it were amended it would go forward. Then they choose certain committees of them who have spoken with the bill and against it to amend it and bring it in again so amended as they amongst them shall think meet: and this is before it is ingrossed; yea and sometime after. But the agreement of these committees is no prejudice to the house. For at the last question they will either accept it or dash it as it shall seem good¹, notwithstanding that whatsoever the committees have done.

Committals and re-committals.

'Thus no bill is an act of parliament, ordinance, or edict of ¹ Dec. 8, 1548: 'L. 3. The bill for the assurance of the earl of Bath's lands: vacat per majorem numerum super quaestione;' Commons' Journals, i. 5.

law until both the houses severally have agreed unto it after the order aforesaid; no nor then neither. But the last day of that parliament or session the prince cometh in person in his parliament robes and sitteth in his state; all the upper house sitteth about the prince in their states and order in their robes. The speaker with all the common house cometh to the bar, and there after thanksgiving first in the lords' name by the chancellor and in the commons' name by the speaker to the prince for that he hath so great care of the good government of his people, and for calling them together to advise of such things as should be for the reformation, establishing, and ornament of the commonwealth; the chancellor in the prince's name giveth thanks to the lords and commons for their pains and travails taken, which he saith the prince will remember and recompense when time and occasion shall serve; and that he for his part is ready to declare his pleasure concerning their proceedings, whereby the same may have perfect life and accomplishment by his princely authority, and so have the whole consent of the realm. Then one readeth the titles of every act which hath passed at that session, but only in this fashion, "An act concerning such a thing," &c. It is marked there what the prince doth allow and to such he saith "Le roy" or "La royne le veult¹." And those be taken now as perfect laws and ordi-

Close of the session.

Speeches at the dissolution.

¹ The form by which the act of subsidy was authorised ran thus:—'Le roi remercie ses communes de lor boons cuers en faisant les grauntes suidictz, mesmes les grants accepte, et tout le content en l'enditure avandit especifie graunte et approve, avesque l'act et les provisions a cest inditure annexez;' Lords' Journals, i. 9; Rot. Parl. v. 510. The endorsement on the legislative acts was added after the last act of the session: 'Qua quidem perfecta et ad plenum intellecta eidem per dictum dominum regem de advisamento et assensu dominorum spiritualium et temporalium ac communitatis in parlamento praedicto existentium, auctoritateque ejusdem parlamenti sequens fiebat responsio "Le roi le veult;"' Lords' Journals, i. 9. The process by which the form 'le roi s'avisera' acquired the meaning of refusal, may be worked out on the Rolls: Edward I could say 'rex non habet consilium mutandi consuetudinem . . . nec statuta sua revocandi;' Rot. Parl. i. 51: but he generally gives reasons. Under Edward II we find 'rex habebit advisamentum' in a natural sense, p. 394: 'injusta est,' pp. 393, 408; 'nihil,' p. 435. Edward III has 'le roi s'avisera de faire l'eeise a son peuple q'il pourra bonement,' ii. 142; 'soit le roi avise,' p. 169; 'le roi s'avisera queux,' &c., pp. 166, 169; and simply 'le roi s'avisera,' p. 172; 'ce n'est pas resonable,' p. 240; 'est noun resonable,' p. 241; 'les seigneurs se aviseront,' p. 318; after the accession of Richard II it seems to have its modern meaning.

Public and private acts.

nances of the realm of England and none other; and, as shortly as may be, put in print, except it be some private cause or law made for the benefit or prejudice of some private man, which the Romans were wont to call privilegia. These be only exemplified under the seal of the parliament and for the most part not printed. To those which the prince liketh not he answereth "Le roy" or "La royne s'advisera," and those be accounted utterly dashed and of none effect.

'This is the order and form of the highest and most authentic court of England¹.'

Judicature of the house
of lords.

444. The judicial functions of parliament, including in their widest acceptation the decision of great suits and civil appeals by the house of lords, the trial of lords and others impeached or appealed, the practice used in bills of attainder, and the quasi-judicial action of both houses in the matter of petitions, find ample illustration in the pages of constitutional history: and the minuter details of parliamentary practice in these matters belong to the jurist rather than to the historian. The parliament, and either house of it, was in fact a tribunal of such extreme resort that rules for proceeding must almost necessarily have been framed as each particular case required. On petitions public and private much the same process was used as we have here attempted to trace in the practice of legislation; a bill of attainder went through the same stages as a bill of settlement or of legal reform. The appeal of treason in parliament, always an irregular and tumultuous proceeding, was forbidden by the first parliament of Henry IV². The supreme or appellate jurisdiction of the lords in civil suits is a matter rarely heard of from the time when the complete and matured organisation of the courts of Westminster had been supplemented by the judicial activity of the council, until it was revived and reorganised in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries³. The practice of trial upon impeachment has thus

Appeals of treason.

Appellate jurisdiction
of the lords.

¹ The Commonwealth of England and manner of government thereof; compiled by the honourable Sir Thomas Smith, knight; London, 1589; bk. ii. cc. 2, 3. Sir Thomas died in 1577.

² See above, p. 24.

³ See May, Treatise on Parliament, p. 53, where the judicial powers of a melancholy prominence in the judicial annals of parliament: and there is no occasion to dwell here on the details which have been given in our narrative chapters. The presumptuous boast of the Merciless Parliament in the case of the appellants of 1388, that parliament is bound by none of the ordinary rules of law, civil or common¹, has not practically met with acceptance even in the extreme cases in which Strafford, Laud, and Charles I were made to feel that a minute adherence to forms is a different thing from the observance of constitutional law. The impeachments as well as the appeals of medieval times are, as has been already remarked, pregnant with warning rather than example.

Impeachments.

Claim of parliament to be above law.

The Rolls of Parliament afford such scanty glimpses of detail in all points except the results of the session, and so seldom contain any notice of speeches or debates, that it would not be safe to argue from their silence that the kings took a very small share in the deliberative work of the national council. It is however quite fair to argue from the position usually occupied by the ministers in the formal transaction of business that it was only on very rare occasions that the king would take part in deliberation, either as a speaker or as a hearer. His presence was deemed necessary at the opening and generally at the close of the session; but most frequently his duty was discharged when he had directed the chancellor to state the causes of summons, and to thank the estates for their attendance. The chancellor was his spokesman in most cases when he approved the election of the speaker. His decision on petitions was expressed by an indorsement which the clerk

Presence of the kings in parliament.

The king is present at the opening of the parliament.

the house of lords are briefly summed up: They have a judicature in the trial of peers, and claims of peerage; a general judicature as a supreme court of appeal from other courts of justice, inherited from the ancient 'concilium regis.' In the seventeenth century they assumed a jurisdiction which has since been abandoned, an original jurisdiction in civil suits; and the like in criminal cases where there was no impeachment by the commons. The appellate jurisdiction in equity has been exercised since the reign of Charles I; and the jurisdiction in cases brought up by writ of error, originally derived from the crown, was confirmed by Stat. 27 Eliz. c. 8. Cf. Coke, 4th Inst. p. 20.

¹ See above, vol. ii. p. 502; Rot. Parl. iii. 236; cf. Coke, 4th Inst. p. 15.

He seldom speaks.

Speeches of Edward III.

His parting speech.

Speeches of Richard II.

of the parliament read on the last day of the session as the king's answer. It was very seldom that he spoke, or was recorded to have spoken; and when it is recorded it is with exceptional solemnity. The imperfection of the records of the reigns of Edward I and Edward II makes it impossible to speak positively with regard to them; Edward I however had probably learned to guard against the garrulity which made his father ridiculous, and Edward II seldom cared even to face his subjects. In 1316¹ we are told that it was by the king's order that William Inge opened the parliament, but even this slight indication is generally suppressed; and the statement that 'de par le roi' such and such ministers spoke cannot be understood to mean that he gave a verbal direction. Under Edward III, whose popular manners and constant association with his barons make the appearance of silence still more strange, the same course was observed; it is in 1363², after he has been more than thirty years on the throne, that we first distinctly find him making his will known to the commons by his own mouth; they thank him for having done this in the last parliament, from which we infer that he had spoken on the occasion of the dissolution. The Parliament of 1362 was that in which the use of English in legal transactions was ordered; that of 1365 was opened with an English speech; it may be inferred that, in giving the estates leave to depart, Edward himself had spoken in English, and that, where in other cases the address of thanks is not said to have been spoken by the chancellor, it was spoken by the king. In the last interview which he had with his parliament, at Sheen in 1377, the parting words are put in his mouth³. The days of serene supremacy passed away with Edward III; Richard II is more than once said to have uttered haughty words in parliament. In 1386 he protested 'par sa bouche demesne' that his prerogative was not impaired by what had taken place in the session; in 1388 he had to declare openly in full parliament that he believed his uncle the duke of Gloucester to be loyal; in 1390 he thanked the lords and commons for their

¹ Rot. Parl. i. 350.

² Ibid. ii. 276.

³ Ibid. ii. 364.

advice and grants. In 1397, in the discussion on Haxey's bill, he allowed the chancellor to complain on his behalf to the lords, but, when that was done, administered a reproof and stated his determination in his own words, and in the same way pardoned the commons when they had made their humble apology. But in this and the following parliament Richard played the part of a politician rather than that of a constitutional sovereign; he discussed in a long speech to the commons the foreign policy which he had adopted, and acted as his own minister¹. In the next session he spoke several times on the accusation against Arundel, and in vindication of his own friends, but these utterances were perhaps judicial: in his last revolutionary session at Shrewsbury he followed the same course, stating with his own mouth at the dissolution that he would annul his pardon recently granted unless the newly voted grants were collected without impediment².

The succeeding kings took a still more prominent part in parliament. Henry IV, whose claim to the crown, spoken in English³, made the occasion an era of constitutional progress, not only signified his wishes to the parliament, but deigned to argue with the commons; he laid himself open to the good advice of the speaker, and condescended on various occasions both to defend himself and to silence his interlocutor: he soon learned that his dignity would not survive too great familiarity, and had to reprove the loquacity of the speaker. It is one of the notable features of his policy that he stood, notwithstanding his difficulties, always face to face with his subjects. The records of the next reign are too meagre to illustrate this point; Henry V seems however to have conversed as freely as his father had done with the lords, and perhaps maintained his dignity better. In the minority of his son, the dukes of Gloucester and Bedford are found stating their own quarrels, notwithstanding their dignified place of protector and chief counsellor, and the boy king was very early made to play his part in the formal solemnities of the session. Edward IV, who

Speeches of Henry IV.

Discussions of Henry IV with the speaker.

¹ Rot. Parl. iii. 338, 339.

² Ibid. iii. 351, 353, 369.

³ See above, p. 12.

Eloquence of Edward IV.

imitated the more popular usages of the rival house, likewise made speeches to both lords and commons; and in particular, in dissolving his first parliament, addressed the speaker in simple and touching language of gratitude and promise¹. All these speeches were made by the king either in full parliament, that is, in the presence of both houses, or in the house of lords to the lords who were then and there in attendance upon him.

Privacy of debate.

It was fully recognised that for anything like consultation the two houses had a right to the utmost privacy; the commons had a right to deliberate by themselves, and the lords by themselves; and, when they desired to be private, the king was ill-advised indeed if he listened to any report of their proceedings other than they presented to him². Although, however, a good deal of the business of the lords was no doubt transacted in the king's presence, medieval history affords no instance of his visiting the house of commons whilst they were debating. The question of freedom of debate belongs to another part of our subject.

Royal power of adjourning and proroguing.

445. The right of suspending the session by adjournment or prorogation, of countermanding a meeting once called, and of dissolving the parliament itself, was throughout the middle ages vested in the king alone³. The distinction between adjournment and prorogation, in so far as the one belongs to the houses and the other to the crown, is a modern distinction. The necessary adjournment from day to day, as well as the countermanding of a parliament called, and the longer intermission of the session, was known as prorogation⁴: the houses were ordered by the king to meet from day to day until business was finished, and the rule of adjourning at midday originated probably as much in the necessity of dining as in the wish to claim a privilege⁵. The countermanding power is proved

¹ Rot. Parl. v. 487.

² Queen Anne was the last sovereign who attended debates in the house of lords; May, Treatise on Parliament, p. 449.

³ See above, vol. ii. pp. 643-645.

⁴ The word 'prorogation' is constantly used for countermanding or delaying the day of meeting; see Parl. Writs, i. 33, 120, &c. A parliament is 'revoked' altogether in 1331; Lords' Report, iv. 402.

⁵ Under Henry VIII, when the house of lords adjourned, owing to the by numerous instances: in some cases the king was prevented from attendance at the time fixed, and warned the estates not to assemble; in others they met to be prorogued, as in the case of the parliament of 1454¹, and in several formal sessions of the reign of Edward IV, the political importance of which has been noticed already. The circumstances under which the right was exercised differ widely from those under which in later times the right of prorogation has been regarded as important. It was then, as now, somewhat difficult to keep the members together until business was in a fair way of being finished; but the long-continued practice of holding one or more than one new parliament every year was in strong contrast with modern usage. A parliament of Richard II threatens to dissolve itself², but no medieval parliament threatens to sit in permanence. The houses, unlike the clerical convocations, which very unwillingly allowed any interference with their times and places of session, showed an unbounded respect for the king's order in this matter: and the kings showed similar respect for the estates. The long prorogations, when they become usual, are, like the early annual or terminal sessions, defined by the season of harvest and the church festivals.

446. When the business of the session was finished, the king's questions answered, the petitions heard and decided, the laws ingrossed for final acceptance, and, above all, the money grants agreed upon, all parties were ready and anxious to go home. The session, which, it is scarcely necessary to repeat, was in early times the whole action of the particular parliament, was solemnly closed. Sometimes, as in 1305, the parliament was dissolved by proclamation, sometimes the king in person appeared to take and give leave to depart³. The roll

Adjournment and prorogation.

Ceremony of dissolving
parliament.

absence of the prelates in convocation, the adjournment was ordered by royal authority. The growth of the claim of the houses to adjourn themselves may be traced in Hatsell's Precedents, ii. 311 sq. In 1621 Sir E. Coke says 'the commission [of adjournment] must be only declaratory of the king's pleasure but the court must adjourn itself;' ib. p. 311. On the modern law, see May, Treatise on Parliament, p. 50.

¹ See Rot. Parl. v. 238, 497-500, &c. ² See above, vol. ii. p. 494.

³ See the proclamation of dissolution by Edward I in 1305; Parl. Writs, i. 155; Rot. Parl. i. 159.

of 1365 furnishes a fair instance of the early usage; 'the 17th of February the king, lords and commons being assembled in the white chamber, and the ordinance against those who impugn the rights of the king and his crown being read first, and then the petitions of the commons and their answers, and the grant made to the king of the subsidy of wool, leather, and woollens being recited to the said lords and commons by the chancellor, the king thanked the said lords and commons heartily for their good counsel and advice, and the great travail they had had, and also for the aid which they had made and granted him in this parliament, and gave leave to the said lords and commons to depart each where he pleased; and so ended the parliament¹.' Richard II, in 1386, took the opportunity of making a protest on behalf of his prerogative by word of mouth². Henry IV, in 1402, invited both houses to dine with him on the Sunday after the dissolution; but, though the king several times spoke in the parliament chamber, the invitation was conveyed by the earl of Northumberland³. The Lancastrian kings more than once took leave of the estates in person and with a speech, and Edward IV took particular pains to address the commons at least in his first parliament⁴. It was not always that matters ended so pleasantly; more than once a committee had to be named to dispatch petitions that had not been fully considered, or to make sure that the common petitions were not altered before they became laws. In 1332 and 1333 the lords were ordered to stay when the commons had leave to go⁵. In 1362 some of the commons were directed to stay for certain business on which the king wished to speak; in 1372 the citizens and burgesses were kept behind and prevailed on to grant tunnage and poundage⁶. In 1376 the king was ill at Eltham, and the three estates went down to take leave of him and to hear his answers to the petitions;

Members kept behind.

¹ Rot. Parl. ii. 288.

² Ibid. iii. 224.

³ Ibid. iii. 493. In 1368 Edward III entertained the lords and many of the commons on a like occasion; ib. ii. 297. In 1376, at the close of the Good Parliament, Sir Peter de la Mare gave a great banquet, the King supplying wine and venison; Chr. Angl. p. lxxii.

⁴ Rot. Parl. v. 486.

⁵ Ibid. ii. 65, 69.

⁶ Ibid. ii. 275, 310.

in 1377 they went in the same way to Sheen to receive the answers, which were read on the following day in the parliament chamber, and then sat for some days longer¹. The dissolution was sometimes made an occasion for an oration by the speaker; Sir Arnold Savage furnishes the most conspicuous example, but the announcement of the grant on the last day of the session was a tempting opportunity for compliments on both sides.

The parliament was held to be dissolved by the death or deposition of the king in whose name it was called, but this rule was not observed in the case of Edward II, and was evaded in that of Richard II. The parliament of 1413 was held to be dissolved by the death of Henry IV; and this is a solitary example².

Dissolution on the king's death.

447. One of the last matters transacted was the issue of the writs to the sheriffs and borough magistrates for the payment of the wages of the representatives in the house of commons. The knights of the shire received each four shillings a day, and the citizens and burgesses each two. This rate of payment was fixed by usage, or possibly by ordinance, in the seventh year of Edward II; and was observed from the beginning of the next reign, the rates of the preceding and intervening years having occasionally varied. These wages were collected by the sheriffs from the 'communities' of the counties and towns represented, and were a frequent matter of petition, in which almost every conceivable plea was alleged in order to escape the obligation³.

Wages of the members of the house of commons.

¹ Rot. Parl. ii. 330, 364.

² 'Tan qe mesme le parlement par la mort du dit tres noble roy et pier qe Dieu assoille, fuist dissolve;' Rot. Parl. iv. 9.

³ See Pryne, Fourth Register, pp. 1-608. Parl. Writs, II. i. 115; cf. pp. 148, 210, &c. Riess, Wahlrecht, pp. 97 sq. The sheriff of Cambridge in 1307 is forbidden to distrain the villeins of John de la Mare for expenses, inasmuch as he attended in person; Parl. Writs, I. 191: so also in Norfolk the villeins of the bi-hop are free; Parl. Writs, II. i. 259. In 1327 Edward III orders the sheriff of Middlesex to levy the expenses within liberties as well as without, the men of the liberties of Westminster and Wallingford having refused to pay; ib. II. i. 366. On the collection of wages in Gloucestershire from both the liberties and the geldable, see Parl. Writs, I. 95. The sheriff of Kent returns in 1313 that at three county courts the men refused to pay, on the ground that they held in gavelkind; Parl. Writs, II.

Disputes
about the payment of wages.

It is on the arguments so put forward that some of the erroneous views were formed, which we have seen early obscuring the simplicity of the idea of parliamentary representation. The king's advisers almost invariably decide that the existing custom in the particular county shall be followed. Under Henry VIII the wages of the newly added members were secured by legislation; but until then they were levied under the royal writ, the towns represented being of course at liberty to increase the rate if they pleased. The representatives of London, for instance, in 1296 received ten shillings a day by a vote of the magistrates¹, and the members for York in 1483 were promised eight additional days' wages on the occasion of the coronation of Edward V. The sums were paid with due consideration for the time spent on the way, 'in eundo, morando, et redeundo;' this made the burden heavier in the case of the northern counties, and may account in some small measure for their disinclination to send members. In 1421 the people of Ely bought for £200, paid to the county of Cambridge, immunity from this payment which they had previously claimed as tenants of a great franchise: the same county possessed in the reign of Henry VIII a manor, called the shire manor, charged with a payment of £10 a year to the expenses of the knights' wages, the men of Cambridgeshire being thus relieved from direct payments. The townsmen of Cambridge passed an ordinance, in 1427, that the wages of their burgesses should be only a shilling a day, and made an agreement with their members to accept half the usual sum². Many curious particulars have been collected upon this point,

i. 91. In 1312 the member for Wilts brings an action against the sheriff to recover the difference between 4s. and 16d., at which sum he had sent in his account to the sheriff, ignorant of the more liberal tariff; Parl. Writs, II. i. 195.

¹ The parliament of 1296 was at S. Edmund's; Parl. Writs, I. 149: in 1298 the sum fixed is 100s. each, ib. p. 72, the parliament being at York. In 1322 the rate is 3s. for knights, 20d. for burghers; Parl. Writs, II. i. 258. In 1325, 3s. for valetti. At Lynn in 1431 the members received 6s. 8d. a day; Archæol. xxiv. 320: in 1442 it was voted that they should have 2s. a day each and no more; ib. p. 322. On the immunity of tenants in ancient demesne, see Prynne, Reg. ii. 176.

² Cooper, Annals of Cambridge, i. 178, 186.

which has an archaeological as well as a constitutional interest. The refusal of the king, in all cases, to interfere with custom, shows how ancient a right the payment was, and how hazardous a thing to meddle with it. The practice of course vanished as a seat in parliament became an object of more selfish ambition or greater political aspirations.

The king rules in favour of local custom.

448. Although the two houses of parliament had, at least since the accession of the house of Lancaster, been fully recognised as co-ordinate, equal, and mutually independent assemblies, they each retained peculiarities of usage and exclusive rights in special provinces of work to which the names of prerogative or privilege might be given if those names were not otherwise appropriated. At the close of the middle ages the commons were advisers and assentors, not merely petitioners, in matters of legislation, and in matters of political consideration their voice was as powerful as that of the lords; they were no longer, if they had ever been, delegates, but senators acting on behalf of the whole nation¹. In the other two branches of national business there were distinctions which ran back to the early differences of origin. The lords were the judges of parliament, the commons were the originators of grants; and, although the commons were yet a long way from that point at which they were to exclude the lords from all interference with money bills, they had, both in the forms of their grants and in the royal promise to receive information of the grants from the mouth of the speaker alone, won the ground on which their later claim was based. The judicial position of the lords was scarcely better secured, if it were seriously maintained, as it was in the bill of 1414 for the reversal of the judgment against the earl of Salisbury, that Special rights and privileges of the two houses and their members.

Financial right of the commons.

Judicial right of the lords.

¹ Coke, 4th Inst. p. 14: 'It is to be observed, though one be chosen for one particular county or borough, yet when he is returned and sits in parliament, he serveth for the whole realm, for the end of his coming thither, as in the writ of his election appeareth, is general ad faciendum et consentiendum hiis quae tunc et ibidem de communi consilio dicti regni nostri, favente Deo, ordinari contigerint super negotiis praedictis; id est, pro quibusdam arduis et urgentibus negotiis nos, statum et defensionem regni nostri Angliae et ecclesiae Anglicanae concernentibus, which are rehearsed before in the writ.' See also Hatsell, Precedents, ii. 76.

judgment by the lords with assent of the king is not lawful, but that it should be given by the king as sovereign judge, 'and by the lords spiritual and temporal with the assent of the commons in parliament, and not by the lords temporal only'.¹ But however this may have been, judicial work was apportioned to the lords, and financial work was ultimately secured to the commons. The difference of usage in the two houses, the difference in the powers of the speaker in each, the different rule of speaking, in the commons to the speaker, in the lords to the whole house, the different way of voting, and the other points in which the custom of the one varied from that of the other, have a history if we only knew it; through the general likeness of procedure minute traces of difference every now and then appear. In the wide and loose application of the word 'privilege,' the privileges or peculiar functions and usages of the house of lords are distinguished from those of the house of commons; the privileges of individual members of the house of lords may be distinguished from the privileges of individual members of the house of commons; both again have common privileges as members of the parliament; and the lords have special privileges as peers, distinct from those which they have as members of a house co-ordinate with the house of commons.

Variety of usages.

Different sorts of privilege.

1. Special functions of the two houses.

Of the first of these distinctions no more need be said here than has already been stated; the house of lords had judicial functions which the house of commons disavowed, although those functions could be exercised only during the session of parliament, that is whilst the commons were assembled; and the house of commons developed financial functions which they took care to keep to themselves, although their acts did not become law until they received the assent of the lords. The house of lords had, as the king's great council, an organisation over and above its character as a house of parliament, and a continuity and personal identity which it was impossible for a representative chamber to secure. But these points are scarcely points of privilege, and they have been sufficiently illustrated already. The house of commons had, at the close of the period, neither raised nor attempted to raise a claim to the right, which afterwards was so fondly cherished, of determining questions of dispute in elections of its own members: the corresponding jurisdiction in the case of the lords was, so far as it was a matter of law at all, within the limits of their existing powers¹.

¹ Rot. Parl. iv. r8.

449. Of the matters that fall under the second head the following are the most important. Every lord had, from the earliest times to a very recent date, when the privilege was voluntarily laid aside², the power of appointing a proxy to give his vote. This was done by royal licence, which was very seldom refused. The power of appointing a procurator or proxy was sometimes given and sometimes withheld by the terms of the writ³. Thus in the summons of the assembly in which the prince of Wales was knighted in 1306⁴, permission is given; in the writ for the parliament of March 1332 proxies are positively forbidden. The usage extended even to the permission for the proxy or power of attorney to be given to a person who was not himself a member of the house; in the parliament of Carlisle in 1307 Reginald de Grey, a baron, was represented by his attorney, Thomas of Wytnesham. Among the records of the reign of Edward II are numerous letters of proxy from bishops and barons to laymen and clerks, which on some occasions must have reduced the chamber of the lords to the position of a representative assembly⁵. In 1316, for

². Special rights of the lords.

The right of appointing a proxy.

¹ See the dispute between the earls of Warwick and Norfolk on precedence; Lords' Fifth Report, p. 198; Rot. Parl. iv. 267 sq.: and that between the earls of Devon and Arundel in 1449; Rot. Parl. v. 148. It was in the former case that the law was laid down that 'creatio ducum sive comitum aut aliarum dignitatum ad solum regem pertinet et non ad parlamentum;' and in the latter that the judges declared disputes respecting peerage belong for decision to the king and the lords.

² In 1868; May, Treatise on the Parliament, p. 370.

³ A list of the occasions on which the permission to appoint proxies is withheld is given by Elsynge, Method and Manner, &c. p. 117; see also Lords' Report, iv. 408.

⁴ Parl. Writs, i. 166; the forms of proxy then used are given in the same place.

⁵ Proxies for the parliament of York in 1322 are given in Parl. Writs, II. i. 248; cf. pp. 264 sq., 296-299.

Proxies of the lords.

instance, the proxies of both barons and prelates were accepted as a substitute for their personal attendance, and the practice became very common. Originally the permission may have been given merely to bind the absent person to the decisions of those who were present; or to excuse his absence. But it speedily acquired a much greater importance. The earl of Warenne, in 1322, appoints Sir Ralph Cobham and John Dynyeton, clerk, to speak and treat in his place in the parliament of York, and to assent to all that shall be agreed on by his peers for the honour of the king and the benefit of the people. And it was no doubt in such a sense that they were admitted or licenced by the kings¹. In 1347 the earl of Devon is released from the duty of attendance, and allowed to send a proxy to do all that he could have done if he had been present². The proxies of the absent lords were read on the day of the opening of parliament². The restriction of the exercise of this power, by limiting the choice of a proxy to members of the house, grew up later, and its history has not been minutely traced. It was however in full use in the sixteenth century.

Proxies not used in the house of commons.

The privilege of appointing a proxy does not seem to have ever belonged to the members of the house of commons, although, if we consider the frequency of such usage in the equally representative house of the clergy, the rule that a delegate cannot make a delegate would hardly exclude the possibility⁴. In the parliament of 1406 the speaker proposed to the king that, as Richard Cliderhow, one of the knights for Kent, had gone to sea as an admiral, his fellow knight, Robert

¹ Archbishop Reynolds in 1322 makes two bishops his proctors; Parl. Writs, II. i. 284.

² Lords' Report, iv. 562. See other examples, ib. p. 593; Prynne, Reg. i. 116-120, 214, &c. Madox, in the Formulare Anglicanum, gives two proxies (Nos. 625, 626), one of lord de la Warr, in 21 Hen. VIII, to lord Berkeley 'ad tractandum et communicandum, necnon ad consentiendum vice et nomine meis;' the other given by the abbot of Colchester to two abbots. The proxies of 1322 are 'ad tractandum, providendum et ordinandum.'

³ See the Roll for 1380, Rot. Parl. iii. 88; and the Lords' Journals for the reign of Henry VIII, vol. i. p. 4.

⁴ Instances of proctors appointed with a power of appointing a proxy will be found in Parl. Writs, i. 186.

Clifford, should be allowed to appear in parliament in their two names as if they were both present¹. To this the king agreed, but the example was not followed. There are a few instances, the most important perhaps being the case of the city of London², in which the counties or towns elected more than the due number of representatives, so that in case of sickness one might take another's place; a practice not unusual in the election of clerical proxies.

Supplementary members.

450. A second important right of the individual lords was that of recording a protest against acts of the house with which they did not agree; no such power has been exercised by the commons. In the upper house the early examples are those of the episcopal protests against the legislation on provisors and praemunire which are recorded in the rolls or even in the statute itself. These again seem to look back to the days when a baron declined to recognise legislation to which he had not personally consented³. The more general practice of protests by the lords dates from the seventeenth century. It is difficult to find anything in the powers of members of the lower house which can be set against these practices, of proxy and protest, and it is perhaps a mistake to call them privileges at all.

Right of the lords to record a protest.

451. The third head comprises some very important points; for upon the possession of the common privileges of the houses and their individual members hangs their real independence and the national liberty. Both houses possess the right of debating freely and without interference from the king or from each other. This is secured to the house of commons and to the members collectively by the king's promise to the speaker: and he would have been a bold king indeed who had attempted to stop discussion in the house of lords. Invaluable as the privilege is, it is not susceptible of much historical illustration, and it must suffice to recur to the parliamentary history of

3. Privileges common to the two houses.

Privilege of debate.

¹ Rot. Parl. iii. 572.

² See above, p. 467, note. A few such instances may be detected in the Returns; some of them perhaps cases of double returns. In 1295 Bedfordshire returns three knights, and Hampshire four; Exeter three citizens. But perhaps these and other cases may be otherwise explained.

³ See above, vol. ii. p. 255.

the reigns of Richard II and Henry IV. The punishment of Haxey was annulled as a violation of the liberties of the commons¹: Sir Arnold Savage prayed, but in no very humble tones, that Henry IV would not listen to representations of what the commons were doing; and the king promised to credit no such reports². A few years later, in his undertaking to hear the money grants from the speaker only, he declared that both lords and commons were free to debate on the condition of the kingdom and the proposed remedies³. But the very nature of an English parliament repelled any arbitrary limitation of discussion, and the obsequious apology of the commons for allowing Haxey's bill to pass may be said to stand alone in our early annals. The debates were certainly respectful to the kings; of their freedom we can judge by results rather than by details. The commons could speak strongly enough about misgovernment and want of faith; and the strongest kings had to bear with the strongest reproofs. Interference with this freedom of debate could only be attempted by a dispersion of parliament itself, or by compulsion exercised on individual members. Of a violent dissolution we have no example; the country was secured against it by the mode of granting supplies. The compulsion of individual members comes under the second sub-division of this head. Of interference of one house with the debates of the other we have no medieval instances.

Freedom of discussion.

Never infringed by a hasty dissolution.

Security against infringement by compulsion used to particular members.

That individual members should not be called to account for their behaviour in parliament, or for words there spoken, by any authority external to the house in which the offence was given, seems to be the essential safeguard of freedom of debate. It was the boon guaranteed by the king to the speaker when he accepted him, under the general term, privilege; and has since the reign of Henry VIII been explicitly demanded on the occasion¹. The power of the crown to silence or punish a hostile or too independent member, however opposed that power may be to the spirit of the constitution, is better illustrated in medieval precedent than the power of the parliament to resist the breach of privilege. Three prominent instances stand out at three important epochs, in which the speaker himself, or the person who fulfilled the duties that afterwards devolved on the speaker, was made the scapegoat of the house of commons. In 1301, after the parliament of Lincoln, at which he had been outrageously worried by the opposition of the estates, Edward I sent to the tower Henry Keighley, the knight who had presented to him the bill of articles drawn up in the name of the whole community². We learn from his own letter on the subject that the measure was dictated by policy rather than by vindictive feeling; the prisoner was to be kindly treated and made to believe that mercy was shown him at the instance of the minister whom he had attacked. There is no record of any action taken either in or out of parliament for his release, but he is soon after found in public employment as a commissioner of array and justice of assize. The second case is that of Peter de la Mare, the prolocutor of the Good Parliament of 1376, who was thrown into prison by John of Gaunt for his conduct in that assembly³. The arrest, although prompted by a faction, must have been executed in the form of law. The vindication of Peter de la Mare was undertaken, not by the parliament, which was indeed defunct, but by the citizens of London, who rose in tumult and demanded for him a fair trial; in the succeeding parliament, which was elected under the influence of John of Gaunt, a minority of the knights made an attempt to obtain his release and a legal trial. He remained in prison until the death of Edward III, was released by Richard II, and almost immediately elected speaker in the first parliament of that king. The third case is that of Thomas

¹ 'De volonte du dit roy le dit Thomas estoit adjugez traitour, et forfaita toutz q'il avoit, encontre droit et la curse quel avoit este devant en parlement;' Rot. Parl. iii. 430: it was also 'en anientisement des costumes de lez communes;' ib. p. 434: and the petition requires his restoration 'si bien en accomplissement de droit come pur salvation des libertez de lez ditz communes.' The reference to the commons is not repeated in the act of rehabilitation; p. 430.

² See above, p. 30.

³ See above, p. 63.

Instances of arrest of the speaker.

Henry Keighley.

Peter de la Mare.

¹ See above, pp. 471, 472.

² See vol. ii. p. 157, and above, p. 470.

³ See vol. ii. pp. 456, 462.

Arrest of Thorpe the speaker.

Thorpe, the speaker of the parliament of 1453; who in consequence of his opposition to the duke of York was prosecuted on a private pretext, cast for damages on the verdict of a jury, and sent to the Fleet during a prorogation of parliament. The imprisonment of Thorpe, like that of Peter de la Mare, was the act of a faction, legally carried into execution, but primarily intended to silence a dangerous enemy. It differed from the former case as occurring during the actual existence of parliament and not after its close. Thorpe was a member, and speaker at the time of his imprisonment, and the privilege of members was directly touched in two points, freedom of speech and freedom from arrest. When the parliament met after prorogation the commons demanded their speaker; they sent to the king and the lords requesting that they might have and enjoy their ancient and accustomed privilege, and in accordance therewith that Thomas Thorpe and Walter Rayle, who were then in prison, might be set free for the dispatch of the business of parliament. The counsel of the duke appeared before the lords to oppose the application; he gave his account of the circumstances of the arrest, and urged moreover that the arrest had been made in vacation. The lords, not intending to 'impeach or hurt the liberties and privileges of the commons,' asked the opinion of the justices, who said 'that they ought not to answer to that question, for it hath not been used aforetime that the justices should in anywise determine the privilege of this high court of parliament; for it is so high and so mighty in its nature that it may make law, and that that is law it may make no law, and the determination and knowledge of that privilege belongeth to the lords of the parliament and not to the justices.' They proceeded however to state that there was no form of 'supersedeas' that could stop all processes against privileged members, but that the custom was, if a member were arrested for any less cause than treason, felony, breach of the peace, and sentence of parliament, he should make his attorney and be released to attend in parliament. The lords declined to suggest this course; they determined that Thorpe should remain in prison; and the commons were

Discussion of privilege.

The question shelved.

ordered in the king's name to elect a new speaker. The case was treated as a simple case of arrest, political reasons were kept out of sight, and the commons found that they had no remedy¹.

Besides these instances of arrest of the speaker, two other famous cases are found, in which a similar summary method was adopted for the punishment of other offenders: the case of Haxey in 1397 and that of Yonge in 1455. The former has been frequently adverted to already. He had brought into the house of commons a bill which reflected censure on the king and court; that bill had come to the king's knowledge; he demanded, and the commons with a humble apology gave up, the name of the proposer; how the bill got into the house we do not know, for Haxey was a clergyman, not a member of the house, and although, if he were a clerical proctor, he might have demanded the same privilege as a member, no such claim was raised for him. He was imprisoned, condemned, claimed by the archbishop as a clerk, and pardoned. In this case there is a direct interference of the king with freedom of debate in the commons apart from the question of right of freedom from arrest. The commons did not show, and probably did not see that they ought to have shown, an independent spirit on the occasion.

The case of Thomas Yonge or Young, the member for Bristol, who proposed in the parliament of 1451 that the duke of York should be declared heir to the crown, is not free from obscurities of its own². In the records of parliament it appears only in a petition presented by him to the commons in 1455, in which he reminds them of their right that all members 'ought to have their freedom to speak and say in the house of their assembly as to them is thought convenient or reasonable without any manner challenge, charge, or punishment therefore to be laid to them in anywise.' Notwithstanding his privilege he had, in consequence of untrue reports to the king, been imprisoned in the Tower, and endamaged to the amount of a particular offenders.

Arrest of

Haxey's case.

Case of Thomas Yonge.

¹ See above, pp. 169-171; Rot. Parl. v. 227, 240, 295, &c.; Hatsell's Precedents, i. 31-34.

² See above, pp. 163, 164, 179; Rot. Parl. v. 337.

thousand marks. He asks the commons to pray the king and lords to procure him compensation. The commons sent up the bill to the lords, and the king ordered that the lords of the council should provide a remedy. Here we have only the complainant's account of the matter; it is no doubt substantially true, but the exact grounds on which the arrest was made are not stated. Matter of privilege as it was, the prayer is for personal and private indemnity: the commons seem to have no remedy but petition, and no atonement is offered to their injured dignity. So the case stands in the last years of the Lancastrian rule.

Immunity of members from personal molestation and arrest.

452. These instances all really fall on common ground between two great points of privilege—freedom of speech and freedom from arrest. The latter is the guarantee of the former, but it has inevitably a much wider operation, is practically more defensible, and accordingly is technically more definite. What must be said about it here must be confined to the cases of the members of the house of commons: the peers had a similar immunity on other grounds. From the very earliest times the persons of those who were on their way to the king's court and council had a sort of sanctity such as is recognised in an ambassador. By the law of Ethelbert, 'if the king call his "leod" to him, and any one there do them evil,' the offender must make double satisfaction to the injured person and pay a fine to the king¹. Canute wills, in a law which must have had a still wider application, 'that every man be entitled to grith to the gemot and from the gemot except he be a notorious thief².' The laws ascribed to Edward the Confessor recognise a particular immunity for persons going to and from the synods³. After the institution of writs there was no occasion for such enactments to be repeated. All members going to or returning from parliament were under the prescriptive protection of the king who summoned them. So long as the parliaments were annual and short the protection secured

¹ Ethelbert, § 1; Select Charters, p. 61.

² Canute, § 83; cf. Edw. Conf., § 2; Select Charters, p. 74.

³ Ll. Edw. Conf. art. 2, cl. 8: this privilege is recognised whether the person in question has been summoned or goes on his own business.

by this rule was, however important, of no very wide or protracted extent. The early cases of the breach are therefore less important than the later: when a parliament subsisted for great part of a year, or was prorogued at short intervals and for formal sessions, the immunity became personally more valuable. The principle as just stated involves two issues: the protection of the member from illegal molestation and the protection of the member from illegal arrest. As to the first of these, the special privilege could be asserted only by making the injury done to the individual an injury done to the house of which he was a member, and so visiting the offender with additional punishment. On this point it is not necessary to enlarge; it has been since the reign of Henry IV a matter of law; and that law singularly in concordance with the law of Ethelbert. The Statute of 5 Henry IV, c. 6, lays down the rule in the special case of Richard Chedder, a member's servant, who was beaten and wounded by one John Savage: Savage is to surrender in the King's Bench, and in default to pay double damages besides fine and ransom to the king¹. By a general enactment, 11 Henry VI, c. 11, the same penalty, which is identical with that of Ethelbert, is inflicted in case of any affray or assault on any member of either house coming to parliament or council by the king's command². Several such cases of violence are reported³. The modern importance of this point lies, as a point of privilege, rather in the threat of violence than in the actual infliction.

Members secured from personal molestation.

Chedder's case.

Legislation on the point.

The other point, the protection of the members of parliament and their servants from arrest and distress, from being impleaded in civil suits, from being summoned by subpoena or to serve on juries, and their privilege in regard to commitments by legal tribunals, rests in each particular here enumerated on the supreme necessity of attending to the business of parliament, the king's highest court. The several particulars concern matters of legal detail with which we are not called on to Protection from legal arrest.

¹ Stat. 5 Hen. IV, c. 6; Statutes, ii. 144; Rot. Parl. iii. 542.

² Stat. 11 Hen. VI, c. 11; Statutes, ii. 286; Rot. Parl. iv. 453.

³ See, for instance, Swynerton's case, Rot. Parl. iii. 317; cf. Hatsell, Precedents, i. 16, 26, 73, &c.

Writs of supersedeas.

meddle. But some of the leading and most illustrative instances of the prescription are found in medieval records. Some of these have been noticed already in relation to freedom of speech and debate. In 1290 Edward I laid down the rule that it was not becoming for a member of the king's council to be distrained in time of parliament¹. In 1314 Edward II issued two general writs superseding during the session all writs of taking assizes, juries, and certificates touching any member of either house²; and in 1315 he marked the arrest of the prior of Malton on his way from parliament as an act done in contempt of the king, in prejudice of the crown, in damage of the prior and against the king's peace.

Security of members' servants.

The immunity was held to extend to the servants of members, and a petition of the commons in 1404 declares that the custom of the realm protects them as well as their masters from arrest and imprisonment, although they pray that such custom may be established by statute. The king's answer is, that there is sufficient remedy in such cases, which seems to amount to a refusal of the petition³.

Means of enforcing the right.

The recognition of the right, however ancient and full the admission may have been, was a very different thing from the power of enforcing it; and the house of commons seems to have had no means of doing this but by petition, or by obtaining a writ of supersedeas. Besides the case of Thorpe, already mentioned, the most prominent cases are those of William Lark in 1429⁴, and Walter Clerk, burgess for Chippenham, in 1460⁵.

Lark's case.

Lark was the servant of William Milrede, member for London, and had been arrested at the suit of Margery Janyns, committed to the Fleet prison by the court of King's Bench, and there detained for damages. The commons petitioned that, in consideration of the privilege of members securing them against arrest except for treason, felony, or breach of peace, Lark might be liberated during the session of parliament; and that ¹ See Hatsell, Precedents, i. 3; Coke, 4th Inst. p. 24; Prynne, Reg. iv. 820, &c.

² See Rot. Parl. i. 449, 450; Hatsell, Precedents, i. 6, 7.

³ Rot. Parl. iii. 541; Hatsell, Precedents, i. 13.

⁴ Rot. Parl. iv. 357.

⁵ Ibid. v. 374.

the custom claimed for the commons might be established by statute. The king rejected the last petition, but ordered the release of Lark, securing to Margery her rights after the close of the session¹. In the case of Clerk, who had been arrested for a fine to the king and damages to two private suitors, and afterwards imprisoned and outlawed, the commons petitioned that the chancellor might order his release by a writ to the warden of the Fleet, saving the rights of the parties after the dissolution. This the king granted². These however are only two out of a large number of like precedents. Another famous case occurred in 1477; that of John Atwyl, member for Exeter, against whom several writs of arrest had been obtained at the instance of a private litigant. The commons petitioned that writs of supersedeas should be issued in each case, saving the rights of the suitor after the close of the session. In this case it is observed that, although the commons claim a right to the suspension of the writ of execution, they do not insist on redress for the impleading of a member during the session as a breach of privilege³. The condition of affairs at the end of the reign of Edward IV is thus stated:—‘When a member or his servant has been imprisoned, the house of commons have never proceeded to deliver such person out of custody by virtue of their own authority; but, if the member has been in execution, have applied for an act of parliament to enable the chancellor to issue his writ for his release, or, if the party was confined only on mesne process, he has been delivered by his writ of privilege to which he was entitled at common law⁴.’ The privilege was in no case extended to imprisonment for treason, felony, or for security of the peace: it was loosely allowed to the servants in attendance on members, and it was claimed for a period of time preceding and following as well as during the session. The length of this period was variously stated, and has not been legally decided. The general belief or tradition has established the rule of forty days before and after each session.

Case of Walter Clerk.

Atwyl's case.

Statement of the point at the close of the period.

¹ Hatsell, Precedents, i. 17-22.

² Ibid. i. 34-36.

³ Rot. Parl. vi. 191; Hatsell, Precedents, i. 48-50.

⁴ Hatsell, Precedents, i. 53.

Privileges of the peers.

Immunities of peerage.

Minute and honorary privileges.

Right of access to the sovereign.

453. The special privileges of peers of the realm were sufficiently numerous, but only those need be noticed here which are connected or contrasted with those of the house of commons. The peers have immunity from arrest, not merely as members of the house, but as barons of the realm; their wives have the same privilege, and, under the statute of 1442, the right to be tried like their husbands by their peers. The duration of the immunity is not limited by the session of parliament, but the person of a peer is 'for ever sacred and inviolable.' Yet this protection is only against the processes of common law, and, notwithstanding the dignity of peerage, instances of imprisonment for political causes and on royal warrants are far more numerous in the case of peers than of members of the house of commons. This then is not a privilege of parliament, and has no relation to any immunity resting on the summons or writ of the king, although, as the peers are hereditary and perpetual counsellors, it has a corresponding validity. The right of killing venison in the royal forests, allowed by the Charter of the Forests, the right of obtaining heavier damages for slander than an ordinary subject¹, and all the rest of the invidious privileges which time has done its best to make obsolete, may be left out of sight. The only other important right of peerage is that of demanding access to the sovereign; a privilege which every peer has, which the ordinary subject has not, and which the member of the house of commons can demand only in the company of his fellow-members with the speaker at their head. There have been times when this right or the suspension of it were important political points: it was by estranging Edward II from the society of his barons that the Despensers brought about his downfall and their own²; and Richard II, in the same way, held himself aloof from the men who hated and despised him³. This was the right the refusal of which provoked Warwick to fight at S. Alban's and at Northampton⁴. But history in this, as in all the previous instances of privilege, has to dwell on the breach rather than on the observance.

¹ 2 Rich. II, c. 5.

³ See above, vol. ii. p. 497.

² See above, vol. ii. p. 364.

⁴ See above, pp. 176, 189.

In another chapter we shall have to attempt to trace the social as distinct from the legal and technical working of the influences here exemplified in matters of ceremony, form, and privilege; influences which have constantly tended to place the house of commons and its members on a footing of firm and equal solidity with the house of lords, to extinguish invidious and vexatious immunities, and to produce for all political and national purposes something like a self-forgetting and sympathetic harmony of action.

CHAPTER XXI.

SOCIAL AND POLITICAL INFLUENCES AT THE CLOSE OF THE MIDDLE AGES.

454. Plan of the chapter.—455. Variations of the political balance throughout English History.—456. THE KINGS :—popular regard for the Plantagenets.—457. Growth of loyalty.—458. Doctrine of legitimism.—459. Material and legal securities.—460. Extent of the royal estates.—461. Religious duty of obedience.—462. Fealty, homage, and allegiance.—463. Law of Treason.—464. THE CLERGY.—465. Weakness of their spiritual position.—466. Weakness of their temporal position.—467. THE BARONAGE :—their wealth and extent of property.—468. Their territorial distribution.—469. Class distinctions.—470. Livery and maintenance.—471. Heraldic distinctions.—472. Fortified houses and parks.—473. Great households.—474. Service by indenture.—475. Good and evil results of baronial leadership.—476. Baronial position of the bishops.—477. THE KNIGHTS AND SQUIRES.—478. Their relation to the barons.—479. Independent attitude of the knights in parliament.—480. THE YEOMANRY.—481. Expenditure of the squire and tenant farmer.—482. The valetti in parliament.—483. The yeomen electors.—484. THE BOROUGHs.—485. The merchant guild and its developments.—486. Constitution of London.—487. Importance and growth of Companies.—488. Other municipalities.—489. Politics in the boroughs, and of their representatives.—490. Political capabilities of country and town, merchant, tradesman, and artificer.—491. The life of the burgher.—492. Connexion with the country and with other classes.—493. Artisans and labourers.—494. The poor.—495. The villeins.—496. The chance of rising in the world. Education.—497. Class antagonisms.—498. Concluding reflexions. National character.—499. Transition.—500. Some lessons of history.

Factors of national history.

454. THE great changes which diversify the internal history of a nation are mainly due to the variations in the condition and relations of the several political factors which contribute to that history: their weight, their force and vitality, their mutual attraction and repulsion, their powers of expansion and contraction. The great ship of the state has its centre of gravity as well as its apparatus for steering and sailing, its machinery of defence, and its lading. And it is upon the working of these factors that every great crisis of national life must ultimately turn. Great men may forestall or delay such critical changes; the greatest men aspire to guide nations through them; sometimes great men seem to be created by or for such conjunctures; and, without a careful examination of the lives of such men, history cannot be written. But they do not create the conjunctures: and the history which searches no deeper is manifestly incomplete. In the reading of constitutional history this is a primary condition: we have to deal with principles and institutions first, and with men, great or small, mainly as working the institutions and exemplifying the development of the principles. As institutions and principles, however much they may in the abstract be amenable to critical analysis, can be traced in their operation and development only in the concrete, it is necessary to divide and rule out the design of historical writing by the epochs of reigns of kings and the lives of other great men. A perpetual straining after the abstract idea or law of change, the constant 'accentuation,' as it is called, of principles in historical writing, invariably marks a narrow view of truth, a want of mastery over details, and a bias towards foregone conclusions. In adopting the method which has been used, however imperfectly, in this work, of proceeding historically rather than philosophically, this has been kept in view. We have attempted to look at the national institutions as they grew, and to trace the less permanent and essential influences only so long as they have a bearing on that growth. The necessity of finding one string, by which to give a unity to the course of so varied an inquiry, has involved the further necessity of long narrative chapters and of much unavoidable repetition. The object of the present chapter will be to examine into the condition and relation of the factors which produced the critical changes indicated in the preceding narrative, in those points in which they come less prominently forward, and

The causes that produce the changes of national history.

Method of treatment adopted.

Object of the present chapter.

to take up, as we proceed, some of the most significant aspects of the social history which underlies the political history. The variation of the balance, maintained between the several agencies at work in the national growth, will be regarded as the point of sight in our sketch, but the main object of the chapter will be the examination of the factors themselves; the strength, weight and influence of royalty; the composition, personal and territorial, of the baronage and gentry; their political ideas and education; the growth of the middle class and its relation to those above and below it; and the condition of the lowest class of the nation. It is obvious that only a sketch can be attempted; it is possible that anything more ambitious than a sketch would contain more fallacies than facts.

Various combinations of the national factors in the middle ages.

455. Taking the king and the three estates as the factors of the national problem, it is probably true to say in general terms that, from the Conquest to the Great Charter, the crown, the clergy, and the commons, were banded together against the baronage; the legal and national instincts and interests against the feudal. From the date of Magna Carta to the revolution of 1399, the barons and the commons were banded in resistance to the aggressive policy of the crown, the action of the clergy being greatly perturbed by the attraction and repulsion of the papacy. From the accession of Henry IV to the accession of Henry VII, the baronage, the people, and the royal house, were divided each within itself, and that internal division was working a sort of political suicide which the Tudor reigns arrested, and by arresting it they made possible the restoration of the national balance. In such a very comprehensive summary of the drama, even the great works of Henry II and Edward I appear as secondary influences; although the defensive and constructive policy of the former laid the foundation both of the royal autocracy which his descendants strove to maintain, and of the national organisation which was strong enough to overpower it; and the like constructive and defensive policy of Edward I gave definite form and legal completeness to the national organisation itself. In the struggle of the fifteenth century the clergy, alone of the three estates, seem to retain the unity and cohesion which was proof against the disruptive influences of the dynastic quarrel; but their position, though apparently stronger, had a fatal source of weakness in their alliance with or dependence on a foreign influence; whilst the weakness of the crown and the people was owing to personal and transient causes, which a sovereign with a strong policy, and a people again united, would very soon reduce to insignificance. The crown was a lasting power, even when its wearers were incapable of governing; the nation was a perpetual corporation, in nowise essentially affected by personal or party changes; whereas in the baronage personal and constitutional existence were one and the same thing, and the blow that destroyed the one destroyed the other. Hence during the early days of the Tudor dictatorship, the baronage was powerless; and the clergy and commons, although like the crown they retained corporate vitality, were thrown out of working order by the absence of all political energy in the remains of the other estate. The commons, having lost the leaders who had misled them to their own destruction, threw themselves into other work, and, ceasing to take much interest in politics, grew richer and stronger for the troubled times to come. The clergy, without much temptation to aggression and with little chance of obtaining greater independence, seeing little in Rome to honour and nothing at home to provoke resistance, gradually sank into complete harmony with and dependence on the king. And this constituted the strength of the position of Henry VIII: he had no strong baronage to thwart him; he or his ministers had wisdom enough to understand the interests which were dearest to the commons; the church was obsequious to his friendship, defenceless against his hostility. With the support of his parliament, which trusted without loving him, and confirmed the acts by which he fettered them, he permanently changed the balance between church and state and between the crown and the estates. He overthrew the monastic system, depriving the church of at least a third of her resources and throwing out of parliament nearly two-thirds of the spiritual

The Tudor period,

Humiliation of the baronage.

Apathy of the commons.

Dependence
of the clergy.

Position of Henry VIII.

His treatment of the church;

of the nobility;

of the parliament.

His dictatorship.

baronage¹; he broke the connexion between the English and Roman churches, and, declaring himself her head on earth, left the English church² altogether dependent on her own weakened resources, and suspended and practically suppressed the legislative powers of convocation³. He constructed a new nobility out of the ruins of the old, and from new elements enriched by the spoils of the church: a nobility which had not the high traditions of the medieval baronage, and was by the very condition of its creation set in opposition to the ecclesiastical influences which had hitherto played so great a part. But with the commons Henry did not directly meddle: true he used his parliaments merely to register his sovereign acts; took money from his people as a loan, and wiped away the debt by parliamentary enactment⁴; took for his proclamations the force of laws, and obtained a 'lex regia' to make him the supreme lawgiver⁵; he arrested and tried and executed those whom he suspected of enmity, demanding and receiving the thanks of the commons for his most arbitrary acts. That by these means he carried the nation over a crisis in which it might have suffered worse evils, is a theory which men will accept or reject according as they are swayed by the feelings which were called into existence by the changes he effected.

¹ The smaller monasteries were dissolved by the Act 27 Hen. VIII, c. 28; after many of the larger houses had surrendered, the rest were dissolved by the Act 31 Hen. VIII, c. 13; and the Order of the Hospitallers, by 32 Hen. VIII, c. 24. Colleges, chantries, and free chapels were given to the king by 1 Edw. VI, c. 14.

² This was enacted by 26 Hen. VIII, c. 1: 'That the king our sovereign lord, his heirs and successors kings of this realm, shall be taken accepted and reputed the only supreme head on earth of the Church of England called Anglicana Ecclesia.' The exact terms had been discussed in Convocation as early as 1531, and accepted in a modified form.

³ By the Act of Submission (25 Hen. VIII, c. 19), and the instrument signed by the clergy, May 15, 1532, it was declared that there should be no legislation in Convocation without the king's licence, and that the existing canon law should be reviewed by a commission of thirty-two persons, half lay and half clerical.

⁴ Stat. 21 Hen. VIII, c. 24, and 35 Hen. VIII, c. 12.

⁵ Stat. 31 Hen. VIII, c. 8. 'That always the king for the time being with the advice of his honourable council may set forth at all times by the authority of this Act his proclamations . . . and that those same shall be obeyed observed and kept as though they were made by Act of Parliament for the time in them limited unless the king's highness dispense with them or any of them under his great seal.'

Elizabeth carried on the dictatorship which her father had won, and which the misgovernment of the intervening reigns had rendered even more necessary than before. In spite of mistakes and under many inevitable drawbacks, she earned her title to the supremacy she wielded, and, so long as she lived, the better side of a strong governmental policy showed itself. She acted as the guide of the nation which she saw strong enough to choose its own course; making herself the exponent of the country's ambition, she ruled the ship of state by steering it; she could not direct the winds or even trim the sails, but she could see and avoid the rocks ahead.

Position of Elizabeth.

The Tudor dictatorship left a sad inheritance to the Stewarts. James I was not content with the possession, without a theory, of supremacy. The power which Henry VIII had wielded he formulated; and challenged the convictions of a people growing more thoughtful as they grew also stronger. His dogmatic theories forced the counteracting theories into premature life: his ecclesiastical policy, the outcome of Elizabeth's, gave a political standing-ground to puritanism; and puritanism gave to the political warfare in which the nation was henceforth involved a relentless character that was all its own. He left his throne to a son who had not the power to guide if he had had the chance: whose theory of sovereign right was incompatible with the constitutional theory which, rising as it were from the dead, had found its exposition among the commons. The lords of the new baronage neither loved the clergy nor trusted the people. Divided between the king and liberty, they sank for the time into moral and legal insignificance; and, however singly or personally eminent, ceased for a time to be recognised as an estate of the republic. The clergy, committed to the fatal theory that was destroying the king, had already fallen. The king himself, too conscientious to be politic, scarcely strong enough to be faithfully conscientious; neither trusting nor having cause to trust his people, who neither trusted nor had cause to trust him, fell before the hostility of men for whose safety it was necessary that he should die, and the hatred of fanatics who combined person

James I and his theory of royal power.

Charles I unfit to determine the great crisis.

Position of Oliver Cromwell.

and office in one comprehensive curse,—a sacrifice to the policy and principles of his enemies, the victim and the martyr to his own. The place which Cromwell took, when he had wrested the government from the incapable hands that were trying to hold it, was one which he, with his many great gifts and his singular adaptation to the wants of the time, might have filled well, if any man could. But the whole national mechanism was now disjoined, and he did not live long enough to put it together in accordance either with its old conformation or with a new one which he might have devised. So the era of the Commonwealth passed over, a revolution proved to be premature by the force of the reaction which followed it, by the strength of the elements which it suppressed without extinguishing them, and by the fact, which later history proved, that it involved changes far too great to be permanent in an ancient full-grown people.

The Restoration.

If the absolutism of the Tudors must in a measure answer for the sins of the Stewarts, and the sins of the Stewarts for the miseries of the Rebellion, the republican government must in like measure be held responsible for the excesses of the Restoration. Both the Rebellion and the Restoration were great educational experiments. The arrogance of puritanism had been almost as fatal to the political unity of the commons, as the doctrine of divine right had been to the king and the church. The Restoration saw the strange alliance of a church, purified by suffering, with the desperate wilfulness of a court that had lost in exile all true principle, all true conception of royalty. Stranger still, the nation acquiesced for many years in the support of a government which seemed to reign without a policy, without a principle, and without a parliament. But most strange of all, out of the weakness and foulness and darkness of the time, the nation, church, peers and people, emerge with a strong hold on better things; prepared to set out again on a career which has never, since the Revolution of 1688, been materially impeded. But this is far beyond the goal which we have set ourselves, and would lead on, through questions the true bearings of which are even now

The Revolution.

being for the first time adequately explored, into a history which has yet to be written.

456. Keeping this general outline well in view, but not guiding our investigation by special regard to it, we may now approach the main subject of the chapter, and come down to details which, however mutually unconnected, have a distinct value, as they help to supply colour and substance to the shadowy impersonations of the great drama.

Few dynasties in the whole history of the world, not even the Caesars or the Antonines, stand out with more distinct personal character than the Plantagenets. Without having the rough, half-Titan, half-savage, majesty of the Norman kings, they are, with few exceptions, the strong and splendid central figures of the whole national life. Each has his well-marked individual characteristics. No two are closely alike, each has qualities which, if not great in themselves, are magnified and made important by the strength of the will which gives them expression. There is not a coward amongst them; even the one man of the race who is a careless and incapable king, has the strong will of his race, and a latent capacity for exertion which might have saved him. All of them, or nearly all, lived before the eyes of their subjects; some were oppressively ubiquitous: the later kings from Edward I onwards could speak the language of their people, and all of them doubtless understood it. Whatever there was in any one of them that could attract the love of the people was freely shown to the people: their children were brought up with the sons and daughters of the nobles, were at an early age introduced into public life, endowed with estates and establishments of their own, and allowed, perhaps too freely, to make their own way to the national heart. It can, indeed, scarcely be said that any of the Plantagenet kings after his elevation to the throne enjoyed a perfect popularity. Henry II was never beloved; the Londoners adorned their streets with garlands when Richard came home, but a very slight experience of his personal government must have sufficed them; John hated and was hated of all; Henry III no man cared for; Edward I was honoured Strong character of the Plantagenet kings.

Public life of the kings.

Personal popularity of the kings.

rather than loved; Edward II, alone among the race, was despised as well as hated. With Edward III the tide turned; he came to the crown young, and gained sympathy in his early troubles; he took pains to court the nation, and in his best years he was a favourite; but, after the war and the plague, he fell into the background, and the nation was tired of him before he died. Richard possessed early, and early forfeited, the people's love; he deserved it perhaps as little as he deserved their later hatred. Henry IV, as a subject, had been the national champion, and he began to reign with some hold on the people's heart; but the misery of broken health, an uneasy conscience, and many public troubles, threw him early into a gloomy shadowy life of which his people knew little. Henry V was, as he deserved to be, the darling of the nation; Henry VI was too young at his accession to call forth any personal interest, and during his whole reign he failed to acquire any hold on the nation at large; they were tired of him before they came to know him, and when they knew him they knew his unfitness to rule. Edward IV, like Henry IV, came a favourite to the throne; but unlike Henry, without deserving love, he retained popularity all his life. Richard III had, as duke of Gloucester, been loved and honoured; he forfeited love, honour and trust, when he supplanted his nephew, and he perished before his ability and patriotism, if he had any, could recover the ground that he had lost.

Growth of a sentiment of loyalty.

457. Notwithstanding this series of failures, we can trace a growing feeling of attachment to the king as king, which may be supposed to form an essential characteristic of the virtue of loyalty. Loyalty is a virtuous habit or sentiment of a very composite character; a habit of strong and faithful attachment to a person, not so much by reason of his personal character as of his official position. There is a love which the good son feels for the most brutal or indifferent father; national loyalty has an analogous feeling for a bad or indifferent king; it is not the same feeling, but somewhat parallel. Such loyalty gives far more than it receives; the root of the good is in the loyal people, not in the sovereign, who may or may not deserve it; there is a feeling too of proprietorship: 'he is no great hero but he is our king.' Some historical training must Its causes. have prepared a nation to conceive such an idea. The name of king cannot have been synonymous with oppression; loyalty itself, in its very name, recalls the notion of trust in law, and observance of law; and the race which calls it forth, as well as the nation that feels it, must have been on the whole a law-abiding race and nation. It gathers into itself all that is admirable and loveable in the character of the ruler, and the virtues of the good king unquestionably contribute to strengthen the habit of loyalty to all kings. Once aroused, it is strongly attracted by misfortune; hence kings have often learned the blessings of it too late. Richard II after his death became 'God's true knight' whom the wicked ones slew¹, and Henry VI became a saint in the eyes of the men whom he had signally failed to govern². Yet the growth of loyalty in this period Slowness of its growth. was slow if it was steady. The Plantagenet history can show no such instances of enthusiastic devotion as lighted up the dark days of the Stewarts. Edmund of Kent sacrificed himself for Edward II; and the friends of Richard II perished in a vain attempt to restore him; Margaret of Anjou found a way to rouse in favour of Henry and her son a desperate resistance to the supplanting dynasty; but none of these is an instance of true loyalty unmingled with fear or personal aims. The growth Enunciation of the principle. of the doctrine that expresses the real feeling is traceable rather in such utterances as that of the chancellor in 1410, when he quotes from the pseudo-Aristotle the saying, that the true safety of the realm is to have the entire and cordial love of the people, and to guard for them their laws and rights³.

Thus the growth of loyalty was slow; the feudal feeling intercepted a good deal of it; the medieval church scarcely recognised it as a virtue apart from the more general virtues of fidelity and honour, and, by the ease with which it acquiesced in a change of ruler, exemplified another sort of loyalty of which the king de facto claimed a greater share than the king

¹ Political Songs, ii. 267.² See above, p. 134.³ See above, p. 246.How far encouraged by lawyers and clergy.

de jure. Notwithstanding the sacred character impressed on him by unction at his coronation, notwithstanding oaths taken to him, and perfect legitimacy of title, he is easily set aside when the stronger man comes. Richard II believed in the virtue of his unction as later kings have believed in the divine right of legitimacy; and, when he surrendered his crown, refused to renounce the indelible characters impressed by the initiatory rite¹.

Doctrine of legitimacy and of the sacredness of hereditary right.

458. If the clergy were disinclined to sacrifice themselves, with archbishop Scrope, for a posthumous sentiment, the lawyers had little scruple in setting up or putting down a legitimate claimant. Yet the idea of legitimacy, the indefeasible right of the lawful heir, was also growing. Edward III in his claim on France; archbishop Sudbury in his declaration that Richard II succeeded by inheritance and not by election²; the false pedigree by which the seniority of the house of Lancaster was asserted on behalf of Henry IV³; the bold assumption of indefeasible right put forth by duke Richard of York⁴; the outrageous special pleading of Richard III⁵; the formal claim of a just title by inheritance which Henry VII made in his first speech to the commons, not less than the astute policy by which he avoided risking his parliamentary title and acknowledging his debt to his wife⁶—all these testify to the growing belief in a doctrine which was one day to become a part of the creed of loyalty, but was as yet an article of belief rarely heard of save when it was to be set aside.

Personal qualities of the king,

459. Apart from the hold on the people which this growing sentiment gave the king independently of his personal qualifications, rank those individual qualities which, as we have said, the Plantagenet kings, by their public lives, set before the nation: their strength, eloquence, prowess, policy and success.

¹ See above, p. 14.

² See above, vol. ii. p. 464.

³ See above, p. 12.

⁴ See above, p. 190.

⁵ See above, p. 230.

⁶ 'Subsequenterque idem dominus rex, praefatis communibus ore suo proprio eloquens, ostendendo suum adventum ad jus et coronam Angliae fore tam per justum titulum hereditanciae quam per verum Dei judicium in tribuendo sibi victoriam de suo inimico in campo,' &c.; Rot. Parl. vi. 268: compare the politic silence of the Act of Settlement, Stat. i Hen. VII, c. i.

Combined with these were the local influence exercised by the king in his royal or personal demesne, and the legal and moral safeguards sought in the securities of fealty, homage, and allegiance, and in the still more direct operation of the laws of treason.

and his other sources of influence.

460. The first of these, the extensive influence exercised by the king as a great landowner, scarcely comes into prominence before the reign of Richard II; for during the preceding reigns the royal demesnes had been so long removed from the immediate influence of the king that they had become, as they became again later, a mere department of official administration. John, who had, before his accession, possessed a large number of detached estates, continued when he became king to draw both revenue and men from them, although by his divorce he lost the hold which he had once had on the great demesnes of the Gloucester earldom. Henry III had given to his eldest son lands in Wales and Cheshire as well as a considerable allowance in money; but Edward I had had no time to cultivate personal popularity in those provinces; and his son, who before his accession had possessed in the principality itself a settled estate of his own, sought in vain, during his troubles, a refuge in Wales. The earldom of Chester, however, which had been settled by Edward I as a provision for the successive heirs apparent, furnished, after it had been for nearly a century in their hands, a population whose loyalty was undoubted. Richard II trusted to the men of Cheshire as his last and most faithful friends; he erected the county into a principality for himself; and the notion of marrying him to 'Perkin's daughter o'Legh,' the daughter of Sir Peter Legh of Lyme¹, was scarcely needed to bring them to his side in his worst days. It was with Cheshire men that he packed and watched the parliament of 1397². Still more did the possession of the Lancaster heritage contribute to the strength of Henry IV. Although the revenue was not so great as might have been imagined, the hereditary support which was given to him, his sons and grandson, was

Importance of the king as a landowner.

The earldom of Chester.

The duchy of Lancaster.

¹ Chr. Kenilworth, ap. Williams, Chronique de la Trahison, p. 293.

² Ann. Ric. p. 208.

no unimportant element of strength to them. The earldoms of Leicester, Lancaster, Lincoln and Derby, conveyed not merely the demesnes but the local influence which Simon de Montfort, Edmund and Thomas of Lancaster, the Lacies and the Ferrers, had once wielded; and, by his marriage with the co-heiress of Bohun, Henry secured during the whole of his life the supreme influence in the earldoms of Hereford, Essex and Northampton. Part of that influence was lost when Henry V divided the Bohun estates with the countess of Stafford, his cousin¹; but in the duchy of Lancaster, as it was finally consolidated, he and his son had a faithful and loyal, if somewhat lawless, body of adherents. It was by the Lancashire and Yorkshire men that Beaufort set duke Humfrey at defiance²; and by their aid Margaret of Anjou was able to prolong the contest with Edward IV. It was in the halls of Lancashire gentlemen that Henry VI wandered in his helplessness; and in the minster of York that prayers were offered before his image. The estates of the duchy gave the house of Lancaster a hold on almost every shire in England³; the palatine jurisdiction of the county of Lancaster, the great honours of Knaresborough, Pomfret, Tickhill, and Pickering in Yorkshire, of Derby, Leicester and Lincoln, the castles and dependencies of Kenilworth, Hertford, Newcastle-under-Lyne, Hinckley, the Peak, and Monmouth, all of them names resonant with ancient fame, were but a portion of the great historical demesne which Edward IV took care to annex, inseparably but distinctly 'amortized,' to the estates of the crown as the personal demesne of the sovereign⁴. The house of Lancaster inherited not only the estates and the principles of the great party of reform, but the personal connexions by marriage and blood with the baronage, of which so much has been said already, and which, if they increased its strength for a time, had the fatal result of dragging down the whole

A source of strength to the crown.

¹ Rot. Parl. iv. 135 sq.

² See above, p. 104.

³ Some notion of the enormous influence exercised by the house of Lancaster may be derived from an examination of the charters of the duchy, a kalendar of which has been published by the deputy keeper of the Public Records in the 31st and 35th Reports.

⁴ See above, p. 251.

accumulation of family alliances in the fall of the royal house.

461. The elements of strength which the kings both before and after Henry IV derived from the more direct influences of personal activity and private wealth were effectual means of bringing home to the subject the better side of the theory of royalty; but they had little connexion with the theory itself. The king who was seen hurrying to and fro at the head of his levies, or who once or twice in the year visited his demesne manors, hunted in his private forests, and brought the mischiefs of purveyance to every man's door, was indeed the king who was God's minister, and wielded the temporal sword for the punishment of evildoers, the king who could do no wrong, against whom no prescription held good, and who never died; but a link was unquestionably wanting to attach the abstract idea to its concrete impersonation. That link was supplied in early times by the clergy, and in later times by the lawyers. The clergy had insisted on the religious duty of obedience, the lawyers elaborated the system of allegiance, fealty, homage, and the penalties of treason. True, the early clergy were supplying the place of lawyers, and the early lawyers were clergymen, but the weapons which they employed were in the first instance drawn from the Scriptures and applied to the conscience; in the latter they were drawn from natural or civil law and applied to the sense of honour and self-preservation. From the time of the Conquest, and still more from that of Henry I, the two lines of influence diverged: the temporal sword came too often into collision with the spiritual—the divine vicegerent at Westminster with the divine vicegerent at Rome; the clergy remembered that there were kings like Saul and Herod, and it was less easy than it had been to determine what things were to be given to Caesar. Hence even the best of the medieval kings were treated by the higher schools of the clergy with some reserve: to Peckham or Winchelsey Edward I was, in spite of his piety and virtue, no ideal king; and, when the unswervingly faithful house of Lancaster came to the throne, they found it fenced about with the statutes of præmunire and

Theory and reality of kingship.

Religious and legal sanctions.

provisors which were irreconcilably offensive to the papacy and its supporters. The lawyers had long taken up the burden of a theory which claimed to be equally of divine right; and they had fenced it about with the doctrines of allegiance and of treason, with oaths of fealty and acts of homage. This history is not peculiar to England, but it comes into our national institutions somewhat late, and its details are somewhat clearer than they are in the case of the continental nations.

Fealty, homage, and allegiance.

462. The obligations of fealty, homage, and allegiance¹, although their result is nearly the same, are founded on three different principles. Fealty is the bond that ties any man to another to whom he undertakes to be faithful; the bond is created by the undertaking and embodied in the oath. Homage is the form that binds the vassal to the lord, whose man he becomes, and of whom he holds the land for which he performs the ceremony on his knees and with his hands in his lord's hands. Allegiance is the duty which each man of the nation owes to the head of the nation, whether the man be a landowner or landless, the vassal of a mesne lord or a lordless man; and allegiance is a legal duty to the king, the state, or the nation, whether it be embodied in an oath or not. But, although thus distinct in origin, the three obligations had come in the middle ages to have, as regards the king, one effect. The idea, the development of which has been traced in an early chapter of this work, of making land the sign and sacrament of all relations between ruler and subject, had from the Norman Conquest thoroughly pervaded the law of England. As all land was to be held of the king, all landowners were bound by mediate or immediate homage to him; and as the lord of the land was supreme judge, every man who was amenable to judgment owed fealty and allegiance to the king on that ground; his fealty was not due as an obligation which he

Combination of the three in the legal relation between the subject and the king.

¹ On the forms see Madox, Bar. Angl. pp. 270 sq.; Spelman's Glossary, s. vv. Fidelitas, Homagium, Ligantia; Select Charters, pp. 67, 82, 152, &c.; Statutes, i. 226, 227 ('Modus faciendi homagium et fidelitatem'); Digby, Real Property, pp. 62, 63; Bracton, fo. 77 b, 78; lib. ii. c. 35; Glanvill, lib. ix. c. 1; Littleton, Tenures, s. 85-94; Coke upon Littleton, 65 b, sq.; Assises de Jerusalem, i. 313.

had spontaneously incurred, but as the means of certifying his sense of the duty to bear allegiance. And thus, with respect to the king, fealty and allegiance were practically identical; and the act of homage to the king implied and was accompanied by the oath of fealty; the oath recognised that it was the same thing to be 'foial' and 'loial'; the king's 'fideles' and his 'ligii' were the same, and the closest of all relations with him was expressed by the term 'liege homage.'

The oath of allegiance, prescribed to every subject over the age of fourteen¹, was in substance the same as the oath of fealty taken at the time of doing homage, although of course variations of form were admissible²; for neither fealty nor homage was confined to the relations subsisting between king and subject, whilst allegiance was due to the king alone; every

Oaths of allegiance.

¹ 'Voloms nous qe trestouz ceux de xiiii aunz ou plus nous facent serment qe il nous serount feaus et leaus, et qe il ne serount felouns ne a felouns assentauntz;' Britton, lib. i. c. 13; the form is given more fully in c. 31: it is thus translated; 'Hear this, you N. bailiffs, that I, P. from this day forward will be faithful and loyal to our Lord E. King of England, and his heirs, and will bear unto them faith and loyalty of life and limb, of body and chattels, and of earthly honour, and will neither know nor hear of their hurt or damage, but I will oppose it to the best of my power, so help me God and the saints.' This is the oath taken on the admission to a tithing or frankpledge. The mention of the 'heirs' has been omitted from the oath since the revolution of 1688; Blackstone, Comm. i. 368.

² The oath of fealty taken after homage is given by Britton, lib. iii. c. 4. In case of fealty to the king it is this: 'Hear this ye good people, that I, such a one by name, faith will bear to our lord King Edward from this day forward, of life and limb, of body and chattels and of earthly honour; and the services which belong to him for the fees and tenements which I hold of him, will lawfully perform to him as they become due, to the best of my power, so help me God and the saints.' The oath of fealty to any other liege lord was this: 'Hear you this, my lord John, that I, Peter, from this day forward, will bear you faith of life and limb, saving my faith to the king and his heirs; and the services which belong to you for the fees and tenements I hold of you, lawfully will perform to you, as they become due, to the best of my power,' &c. To any lord not liege, the form was: 'Hear you this, my lord John, that I, Peter, will bear you faith from this day forward, and the services,' &c., &c., omitting mention of life and limb. See Britton, ed. Nichols, i. 48, 185; ii. 39, 41. Liege homage is that which is paid by the tenant to the lord 'a quo tenet suum capitale tenementum;' Glanv. ix. 1; 'contre totes riens qui vivre et morir puissent;' Ass. de Jer. i. 215, 313; the liege lord being 'dominus praeceptus et legitimus quia feoffator primus et propter primum feoffamentum et capitale;' Bracton, fo. 79 b; 'cui soli ratione domini sic tenetur ut contra ipsum nihil alii debeat, rege duntaxat excepto;' Dial. de Scacc. lib. ii. c. 4. See also Ll. Henr. I. cc. xxxii. § 2; xliii. § 6; lv. § 2; lxxxii. § 5.

lord could exact fealty from his servants and homage and fealty from his vassals; if he attempted to get more, he accroached royal power and was amenable to the charge of treason. The words of the oath of allegiance or fealty to the king, taken in the reign of Edward I, ran thus: 'I will be "foial" and "loial" and bear faith and allegiance to the king and his heirs, of life and limb and worldly honour, against all people who may live and die¹.' Other clauses followed in the case of lords who held lands, and in the case of the private individual the oath of the peace was combined with that of allegiance. The words of homage, which were not sworn, were: 'I become your man, from this day forth, for life, for limb, and for worldly honour, and shall bear you faith for the lands that I hold of you².' In liege homage, such as that done by the lords at the coronation, the form is: 'I become your liege man of life and limb and of earthly worship, and faith and truth I shall bear unto you, to live and die, against all manner of folk; so God me help³.' The kiss of the lord completed the ceremony⁴.

The form of homage.

Importance of these obligations.

That these obligations were insufficient to maintain either the peace of the country or the due obedience of the subject, our whole medieval history proves; but that they had a certain and occasionally a strong influence in that direction is proved, once for all, by the history of the parliament of 1460, which, although determined to secure the right of the duke of York to the crown, did not venture to set aside the solemn obligations which its members had undertaken in the repeated oaths sworn to Henry VI. Unhappily in such times the means taken for securing the royal position of the new king sealed

¹ Blackstone, Comm. i. 367, 368.

² The form given by Britton is this: 'I become your man for the fees and tenements which I hold and ought to hold of you, and will bear you faith of life and limb, of body and chattels, and of every earthly honour against all who can live and die;' lib. iii. c. 4.

³ See Coronation Service; and Taylor, Glory of Regality, pp. 204, 205, 353 sq.

⁴ 'Then the lord, whoever he may be, whether ourself or another, and whether male or female, clerk or lay, old or young, ought to kiss his tenant, whether he be poor or rich, ugly or handsome, in token of perpetual affiance and obligation of strict friendship;' Britton, lib. iii. c. 4; cf. Ass. de Jerus. i. 313.

the fate of the old king when he had once fallen: no conqueror or victorious faction could afford to be merciful to a person to whom so many honourable men had sworn to be true and loyal. The security which oaths could not give had to be sought by legislation on treason.

463. The doctrine of treason was the necessary result of the doctrine of oaths and of the duty, moral or religious, of obedience. It appears in germ in Alfred's legislation: 'if a man plot against the king's life, of himself or by harbouring of exiles or of his men, let him be liable in his life and in all that he has;' and 'he who plots against his lord's life, let him be liable in his life to him and in all that he has'.¹ In Glanvill it appears under the Roman name of 'lese-majesty' in the rules for trial of the man who is charged by fame, or by an accuser, touching the king's death, or sedition in the kingdom or the host². By that time the doctrine of the civil law had leavened the English law, and the sense of betrayal of obligation, which lies at the root of treason, was already lost in the general necessity of securing the king and realm. The general obligation of the subject being recognised, the special plea of treachery, 'proditio,' was a mere rhetorical aggravation of the sin of disobedience.

The acts that constituted treason, however generally set down in the law books, were not defined by statute until the reign of Edward III. Bracton places in the first class of 'lese-majesty' the case of one who by rash daring has contrived the death of the king, or has done or procured anything to be done to produce sedition against the king or in the army; and the crime involves all who have counselled or consented, even if it has not come to effect³. The convicted traitor is to

¹ Ll. Alfr. § 4.

² 'Crimen quod in legibus dicitur crimen laesae majestatis, ut de nece vel seditione personae domini regis vel regni vel exercitus;' Glanv. lib. i. c. 2; cf. xiv. 1. See also the Lex Frisiorum, xvii. § 1; Pertz, Legg. v. 68. There is a most important passage on the subject in the Policraticus of John of Salisbury, lib. vi. c. 25.

³ Bracton, lib. iii. c. 3: 'Habet enim crimen laesae majestatis sub se multas species, quarum una est ut si quis ausu temerario machinatus sit in mortem domini regis vel aliquid egerit vel agi procuraverit ad seditionem Doctrine of treason.

Early legislation on treason.

Definitions of lese-majesty.

Statute of treasons.

Treasons defined by the act of Edward III.

Additions under Richard II.

be drawn and to suffer the penalties of felony, death, forfeiture, and corruption of blood. Britton, who more clearly states the idea of 'betrayal' as distinct from that of 'lese-majesty'¹, and includes in treason any mischief done to one to whom the doer represents himself as a friend, states the points of high treason to be—to compass the king's death, or to disinherit him of his realm, or to falsify his seal, or to counterfeit or clip his coin. These were among the points established, no doubt under the maxims of the lawyers, by the statute of treasons passed in 1352, which were—the compassing the death of the king, queen, or their eldest son; the violation of the queen or the king's eldest unmarried daughter, or his son's wife; the levying of war against the king in his realm; adhering to the king's enemies, counterfeiting his seal or money, or importing false money, and the slaying of the lord chancellor, treasurer, or judges in the discharge of their duty². New points of possible treason were to be decided by parliament as they arose, and unfortunately this assertion by parliament of its own power was not a dead letter. In 1382, in the alarm which followed the rising of the commons, it was made treason to begin a riot or rumour³ against the king. In the parliament of 1388 the judges affirmed the illegality of the appeal of treason brought against the king's friends, but the lords decided that, in so high a matter, the question of legality belonged not to the justices, but to the lords of parliament, and found the appeal to be good⁴. That great appeal certainly contained many points which could not fairly be treated as treason; but the domini regis vel exercitus sui, vel procurantibus auxilium et consilium praeberit vel consensum, licet id quod in voluntate habuerit non perduxerit ad effectum; fo. 118 b. 'Continet etiam sub se crimen laesae majestatis crimen falsi,' &c.; ibid.; Fleta, lib. i. c. 21, p. 31.

¹ Britton, lib. i. c. 9: 'Tresun est en chescun damage qe hom fet a escient ou procure de fere a cely a qui hom se fet ami . . . graunt tresoun est a compasser nostre mort ou de nous desheriter de nostre reaume ou de fauser noster seal, ou de countrefere nostre monee ou de retoundre;' ed. Nichols, i. 40. Compare the general account of treason given in the laws of Henry I, art. lxxv; Assises de Jerusalem, i. 159 sq.; Blackstone, Comm. iv. 74-93.

² Stat. 25 Edw. III, st. 5. c. 2; Stat. i. 320; Rot. Parl. ii. 239.

³ Stat. 5 Rich. II, st. i. c. 6; Stat. ii. 20.

⁴ Stat. 21 Rich. II, cc. 3, 4.

question decided probably concerned the form only. The power, once asserted, was turned to account by Richard II in his attempt at absolutism; and he prevailed on the parliament of 1397 to declare it to be high treason to attempt the reversal of the acts done in that session¹. Yet in the very same session the king, by the assent of the lords spiritual and temporal and the commons, defined the four points of treason even more succinctly than they had been defined by the statute of 1352²: every one who compasses and purposes the death of the king, or to depose him, or to surrender his liege homage, or who raises the people and rides against the king, to make war in the realm, and is thereupon duly attainted and judged in parliament, is to be counted guilty of high treason against the crown. The act of the first year of Henry IV declared appeals of treason in parliament illegal, and repealed the acts of Richard by which new treasons had been created³. In the reign of Henry VI the list of treasons was enlarged by the inclusion of some new offences; the man indicted, appealed, or arrested on suspicion of treason, if he escaped from prison, was declared guilty of treason; the burning of houses in execution of a threat to extort money, and the carrying off cattle by the Welsh marauders out of England, were made high treason⁴. These acts however illustrate rather the increasing severity of the law than the doctrine of treason itself, which received little legislative modification during the rest of the period before us. The cruelties and severities of the Wars of the Roses can hardly be held to prove anything as to the accepted doctrine on the point, any more than the attempts made earlier and later to extend the penalties of constructive treasons. Edward IV, greatly to his credit, refused to allow sacrilege to be made high treason⁵. The reign of Henry VIII has, as one point of bad pre-eminence, the multiplication of treasons; and in most of the new treasons the offence against the king's person again becomes the leading idea: the legislation of Mary, however

Four points defined in 1397.

Legislation
of Henry IV.

New treas-ons under Henry VI.

Treason laws of Henry VIII swept away by Mary.

¹ Stat. ii. 110.

² Rot. Parl. iii. 351; Stat. ii. 98, 99.

³ 1 Hen. IV, cc. 10, 14; Stat. ii. 114, 116.

⁴ See Statutes, ii. 226, 242, 318; Rot. Parl. iv. 260, 349; v. 54.

⁵ Rot. Parl. v. 632.

severe on heresy, was more lenient in this respect, and by one act she swept away these monuments of the cruelties perpetrated under her father and brother.

Practical bearing of the legislation on treason.

The legislation on treason is not an edifying episode of our history, but it will bear comparison with the practice of other countries which did not possess our safeguards. As an instrument for drawing the people to the king it had little or no result: the severities of the law did not retard the growth of loyalty any more than the legal perfections of the abstract king attracted the affections of the people. The child Richard and the baby Henry might be the object of sincere patriotic attachment to thousands who had never seen them; but the law regarded them as the mainspring of the national machine. With no more conscious exercise of power than the diadem, or the great seal, or the speaker's mace, they enacted all the laws and issued all the writs on which the welfare and safety of the kingdom hung. In the boy Henry, as his council told him, resided the sum and substance of sovereignty¹; but the execution of all the powers implied in this was vested in his council. The ideal king could do all things, but without the counsel and consent of the estates he could do nothing. The exaltation of the ideal king was the exaltation of the law that stood behind him, of the strength and majesty of the state which he impersonated. It could be no wonder if now and then a king should mistake the theory for the truth of fact, and, like Richard II, should attempt to put life in the splendid phantom. And when the king arose who had the will and the power, the nation had gone on so long believing in the theory, that they found no weapons to resist the fact, until the factitious theory of the Stewarts raised the ghost of medieval absolutism to be laid then and for ever.

The ideal king.

Position of the king at the close of the middle ages.

It is needless to recapitulate here the substance of our former conclusions. The strength of the crown at the close of the middle ages lay in the permanence of the idea of royalty, the wealth of the king, the legal definitions and theory of the supreme power: its position was enhanced by the suicide of the baronage, the personal qualities of the new dynasty, the political weariness of the nation, and the altered position of the kings in the great states of Europe. The place of Henry VII cannot be understood without reference to the events which, in France, Spain and Germany, were consolidating great dynastic monarchies, in the activity of which the nations themselves had little independent participation. But this marks the beginning of the new period, and its historic significance had yet to be divulged.

¹ See above, p. 108.

464. Second, but scarcely second, to the influence of the crown was the influence of the church, resulting to a great extent from the same historic causes and strengthened by analogous sanctions. In more ways than one the ecclesiastical power in England was a conserving and uniting element. The possessions of the clergy, the landed estates of the bishops, of the cathedrals, and of the monastic communities, extended into nearly every parish, and the tithes and offerings which maintained the beneficed clergy were a far larger source of revenue than even the lands. The clergy, and the monastic orders especially, had been good farmers; in early days the monks had laboured hard to reclaim the fens; in somewhat later times the Cistercians had clothed the hills and downs with sheep, and thus fostered the growth of the staple commodity of medieval England. The clergy were moreover very mild landlords. Their wealth was greater than the king's; their industrial energy and influence for a long period were unrivalled. To those who knew anything of the political history of the past, the church had great historical claims to honour; her champions had withstood the strongest and most politic kings, and her holiest prelates had stood side by side with the defenders of national liberty. The clergy had a majority of votes in the house of lords, without counting those of such lay lords as were sure to support their spiritual guides. They had also their taxing assembly in the convocation, a machinery which saved them from being directly involved in the petty financial discussions of the parliaments. They furnished the great ministers of state, the chancellors with rare exceptions,

Influence of the church.

Territorial influence of the clergy.

Their historical claims.

Their constitutional position.

Their personal importance.

Their corporate feeling.

Their spiritual influence.

Jealousy with which their wealth was viewed.

and ordinarily the keeper of the privy seal, who was the chief minister of the council; frequently the treasurer also was a clergyman. Although they may, from their numbers and character, present to modern thought the idea of a class of educated, rather than ordained, ministers, it is certain that they were thoroughly pervaded with class sentiment. Not that they were tempted to assume a position which sectarian jealousy forced upon their successors, for until the close of the fourteenth century their monopoly of spiritual teaching was not imperilled by any serious competition; they had had their struggle with the friars, but the friars had soon become as much a part of the ecclesiastical phalanx as were the endowed clergy themselves. The absence of such rivalry had not had the effect of diminishing the consciousness of corporate unity. However lightly the obligations of holy orders lay on the mediæval minister of state or official of the chancery, when it came to a question of class privilege or immunity, he knew where and how to take a side with his brethren. Rich, wide-spread, accumulating for centuries a right to national gratitude, working in every class of society, the clergy were strong in corporate feeling and in the possession of complete machinery for public action. To this was added the enormous weight of spiritual influence; if the sense of loyalty to the king was quickened by the arguments of religion, by the obligations of obedience, of fealty, homage, and allegiance, much more strongly and much more directly was the spiritual influence that applied those arguments effective in respect to the church. Nor was the temptation to use this influence to sustain the political and social position of the clergy altogether wanting; for however safe their spiritual pre-eminence might seem, their wealth very early gave occasion for a jealousy which must have proved a strong stimulus to watchfulness. The Lollard attack on the temporalities, which no doubt suggested and prepared the way for the dissolution of the monasteries under Henry VIII, was itself the growth of a long period during which kings and barons had looked with a covetous eye on the territorial wealth of the religious orders.

It would not have been surprising to find that, considering the strength and self-consciousness of the spiritual estate of England, considering the high place and great influence which it had held for so many centuries, the government of the country had become distinctly hierarchical, and that the legislation had shown those marks which are regarded as inseparable signs of clerical domination. There are moreover proofs enough that, when and where there was adequate occasion, the right of the strong will could be asserted even against the right of the strong hand. The legislation against heresy is one great illustration of this; the part taken by archbishops Courtenay and Arundel in the days of Richard II is another; the grasp of political and official power in the hands of cardinals Beaufort and Bourchier is less significant, because in both cases their position was affected by their connexion with the conflicting dynastic parties; and in the last Lancastrian reign the king was a more enthusiastic supporter of church privilege than were his prelates. But on the whole it must be allowed that the ecclesiastical power in parliament was not used for selfish purposes; possibly the clergy regarded themselves as too safe to need the weapons of political priestcraft, possibly they saw that they must not provoke greater jealousy by aiming at more conspicuous power. If we may judge of the class by the character and conduct of the foremost men, they ought to have the full benefit of the admission which their bitterest critics cannot withhold. They worked hard for the good of the nation; they did not forget the good of the church; but they rarely if ever sacrificed the one to the other, whether their guiding-line was drawn by confidence or by caution.

The national legislation only occasionally clerical.

Ecclesiastical power not selfishly used.

We have discussed in an earlier chapter the drawbacks which must be taken into account in estimating the real weight of the clergy in the country; especially the ever-spreading and rankling sore produced by the inquisitorial, mercenary, and generally disreputable character of the courts of spiritual discipline: an evil which had no slight share in making the Reformation inevitable, and which yet outlived the Reformation and did its worst in alienating the people from the church

Mischief arising from the ecclesiastical courts.

reformed. But neither this nor the jealousy of ecclesiastical wealth, nor disgust at ecclesiastical corruption, nor the dislike and contempt with which men like More viewed the rabble of disreputable and superfluous priests, nor the growth of a desire for purer teaching, would have determined the crisis of the Reformation as it was determined, but for the personal agency of the Tudors, Henry VIII, Mary, and Elizabeth; and the irresistible force of that personal agency proved the weakness of the ecclesiastical position. The clergy had relied too much on Rome, and too much also on the balance of force between the other estates and the crown. 'Rome alone you will have; Rome alone will destroy you,' Ranulf Glanvill had said to the monks of Canterbury¹; the prophecy was true of the monastic body, and it had a partial application to the whole medieval church system.

Personal influence of the Tudors in producing ecclesiastical changes.

Injuries done by the church of Rome to the church of England.

The ecclesiastical position weakened by the connexion.

465. In the first place the papal policy had taken the innate life and vigour out of the ecclesiastical constitution, and supplied or attempted to supply the place with foreign mechanism: legations, legatine authority, appeals, dispensations, licences; the direct compacts between the crown and the popes to defeat the canonical rights of the clergy in the matters of elections; all the policy which the statutes of praemunire and provisors had been intended to thwart, had fatally impaired the early idea of a self-governing church working in accord with a self-governing nation. The attempt to compel a universal recourse to Rome had destroyed the spiritual independence of the national episcopate; and when the real strength of Rome, her real power to work good and carry into effect her own resolutions, was waning, the more natural and national power of the episcopate was gone beyond recall: it stood before Henry VIII, 'magni nominis umbra;' the monastic system fell at once; the convocations purchased a continued and attenuated existence by an enormous fine: the facilities of doctrinal change and the weakness of the reformed episcopate proved that the religious sanction, which had so long been regarded as the one great stay of the ecclesiastical position, had been tasked far beyond its strength. Nothing in the whole history of the Reformation is so striking, and it is a lesson that ought never to be wasted upon later ages, as the total unconsciousness apparent in even such men as Warham, Tunstall and Fisher, of the helplessness of their spiritual position, the gulf that was opening beneath their feet.

¹ Gervase, Chron. vol. i. p. 448: 'Solam Romam quaeritis; sola Roma destruet vos.'

466. In the second point, that of their political security, the prelates of the sixteenth century were scarcely more upon their guard; although they might have learned to mistrust their political position when they saw the apathy of the commons and the collapse of the baronage. Here they knew that they had no spiritual sanction to fall back upon: their stronghold was that office of mediation which they had so long sustained; the function of mediation ceased when all rivalry had ceased between the forces between which it had acted. When the crown was supreme in wealth, power and policy; when the commons were bent on other work and had lost their political leaders; when the baronage was lying at the feet of the king, perishing or obsequious; when in other lands absolutism was set up as the model government of a full-grown nationality¹,—the medieval church of England stood before the self-willed dictator, too splendid in wealth, fame and honour, to be allowed to share the dominion that he claimed. It was no longer a mediator, but a competitor for power: the royal self-will itself furnished the occasion for a struggle, and the political claims of the church proved their weakness by the greatness of the fall.

Weakness of the political position of the clergy.

Fall of the church before the king.

467. The historical position and weight of the baronage, the variations of the baronial policy, the changes in the form of qualification, and in the numbers of the persons composing the house of lords, have formed an important part of our last chapter. But some points, such especially as may help to complete our view of the comparative influence exercised by the several powerful elements of society, and their powers of attraction and repulsion as affecting the mass of the nation, may be briefly treated in this place.

Points in the history of the nobility.

¹ 'They blame Lewis XI for bringing the administration royal of France from the lawful and regulate reign to the absolute and tyrannical power and government. He himself was wont to glory and say that he had brought the crown of France hors de page, as one would say, out of wardship;' Smith, Commonwealth, bk. i. c. 7.

Extent of their possessions.

However highly we may be inclined to estimate the extent of royal and ecclesiastical property, it is difficult to overrate the quantity of land which during the middle ages remained in the hands of the great nobles. Encumbered and impoverished, in many instances, it undoubtedly was by the burdens of debt, heavy settlements and the necessities of a splendid expenditure; but these drawbacks only slightly affected the personal influence

Difference of rank only partially implies difference of wealth.

of the several lords over their tenants and neighbours. Although their estates were unequally distributed, and it would be hazardous to infer from the mere title of earldom or baronage any very definite proportion of property, it may be generally held to be true that there was a wide gap between the poorest of the barons and the wealthiest of the class next below them; and between the earls and the barons, as a rule, there was a very marked difference. The higher ranks in the peerage did not necessarily imply a great superiority in wealth. The history of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries furnishes many instances in which a pecuniary estimate was set upon the difference of degrees. Thus in 1379, in raising contributions for the maintenance of the garrisons in France, a duke paid a poll tax of £6 13s. 4d.; an earl £4; barons, bannerets and wealthy knights £2¹. In 1454 the fine imposed on a duke or archbishop for non-attendance in parliament was fixed at £100, that of an earl or bishop at 100 marks, and that of a baron or abbot at £40². The creation money, as we have seen, varied in regular proportion; the duke had an allowance of £40, the marquess £35, the earl £20, and the viscount 20 marks³. The

Pecuniary estimates of the difference in ranks of nobility.

¹ Rot. Parl. iii. 57.

² Ibid. v. 248.

³ See above, pp. 449-451. Proofs will be found in the Acts of Creation given in the Lords' Fifth Report: the duke of Clarence in 1411 has £40, p. 169; cf. pp. 182, 242, 243 sq.; the marquess of Dorset in 1397 has 35 marks, p. 117; in 1443, £35, p. 240; the marquess of Montague in 1473 has £40, p. 378; the earl of Cornwall in 1330 has £20, p. 21; the viscount of Beaumont 20 marks, p. 235, cf. p. 276; Thomas Percy, baron of Egremont, £10, p. 273.

substantial endowment secured to the king's sons, and to friends who were suddenly promoted from an inferior rank, affords a better clue to the distinctions made. In 1386 a pension of £1000 per annum was secured to each of the two new dukes of York and Gloucester, until lands of the same annual value could be found for them¹. In 1322 Sir Andrew Harclay had a similar annuity of 1000 marks on his creation as earl of Carlisle. William Clinton had 1000 marks when he was made earl of Huntingdon in 1336; and there are many other instances².

But perhaps the most curious illustration of the point will be found in the document known as the Black Book of Edward IV, in which the arrangements for the households suitable to the several ranks are drawn out in a tabular form. There the annual outlay of the king on his household is estimated at £13,000, that of a duke at £4000, that of a marquess at £3000, that of an earl at £2000, that of a viscount at £1000, that of a baron at £500, that of a banneret at £200, that of a knight bachelor at £100, that of a squire at £50³. In the time of Elizabeth, Sir Thomas Smith estimated the becoming provision for a barony at 1000 pounds or marks a year and the higher grades in proportion⁴.

Illustration
from the Black Book of Edward IV.

Proportionate expenditure of peers.

These sums however bear very little relation to the real differences in the amount of property and accompanying political interest which existed among the great lords. The duchy of Lancaster grew, by the accumulation of royal grants and the marriage of heiresses, to an extent rivalling the official demesne of the crown; and the duchy of Norfolk grew in the same way.

Territorial acquisitions of the great houses.

¹ Lords' Fifth Report, pp. 64, 65: see also the case of the duke of Exeter in 1416, ib. p. 182; cf. Madox, Bar. Angl. p. 146.

² Lords' Fifth Report, pp. 18, 28. The earl of Stafford has an annuity of 600 marks, p. 146; Guichard d'Angle, earl of Huntingdon, 1000 marks, p. 61; John Holland, earl of Huntingdon, the king's half-brother, 2000 marks, p. 83; the earl of Rutland 800 marks, p. 84; Ralph Boteler, baron of Sudeley, 200 marks, p. 239.

³ Published by the Society of Antiquaries among the Ordinances of the Royal Household, pp. 15-35.

⁴ Commonwealth, book i. c. 17: 'In England no man is created a baron except he may dispend of yearly revenue one thousand pounds or one thousand marks at the least; viscounts, earls, marquesses, and dukes, more according to the proportion of the degree and honour.'

The fortunes of the Nevilles and Percies were the result of a long series of well-chosen marriages, and were in no way inferior to those of the dukes and marquesses. In the later part of the period the duke of Buckingham rivalled, in the number of his estates and dignities, the honours of John of Gaunt or Henry IV. The kingmaker Warwick was content to remain an earl. The result of the multiplication of dignities was not altogether wholesome; they might not have much meaning as denoting political power or property, but they involved, what in a half-barbarous society was almost as precious, certain signs of precedence; and thus they added occasions for personal jealousies and rivalries of which there were too many already. Taken in the aggregate the landed possessions of the baronage were more than a counterpoise to the whole influence of the crown and the other two estates of the realm: fortunately for public liberty their influence was in great measure nullified by personal and family rivalries.

Result of the multiplication of ranks.

A medieval map wanted.

Local influences of the earldoms.

468. It would be an easy task, if we possessed a map of feudal or medieval England, to determine the amount of local influence possessed by the great houses, and to see how the line taken in the hereditary and dynastic quarrels was affected and illustrated by their relations to one another. In default of such a guide we must content ourselves with generalities¹. Of the earls, as they were at the beginning of the fifteenth century, the titles in many cases still point to their chief centres of interest. The strength of the Courtenays lay in Devon, that of Arundel in Sussex, that of the earl of Salisbury in Wiltshire and Dorsetshire, that of the earl of Warwick in Warwickshire. But this rule was not without exceptions; the strength of the earl of Oxford was in Essex, and that of the earl of Kent in the lordship of the Wakes in Yorkshire and Lincolnshire. Nor was the local influence of the earls at all confined to their chief seats of power; the Percy was dominant not only in Northumberland, but in Yorkshire, and in Sussex also, where the lord of Petworth was a match for the lord of Arundel. In

¹ These statements may be verified by Dugdale's Baronage and the Inquisitiones post mortem, published by the Record Commission.

Essex again the earl of Oxford was strong, but the earldom of the Bohuns was strong also. There was a marked difference between the stronger earldoms like those of the Bohuns, the Clares and the Bigods, on which the dukedoms were founded, and the smaller accumulations of the Veres and Montacutes of Oxford and Salisbury ; and no doubt similar influences affected the baronies, although in less conspicuous degrees.

Stronger and weaker earldoms.

Of all the counties, Yorkshire, as might be expected, contained the greatest number of the great lordships : there, not to mention minor cases, were Richmond the chief seat of the Breton earls ; Topcliffe the honour of the Percies, Thirsk of the Mowbrays, Tanfield of the Marmions, Skipton of the Cliffords, Middleham of the Fitz-Hughs and Nevilles, Helmsley of the Roos, Masham and Bolton of the two Scropes, Sheffield of the Furnivals and Talbots, and Wakefield of the duke of York ; there too were numerous castles and honours that united to form the great Lancaster duchy. In Lincolnshire were the homes of Cromwell, Willoughby and Wells. Further north Cumberland supplied the baron of Greystoke, Durham the lords of Lumley and Raby, besides its palatine bishop, to the list of Northern lords. The southern counties were thickly sown with smaller lordships ; Sussex was the home of Camoys, Dacre, and la Warr ; from Kent came the lord of Cobham, from Gloucester Berkeley, from Cornwall Botreaux and Bonneville, from Somerset Hungerford, Beauchamp, Montacute. Along the Welsh march the greater English earldoms long retained their old fighting grounds ; the lords of Lancaster at Monmouth and Kidwelly, the Bohuns at Brecon and Hereford, the Mortimers of Chirk and Wigmore. In the middle of England the baronage was less strong ; the crown and the duchy of Lancaster were very powerful : and with the exception of the duchy of Buckingham the other lordships were neither many nor large. On the east the duke of Norfolk, gathering in the Mowbray dignities of Nottingham and the Marshallship, was almost supreme, and before the battle of Bosworth-field he had acquired the earldom of Surrey. Although both the great earldoms and the more important baronies retained a sort of corporate identity derived

Local distribution of the great lordships.

Early extinction of the greater families.

from earlier times, almost all the elder historic families had, as we have seen already, become extinct in the male line, before the Percies and Nevilles came into the van of the baronage. The representation of the Clares and Bohuns as well as that of the Lacies, the Ferrers, the Bigods, and many others, had fallen into the royal family. The Mowbrays of Norfolk and the Staffords of Buckingham derived their importance rather from their marriage with heiresses of royal blood than from the elder Mowbrays and Staffords; and this was one of the causes that gave peculiar horrors to the dynastic quarrel. But even this short sketch leads into inquiries that are too remote from constitutional history.

Hereditary politics.

Besides territorial competition and family rivalries, hereditary politics contributed to the weakening of the baronage as a collective estate. The house of Lancaster with its hereditary principles had its hereditary following. Bohun and Bigod were consistent, for generations, in opposition to the assumptions of the crown; and, when John of Gaunt failed to support adequately the character of the house he represented, Henry IV learned from the Bohuns and Arundels the lessons that led him to the throne. To develop however this side of the subject would be to recapitulate the history of the fifteenth century.

Factionous sources of strength

469. If we pass thus summarily over the points in which faction and personal rivalry weakened the baronage internally, and turn to those in which class feeling gave them a false strength and set them apart from the classes next below them, we shall find additional reasons for doubting their substantial influence and for believing that their great period of usefulness was coming to an end. But more than one of the points to be noted are common to the nobility and the higher gentry or knightly body; and causes which tended to divide the one from the other, tended, in a similar though less effective way, to sever the interests and sympathies of the gentry from those of the inferior commons. Chief amongst these causes were the customs of livery and maintenance, the keeping of great households and flocks of dependents, the fortification of castles and manor-houses, the great value set on heraldic distinctions, and the like. These matters are not all of the same importance, and have not all the same history. The old feudal spirit which prompted a man to treat his tenants and villeins as part of his stock, and which aspired to lead in war, and to judge and tax, his vassals without reference to their bond of allegiance to the crown, had been crushed before the reign of Edward III; but the passions to which it appealed were not extinguished, and the pursuits of chivalry continued to supply some of the incentives to vanity and ambition which the feudal customs had furnished of old. The baron could not reign as king in his castle, but he could make his castle as strong and splendid as he chose; he could not demand the military services of his vassals for private war, but he could, if he chose to pay for it, support a vast household of men armed and liveried as servants, a retinue of pomp and splendour, but ready for any opportunity of disturbance; he could bring them to the assizes to impress the judges, or to parliament to overawe the king; or he could lay his hands, through them, on disputed lands and farms, and frighten away those who had a better claim. He could constitute himself the champion of all who would accept his championship, maintain their causes in the courts, enable them to resist a hostile judgment, and delay a hazardous issue. On the seemingly trifling pomp and pretence of chivalry, the mischievous fabric of extinct feudalism was threatening gradually to reconstruct itself.

Survival of feudal instincts.

Great retinues of the lords.

470. Livery was originally the allowance (liberatio) in provisions and clothing which was made for the servants and officers of the great households, whether of baron, prelate, monastery or college¹. From the rolls of accounts and household books of such families it is possible to form a very exact notion of the economy of the medieval lords. The several departments were organised under regular officers of the buttery,

Origin of the usage of livery.

¹ The customs of livery and allowances are still maintained in some of the colleges of the Universities, and in many respects these institutions furnish most important illustrations of what in the middle ages was the domestic economy of every large household. At Oriel, for instance, every fellow has his daily allowance whilst in residence, and, every other year, a payment for livery, if he has resided the fixed number of days.

Practical mischief of livery.

the kitchen, the napery, the chandlery and the like; every inmate had his fixed allowance for every day, and his livery of clothing at fixed times of the year or intervals of years. The same custom was practised in the reception of guests; the king of Scots, when he came to do homage to the king of England, had his allowance of wax and tallow candles, of fine and common bread, measured out like that of any servant, and the due delivery of all was secured by a formal treaty¹. The term livery was however gradually restricted to the gift of clothing, the gift of food and provisions being known as allowances or corrodies: the clothing took the character of uniform or badge of service; as it was a proof of power to have a large attendance of servants and dependents, the lords liberally granted their livery to all who wished to wear it, and the wearing of the livery became a sign of clientship or general dependence. It was thus a bond between the great men, who indulged their vanity, and the poorer, who had need of their protection, sometimes by force of arms, but generally in the courts of law: it was a revival, or possibly a survival, of the ancient practice, by which every man was bound to have a lord, and every lord had to represent his men or be answerable for them in the courts.

The mischief of maintenance.

The English of the middle ages were an extremely litigious people; it was one of the few qualities which their forefathers had shared with their Norman masters; and it was that side of the national character which was most mischievously developed by the judicial institutions of Henry I and Henry II. Litigation was costly, at least to the poor; and it was far easier for a man who wished to maintain his own right, or to attack his neighbour's, to secure the advocacy of a baron who could and would maintain his cause for him on the understanding that he had the rights of a patron over his client, than to pay the fees of a lawyer. This practice of maintenance, the usage of the strong man upholding the cause of the weak, was liable to gross perversion; and the maintainers of false causes, whether they were barons or lawyers, became very early the object of severe legislation. Edward I, in the statute of Westminster the First, forbad

¹ See Hoveden, iii. 245.

the sheriffs and other officers of his courts to take any part in quarrels depending in the courts¹. By a statute of 1327 it is forbidden that any member of the king's household, or any great man of the realm, by himself or by another, by sending letters or otherwise, or any other in the land, great or small, shall take upon him to maintain quarrels or parties in the country to the let and disturbance of the common law²; in 1346, in an act which marks by its wording the growth of the practice in the higher classes, prelates, earls, barons, the great and small of the land, are all alike forbidden to take in hand or maintain openly or privately, for gift, promise, amity, favour, doubt or fear, any other quarrels than their own³. The long list of statutes in which the evil practice is condemned shows how strong it had become; the sheriffs are forbidden to return to parliament the maintainers of false suits⁴; the lawyers and the barons are alike struck at in petition and statute; and the climax is reached when Alice Perrers, the king's mistress, takes her seat in the law courts and urges the quarrels of her clients⁵. In the condemnation of maintainers pronounced by the Good Parliament, ladies as well as lords come in for general reprobation⁶. The support given by John of Gaunt and Henry Percy to Wycliffe at St. Paul's was a gross act of maintenance⁷.

Legislation
against maintenance.

Inadequacy of the laws against maintenance.

The abuse of maintenance for the purpose of increasing the estates of the maintainer, by a compact in which the nominal plaintiff shared the profits of victory with his patron, or the patron secured the whole, was one very repulsive aspect of the custom. Another, and that more directly connected with the giving of liveries, was the gathering round the lord's household of a swarm of armed retainers whom the lord could not control, and whom he conceived himself bound to protect. In the former aspect the law regarded maintenance as a description of conspiracy; in the latter as an organisation of robbers and rioters; but the difficulty of restraining the abuse was

Maintenance and champerty.

Riotous households.

¹ Stat. Westm. I. cc. 25, 28, 33; Statutes, i. 33, 35.

² 1 Edw. III, st. 2. c. 14; Statutes, i. 256.

³ 20 Edw. III, cc. 4, 5, 6; Statutes, i. 304, 305.

⁴ See above, p. 416.

⁵ Vol. ii. p. 452.

⁶ Rot. Parl. ii. 329; iii. 12.

⁷ Vol. ii. p. 459.

very great; the lords were themselves the makers of the law, and the source of their local power lay in these very retinues which disgraced them. The livery of a great lord was as effective security to a malefactor as was the benefit of clergy to the criminous clerk. But livery, apart from maintenance of false quarrels, involved a political mischief.

Importance of heraldry.

471. Under the auspices of Edward I and Edward III there was a great development of heraldic splendour; heraldry became a handmaid of chivalry, and the marshalling of badges, crests, coat-armour, pennons, helmets, and other devices of distinction, grew into an important branch of knowledge. The roll of knights who attended Edward I at Caerlaverock is one of the most precious archives of heraldic science¹. The coat-armour of every house was a precious inheritance, which descended, under definite limitations and with distinct differences, to every member of the family: a man's shield proved his gentle or noble birth, illustrated his pedigree, and put him on his honour not to disgrace the bearings which his noble progenitors had worn. The office of the Earl Marshall of England was empowered to regulate all proceedings and suits of heraldry, and it had a staff of busy officers². The great suit between Scrope and Grosvenor³, for the right to bear the bend or on the field azure, is one of the causes célèbres of the middle ages; it dragged on its course from 1385 to 1390; a vast mass of evidence was brought up on both sides, and the victory of Scrope was one of the first facts that brought before the notice of the baronage the antiquity claimed for the house of Grosvenor. Scarcely less famous was the contest between lord Grey of Ruthyn and Edward Hastings, the heir by half-blood of the Hastings barony⁴: Grey of Ruthyn succeeded in

Court of the Earl Marshall.

¹ It was published by Sir Harris Nicolas in 1828, and by Wright in 1864. Other rolls are printed in the Parliamentary Writs, i. 410-420; ii. pp. 196-200; Excerpta Historica, pp. 50, 163, 314, &c., and in the ordinary books on heraldry.

² See Coke, 4th Inst. pp. 123 sq.; Prynne, 4th Inst. pp. 59 sq. The jurisdiction of the Earl Marshall was defined by Stat. 13 Rich. II, c. 2; and the College of Arms was incorporated by Richard III; Coke, 4th Inst. p. 125.

³ See Prynne, 4th Inst. pp. 62, 63. The whole proceedings in this case were edited by Sir Harris Nicolas in 1832.

⁴ Nicolas, Historic Peerage, p. 239; Rot. Parl. iii. 480.

gaining the arms ; both competitors assumed the title to which neither had a right. Regular visitations were held by the heralds, who kept courts in every county, where the claimants of heraldic honours were bound to appear under the penalty of being declared ignoble. The institution of the Order of the Garter by Edward III marks another step of this history : it was the erection of a new sort of nobility by livery ; a body of exalted pretensions in chivalry, whose mark was the collar, mantle, jewel and garter of the Order of S. George. The king had numerous imitators ; the heraldic devices of lords and ladies were pressed into the service of chivalry ; and ‘livery of company’ became a fashionable practice. It was no longer a mere mark of service to wear the badge of a lord ; the lords wore one another’s badges by way of compliment ; Richard II greatly offended the earl of Arundel by wearing the collar of his uncle’s livery ; the livery of John of Gaunt was severely criticised as being scarcely distinguished from that of the king¹. Worse evils followed : liveries became the badges of the great factions of the court, and the uniform, so to speak, in which the wars of the fifteenth century were fought.

Heralds’ visitations.

Orders of knighthood.

Livery of company.

Livery in these two aspects, in connexion that is with illegal maintenance and with dynastic faction, occupies no insignificant place in the statute book and rolls of parliament. In 1377 the commons petitioned against ‘the giving of hats by way of livery for maintenance,’ and the justices were directed to inquire into cases of abuse² ; in 1389 a royal ordinance was founded on the petition that no one should wear the badge of a lord³, and that no prelate or any layman below the rank of banneret should give such livery of company : dukes, earls, barons, or bannerets might give livery, but only to knights retained for life by indenture, and to domestic servants. A very long list of petitions, and a proportionate number of statutes, all of the same tendency, prove that the evil was ineradicable by mere measures of restriction. In the parliament of 1399 it was enacted that

Acts of parliament on the subject of livery.

¹ Rot. Parl. iii. 313.

² Rot. Parl. iii. 23.

³ Rot. Parl. iii. 265 ; Stat. 13 Rich. II, c. 3.

Classes allowed to give livery.

the king alone might give any livery or sign of company, and the lords only livery of cloth to their servants and counsellors¹; in 1401 the prince of Wales was allowed the same privilege as the king²; in 1411 the right was conceded to guilds and fraternities founded for a good intent³; in 1429 further allowances are made, livery of cloth is not forbidden to the lord mayor and sheriffs of London, to the serjeants-at-law, or the universities; in time of war the lords may give liveries of cloth and hats, but such livery may not be assumed without leave⁴; and in 1468 Edward IV confirmed the previous legislation on the point⁵.

Abuses of the licence.

Proofs of the abuse are not wanting; in 1403 the Percies had given liveries to the rebels⁶; the permission to give livery of cloth only rendered the offence more difficult of detection, and the penalty on giving such livery beyond the prescribed limits, 'the pain to make fine and ransom at the king's will,' was not sufficiently definite to be effective; the statutes of Henry VI and Edward IV direct a more distinct form of process. Viewed as a social rather than a legal point, whether as a link between malefactors and their patrons, a distinctive uniform of great households, a means of blunting the edge of the law, or of perverting the administration of justice in the courts—as an honorary distinction fraught with all the jealousies of petty ambition, as an underhand way of enlisting bodies of unscrupulous retainers, or as an invidious privilege exercised by the lords under the shadow of law or in despite of law—the custom of livery forms an important element among the disruptive tendencies of the later middle ages. It resuscitated the evils of the old feudal spirit in a form which did not furnish even such security for order as was afforded in the older feudal arrangement by the substantial guarantee found in the tenure of land by the vassal under his lord. Livery and

Mischiefs arising from the custom of giving livery.

¹ Stat. 1 Hen. IV, c. 7; Statutes ii. 113.

² Stat. 2 Hen. IV, c. 21; Statutes, ii. 129, 130.

³ Stat. 13 Hen. IV, c. 3; Statutes, ii. 167.

⁴ Stat. 8 Hen. VI, c. 4; Statutes, ii. 240, 241.

⁵ Stat. 8 Edw. IV, c. 2; Statutes, ii. 426, 428.

⁶ Rot. Parl. iii. 524.

maintenance, apart or together, were signs of faction and oppression, and were two of the great sources of mischief, for the correction of which the jurisdiction of the Star Chamber was erected in the reign of Henry VII¹.

472. Somewhat akin to the practice of livery of servants was the usage of fortifying the manor-houses of the great men; a usage which went a long way towards making every rich man's dwelling-place a castle. The fortification or crenellation of these houses or castles could not be taken in hand without the royal licence: a matter, it must be supposed, of ancient prerogative, as it does not rest upon statute, and must be connected with the more ancient legislation against adulterine castles. A great number of the licences to crenellate or embattle dwelling-houses are found among the national records from the reign of Henry III onwards²; in the majority of cases the licence is granted to a baron or to some prelate or knight nearly approaching baronial rank; a few to the magistrates of towns for town walls. Between 1257 and 1273 Henry III granted twenty such licences; on the rolls of Edward I appear 44; on those of Edward II 58; the long reign of Edward III furnished 180 cases, and that of Richard II 52. In a parliamentary petition of 1371 the king was asked to establish by statute that every man throughout England might make fort or fortress, walls, and crenelled or embattled towers, at his own free will, and that the burghers of towns might fortify their towns, notwithstanding any statute made to the contrary. The king replied, that the castles and fortresses might stand as they were, and refused to allow the re-fortification of the towns³. Any such measure would have been a mark of impolicy, and opposed to the interest of both king and commons. From the accession of Henry IV the number of licences diminishes; only ten are on the rolls of his reign, one on those of Henry V, five on those of Henry VI, and three on those of Edward IV; but it does

Fortified houses of the great lords.

Licences for crenellation.

Petition on the subject.

¹ See Stat. 3 Hen. VII, c. 1: Lambarde, Archeion, pp. 183, 190.

² The list of licences from 1257 was printed by Mr. Parker in the first volume of the New Series of the Gentleman's Magazine, 1856, vol. i. pp. 208 sq., and from it the numbers given in the text are taken.

³ Rot. Parl. ii. 307.

Discussion on fortified houses.

not seem certain that the diminution resulted from any change in the royal policy. In the proposition for the resumption of gifts, which was urged on Henry IV in 1404, the commons declared that they had no wish to restrain any subject from applying for licence either to fortify his castle or to inclose his park¹. But however freely this was done, the age of Edward III would seem to have been the period of greatest activity in this respect.

Inclosure of parks.

The licence to crenellate occasionally contained the permission to inclose a park, and even to hold a fair. The first of the two points must be interpreted to show that the royal jealousy of forest rights was much less strongly felt than it had been in the early Norman² and Plantagenet times, when forest administration was an important constitutional question. Edward I had indeed granted that a writ 'ad quod damnum' should issue out of chancery to any who wished to make a park; the permission, after due inquiry, was to be granted on the payment of a reasonable fine³: so that the increase of parks perhaps may have kept pace with the multiplication of fortified houses. It was an important privilege, whether looked at as an extension of forest liberties, or as an encroachment, as it often was, on the waste or common lands of the manors. But land was cheap and plentiful, and little heartburning seems to have been produced by it among the classes that could make their voices heard in parliament. On the class which was likely to produce trespassers and poachers the hand of the law was heavy. The statute of Westminster the First⁴ classed such offenders with those found guilty of open theft and robbery, if they were convicted of having taken any game; the trespasser was liable to three years' imprisonment, to pay damages, and make a fine with the king; and in the parliament of 1390 it was enacted that no one possessing less than forty shillings a year, and no priest or clerk worth less than ten pounds a year, should keep a dog, 'leverer, n'autre chien'⁵. This early game-law was pri-

Effect of the inclosure of parks.

Offenders
against the game laws.

¹ Rot. Parl. iii. 548.

² See Rot. Pip. 31 Hen. I, p. 58.

³ Rot. Parl. i. 56; Statutes, i. 131.

⁴ Statutes, i. 32. See also an ordinance of 1293; ib. p. 111.

⁵ Stat. 13 Rich. II, c. 13; Statutes, ii. p. 65.

marily intended to stop the meetings of labourers and artificers, and has little permanent importance besides.

473. In their great fortified houses the barons kept an enormous retinue of officers and servants, all arranged in well-distinguished grades, provided with regular allowances of food and clothing, and subjected to strict rules of conduct and account¹. A powerful earl like the Percy, or a duke like the Stafford, was scarcely less than a king in authority, and much more than a king in wealth and splendour within his own house. The economy of a house like Alnwick or Fotheringay was perhaps more like that of a modern college than that of any private house at the present day. Like a king, too, the medieval baron removed from one to another of his castles with a train of servants and baggage, his chaplains and accountants, steward and carvers, servers, cupbearers, clerks, squires, yeomen, grooms and pages, chamberlain, treasurer, and even chancellor. Every state apartment in the house had its staff of ushers and servants. The hall had its array of tables at which the various officers were seated and fed according to their degree. The accounts were kept on great rolls, regularly made up and audited at the quarter days, when wages were paid and stock taken. The management of the parks, the

Baronial establishments.

Great trains of servants.

Household economy.

¹ The following table is an abstract of the estimates given in the Black Book of Edward IV on this point.

Person.	Income.	Knights.	Clerks.	Squires.	Yeomen.	Secondary clerks.	Grooms.	Stablemen.	Total.
King	£13,000	16	24	160	240	20	16	40	516
Duke	4000	6	...	60	100	...	40	24	230
Marquess	3000	4	...	60	100	...	60	...	224
Earl	2000	...	...	30	60	...	40	...	130
Viscount	1000	...	...	20	40	...	24	...	84
Baron	500	...	...	4	16	...	6	...	26
Banneret	200	...	...	...	3	...	6	...	24
Knight	200	...	...	...	...	...	...	...	16
Squire	50	...	1	...	2	...	2	2	16

The columns do not exactly coincide. The whole number of inmates of the Percy household in the reign of Henry VIII was 166; see Northumberland Household Book, p. x, and the valuable note of Hume, Hist. Engl., vol. ii, note Z.

accounts of the estates, the holding of the manorial courts, were further departments of administration: every baron on his own property practised the method and enforced the discipline which he knew and shared in the king's court; he was a man of business at home, and qualified in no small degree for the conduct of the business of the realm. And this is a point that enables us to understand how it was possible that men like the earl of Arundel of Henry V's time, or lord Cromwell of Henry VI's, could be called to the office of treasurer at a moment's notice: they had been brought up and lived in houses the administration of which was, on a somewhat reduced scale indeed, but still on the same model, the counterpart of the economy of the kingdom itself¹.

The baron's military service.

474. When the baron went to war, he collected his own contingent for the royal army, frequently at his own cost, but always with the expectation of being paid by the king. And this is one of the points in which the later medieval practice is most curiously distinguished from the earlier. The old feudal institutions, which, for the purposes of war, long retained a vitality which in other respects they had lost, were now replaced by a combination of chivalric sympathy with mercantile precision. This reflects very distinctly the two sides of the policy of Edward III, who must have introduced the practice when he found that for foreign service the feudal organisation of the army was absolutely useless, and had to attempt to utilise on the one hand the chivalry and on the other the business-like astuteness of his subjects. Armies were no longer raised for the recovery of the king's inheritance by writs of summons, but by indenture of agreement. The great lords, dukes, earls and barons, bound themselves by indenture, like the apprentices of a trade, to serve the king for a fixed time, and with fixed force, for fixed wages². Beyond

Service by indenture.

¹ Several volumes of Household books have been printed; Bishop Swinfield's, by the Camden Society in 1854 and 1855; the Northumberland Household Book, by Bishop Percy and Sir H. Nicolas; those of the duke of Norfolk by the Roxburghe Club, in 1844; and that of the duke of Buckingham by the Abbotsford Club.

² For example, in 1380 Thomas of Woodstock agreed to serve the king in Brittany, by indenture; Rot. Parl. iii. 94: in 1381 the names of all their wages the great men reckoned on the ransom of their prisoners, the poorer on the plunder of the battle-field or the foraging raid. As the lords bound themselves by indenture to the king to serve in the field or to act as constables of castles or governors of conquered provinces, so the lower ranks of knights and squires bound themselves to the baronial leaders, took their pay and wore their livery. When John of Gaunt went to Castille he took with him by indenture some of the noblest knights of England. John Neville, the lord of Raby, bound himself to serve him for life at wages of 500 marks a year¹. When duke Richard of York or Edmund of Somerset governed Normandy, the terms of their appointment, service and remuneration, were set out in a like indenture of service. This document sometimes determined also the lord's share in the winnings of his retainers².

Money speculation in war.

When accordingly, in the troubled times of Richard II and Henry VI, the necessities of private defence compelled the great households to revive the practices of private war, the service by indenture and the wearing of livery were familiar methods of enlistment; and the barons, besides their hosts of menial servants, had trains of armed and disciplined followers. If to these we add the council of the duke or earl, the personal or official advisers who attended him when he had anything like public business to manage, the lawyers who held his courts, the clerks who kept his accounts, and the chaplains who sang and celebrated the sacraments in his chapels, we shall see that, who had agreed to serve the king in his wars, with indentures and without indentures, were to be enrolled; ib. p. 118. The haggling about indentures of service during the minority of Henry VI is one of the most curious points brought out in the Ordinances of the Privy Council.

The great retinues of the nobles served in some measure to draw classes together.

¹ Calendar of the Patent Rolls, p. 186; a long list of knights who had entered into the same engagement was used by Sir H. Nicolas in editing the Scrope and Grosvenor Roll.

² See for example the indenture by which John de Thorpe Esquire binds himself for life to serve Ralph Neville, earl of Westmoreland, in peace and war; the earl is to have 'les tierces de guerre gaignez par le dit Johan ou par sez gentz quelx il avera as gages ou coust du dit conte;' if Thorpe takes any captain or man of state, the earl is to have him, 'faisant al pernour resonable regarde pur lui;' Madox, Formulare, p. 97: there are also indentures between the earl of Salisbury and his own sons, touching the lieutenancy of Carlisle, ib. p. 102, and between the earl of Warwick and Robert Warcop, p. 104.

with all its drawbacks and disadvantages, its dangerous privileges and odious immunities, the position of a powerful baron was one which enabled him to draw classes of society together in a way which must be regarded as beneficial for the time. His house was a school for the sons of neighbouring knights and squires, a school of knightly accomplishment and of all the culture of the age. By the strictest bonds of friendship and interest he could gather his neighbours about him. His bountiful kitchen and magnificent wardrobe establishment linked him to the trademen and agriculturists of the towns and villages round him. His progresses from castle to castle, and his visits to the court, taught his servants to know the country and spread public intelligence, whilst it made men of distant counties acquainted with one another. It was thus doubtless that men like Warwick maintained their hold on the country; thus duke Richard of Gloucester was able to cultivate popularity in the north; and thus in some degree the barons were qualified to act, as they acted so long, the part of guides and champions of the commons. For good or for evil, it linked together the classes which possessed political weight. The Speaker of the house of commons was not unfrequently a bound officer of some great lord whose influence guided or divided the peers. In 1376 Peter de la Mare was steward of the earl of March¹, Thomas Hungerford was steward of the duke of Lancaster²; they were the Speakers in two strongly contrasted parliaments. Such was the relation of Sir William Oldhall to duke Richard of York in 1450; he had been his chamberlain in Normandy, and was still one of his council³.

Questionable benefit of baronial leadership.

475. It is obvious that such a state of things can be beneficial only in certain stages of political growth; and that it has a tendency to retain dangerous strength long after the period of its beneficial operation is over. Whilst the liberties of England were in danger from the crown, whilst the barons were full of patriotic spirit, more cultivated and enlightened than the men around them, whilst they were qualified for the post of leaders, and conscious of the dignity and responsibility of leading, this linking of class to class around them was productive of good. When the pride of pomp and wealth took the place of political aspirations, personal indulgence, domestic tyranny, obsequious servility, followed as unmitigated and deeply-rooted evils. Of both results the later middle ages furnish examples enough; and yet to the very close the manly and ennobling sense of great responsibilities lights up the history of the baronage. They were not the creatures of a court; they were not the effete and luxurious satellites of kings like those who ruled on the other side of the channel. They were ambitious, covetous, unrelenting, with little conscience and less sympathy; but they were men who recognised their position as shepherds of the people. And they were recognised by the people as their leaders, although the virtue of the recognition was dimmed by servile and mercenary feelings on the one side, and by supercilious contempt on the other. When the hour of their strength was over, the evil leaven of these feelings remained, and, under the new nobility of the Tudor age, became more repulsive than it had been before. The obsequious flattery of wealth, however acquired, and of rank, however won and worn, is a stain on the glories of the Elizabethan age as of later times, and does not become extinct even when it provokes an equally irrational reaction.

¹ See vol. ii. p. 450.

² Vol. ii. p. 458.

³ See above, p. 163.

Real greatness of the medieval baronage

476. Much that has been said of the great temporal barons may be held to apply also to the great prelates in their baronial capacity. The two archbishops maintained households on the same scale as dukes, and the bishops, so far as influence and expenditure were concerned, maintained the state of earls. They had their embattled houses, their wide inclosed parks, and unenclosed chaces; they kept their court with just the same array of officers, servants, counsellors and chaplains; they made their progresses with armed retinues and trains of baggage¹, and took their audits of accounts with equal rigidity.

Episcopal households.

¹ Machin writes of the great bishop Tunstall, when he came up to London to be deprived and to die in 1559: 'The 20th day of July the good old bishop of Durham came riding to London with threescore horse;' Diary, p. 204.

Influence of territorial loyalty.

Personal experience.

Long life.

Hard work.

In one point, that of military service, they exercised less direct authority; but in other respects they possessed more. Besides their religious vantage-ground, they had a stronger hold on inherited loyalty, and possessed longer and higher personal experience. The ecclesiastical estates remained far more permanently in the hands of the prelates than the lay estates in those of the lords. Many of the bishops possessed manors which had been church lands from the time of the heptarchy; few of the lay lords could boast of ancestry that took them back to the Norman Conquest without many changes of rank and tenure. And in personal experience few of the barons could compete with the prelates. The life of a lay lord in the middle ages was, with rare exceptions, short and laborious: the life of a great prelate, laborious as it was, was not liable to be shortened by so many risks. Kings seldom lived to be old men; Henry I and Edward I reached the age of sixty-seven; and Elizabeth died in her seventieth year: until George II no king of England lived over seventy. Simon de Montfort, 'Sir Simon the old man,' may have been over sixty when he died; the elder Hugh le Despenser was counted wondrously old, a nonagenarian at sixty-four; the king-maker died a little over fifty. But forty years of rule was not a rare case among the prelates: William of Wykeham, Henry Beaufort, and William Waynflete, all bishops, chancellors, and great politicians, filled the see of Winchester for a hundred and seventeen years in succession; Beaufort was forty-nine years a bishop; Arundel thirty-nine; Bourchier fifty-one; Kemp thirty-four; and all were men of some experience before they became bishops. Like most mediæval workers they all died in harness, transacting business, hearing suits, and signing public documents until the day of their death. Both the early industry of the barons, and the long-protracted labours of the prelates, convey the lesson that life was not easy in the middle ages, except perhaps in the monasteries, where the ascetic practices and manual labour of early days no longer counteracted the enervating influences of stay-at-home lives. They teach us, too, how strange a self-indulgent idle king must have seemed in the eyes of men who were always busy, and how a king who shunned public work must have repelled men who lived and died before the world, whose very houses were courts and camps.

477. The knights and squires of England, on a smaller scale, and with less positive independence, played the same part as the great lords; their household economy was proportionately elaborate; their share in public work, according to their condition, as severe and engrossing. There was much, moreover, in their position and associations that tended to ally them politically with the lords. They had their pride of ancient blood and long-descended unblemished coat-armour; they had had, perhaps, as a rule, longer hereditary tenure of their lands than those higher barons who had played a more hazardous game and won larger stakes. What attendance at court, the chances of royal favour, high office, the prizes of war, were to the great lord, the dignities of sheriff, justice, knight of the shire, commissioner of array, were to the country gentleman. He was in some points equal to the nobleman; in blood, knightly accomplishment, and educational culture, there was little difference, and need be none; the gentleman was brought up in the house of the nobleman, but with no degrading sense of inferiority, and with a thorough acquaintance with his character and ways. He might have constituted, and perhaps in many instances did constitute, an invaluable link of union betwixt the baron and the yeoman.

In this class of gentry, including in that wide term all who possessed a gentle extraction, the 'generosi,' 'men of family, of worship, and coat-armour,' are comprised both the knight, whether banneret or bachelor, and the squire. The attempts of the successive kings to enforce upon all who held land to the value of a knight's fee the obligation of becoming belted knights seem to have signally failed; the fines and licences by which men of knightly estate were allowed to dispense with the ceremony of the accolade were more profitable to the crown than any services which could be exacted from an unwilling class; and few became knights who were not desirous of

The body of knights and squires.

Reluctance of the smaller landowners to become knights.

following the profession of arms. Hence the difficulty of enforcing the election of belted knights as representatives of the shires¹. It is not easy to account for this prevalent dislike to undertake the degree of chivalry, unless it arose from a desire to avoid the burden of some public duties that belonged to the knights. Exemption from the work of juries and assizes was coveted under Henry III²; the reluctance to take up knight-hood was increased by the somewhat exorbitant demands for military service which were made by Edward I and Edward II for the Scottish wars: all who possessed the knightly estate were summoned for such service, and, even if they served for wages, their wages we may suspect were not very regularly paid. The fines and licences were in use before the Scottish wars began, but the diminution in the knightly rank, which embarrassed county business even in the reign of Henry III, had increased very largely under Edward III. After the middle of the fourteenth century, and the development of courtly chivalry, the rank of knight recovered much of its earlier character and became again a military rank. But the class of squires had then for all practical purposes attained equality with that of knights, and all the functions which had once belonged exclusively to the knights were discharged by the squires. A large and constantly increasing proportion of knights of the shire were 'armigeri,' and the Speaker as often as not was of the same order. There were, notwithstanding this, many families in which the head was always a knight, and in which the title signified rank as well as the profession of arms. Such, for instance, were the families sprung from the old minor barons, who had under Edward I been summoned by special writ to military service but not to parliament, and in which the assumption of the knightly title was really the

Revival of the military spirit of knighthood.

Growth of the class of squires.

¹ See above, p. 412.

² This was the ground of the complaint made by the barons against Henry III in the parliament of 1258: 'Quod dominus rex large facit militibus de regno suo acquietantiam ne in assisis ponantur, juramentis vel recognitionibus;' Ann. Burton, p. 443; Select Charters, p. 386. Of course it was easier and cheaper to avoid taking knighthood than to purchase such an immunity.

continued claim to rank with the magnates of the county : the great legal families also maintained the same usage ¹.

So wide a class contained, of course, families that had reached their permanent position by different roads. Some were the representatives of old land-owning families, probably of pure English origin, which had never been dispossessed, which owned but one manor, and restricted themselves to local work. Others had risen, by the protection of the barons or by fortunate marriages, from this class, or from the service of the great lords or of the king himself, and, without being very wealthy, possessed estates in more than one county, and went occasionally to court. A third class would consist of those who have just been mentioned as being of semi-baronial rank. The two latter classes in all cases, and the first in later times, would have heraldic honours. From the second came generally the men who undertook the offices of sheriff and justice. All three occasionally contributed to the parliament knights of the shire : the humbler lords of manors being forced to serve when the office was more burdensome than honourable, the second class being put forward when political quarrels were increasing the importance of the office, and the highest class undertaking the work only when political considerations became supreme.

Classes of knights and squires.

An examination of the lists of sheriffs and knights leads to this general conclusion, although there are of course exceptions. The earlier parliaments of Edward I are largely composed of the highest class of knights, but that soon ceases to be the rule ; and from the beginning of the fourteenth century the parliaments are filled with men of pure English names, small local proprietors, whose pedigrees have more charm for the antiquary than for the historian ². Towards the middle of the fourteenth Illustrations from the lists of knights of the shire.

¹ The absence of the knightly title is marked especially in the case of Thomas Chaucer, who although closely connected with the baronage, and even with the royal house, and a very rich man, continued to be an esquire.

² I must give a general reference for these particulars to Prynne's Writs, Reg. ii, iii, and iv, Palgrave's Parliamentary Writs, and the Return made to the House of Commons, since the first edition of this work was published, of the names of members returned to parliament from the earliest times ; ordered to be printed March 1, 1878. Copies of the Indentures of century come in the better-known names of families which have risen on the support of the dynastic factions; quite at the close of the middle ages are found the men of the baronage¹. A single example will suffice: In Yorkshire the first stage is marked by the election of a Balliol and a Percy, Fitz-Randolf, S. Quentin, Hotham, Ughtred and Boynton; the second by names like Barton, Thornton, Clothesholm, Bolton, Malton, with a sprinkling of Nevilles and Fairfaxes; the third, beginning half way in the reign of Edward III, includes Scrope, Pigot, Neville, Hastings, Savile, Bigod, Grey and Strangways. In Yorkshire the knightly element continued strong enough to hold the representation until modern times; the Saviles, Fairfaxes, Constables and Wentworths, succeeded one another generation after generation, and before the sixteenth century closed these families had won a place of equality with the titular nobility.

From the lists of sheriffs.

The same conclusion may be drawn from the lists of sheriffs; and, in fact, from the time at which the annual appointment of new sheriffs was forced upon the crown, the two lists are of very much the same complexion. The act of 23 Henry VI, in 1445, requiring the election of 'notable squires, gentlemen of birth, competent to become knights,' attests the high importance which the ruling class was setting on the county representation; but as a matter of fact it did not change the character of the elected knights. It is in the second class of the gentry that we find the more notable cases of a rise to nobility through long political labours: a Bouchier is chancellor to Edward III; his descendant becomes a viscount under Henry VI, partly by prowess, mainly by a lucky marriage: a Hungerford is speaker in 1377; his house becomes ennobled in 1426; but the promotion to the rank of baronage is very slow; and most of the families which have furnished sheriffs and county members in the middle ages have to wait for baronies

Rise of the knightly class to nobility.

return are still a desideratum. The lists of sheriffs are still to be found only in the several county histories, or in Fuller's Worthies.

¹ The first recorded precedent for the heir-apparent of a peerage sitting in the house of commons, is that of Sir Francis Russell, son of the earl of Bedford, in 1549; Hatsell, Precedents, ii. 18.

and earldoms until the reigns of the Tudors and Stewarts, to whom they furnish the best and soundest part of the new nobility.

478. The household of the country gentleman was modelled on that of his great neighbour; the number of servants and dependents would seem out of proportion to modern wants; but the servants were in very many cases poor relations; the wages were small, food cheap and good; and the aspiring cadet of an old gentle family might by education and accomplishment rise into the service of a baron who could take him to court and make his fortune¹. In the cultivation of his own estate the lord of the single manor found employment and amusement; his work in the county court, in the musters and arrays, recurred at fixed times and year by year; he prayed and was buried in his parish church; he went up once in his life perhaps to London to look after the legal business which seems to have been a requisite of life for great and small. His neighbour, somewhat richer, had a larger household, a chaplain, and a steward to keep his courts; he himself acted as sheriff or knight of the shire, and was often a belted knight; if he were fortunate in the field he might be a banneret; he built himself a chapel to his manor-house or founded a chantry in his parish church: he looked out for a great marriage for his sons, and portioned off his daughters into nunneries; he mingled some-

Household of a country gentleman.

Life of the richer gentleman.

¹ The estimate of the outlay of the knight and squire, in the Black Book of Edward IV, shows how largely both were expected to live on home-grown produce. In the knight's house are drunk twelve gallons of beer a day, and a pipe of wine in the year; fourteen oxen are allowed for beef, sixty sheep for mutton, and sixteen pigs for bacon: these are bought. Out of the home stock are required twenty pigs, thirteen calves, sixty piglings, and twenty lambs, besides twelve head of deer, taken by my lord's dogs, which cost more than they bring in. Geese, swans, capons, pullets, herons, partridges, peacocks, cranes, and smaller fowls, either kept at home or taken in hawking, and a hundred rabbits, are required; Ordinances of the Household, p. 34. The squire's household is more thrifty: for every day are required eighteen loaves of household bread, eight gallons of mean ale, cyder without price; fivepence a day is allowed for beef, twopence for mutton, sixpence for an immense variety of things produced at home; bacon, veal, venison, lamb, poultry, eggs, milk, cheese, vegetables, wood, coal, candles, salt, and oatmeal. In all twentypence a day. Fish-days must have come very often, by 'help of rivers and ponds, &c.; Item to make verjuice themselves, &c.:' p. 46. See more particulars below, p. 572.

The greater knights.

what of the adventurer with the country magnate, and, although he did not crenellate his houses or inclose large parks, he lived on terms of modest equality with those who did; he could act as steward to the neighbouring earl, whose politics he supported, and by whose help he meant to rise. Above him, yet still in rank below the peerage, was the great country lord who, in all but attendance in parliament, was a baron; the lord of many manors and castles, the courtier, and the warrior. There was no insuperable barrier between these grades; and there were many influences that might lead them to combine.

The political attitude of the knights of the shire.

479. It may be asked to what cause we are to attribute the attitude of opposition in which, during the more bitter political contests, we find the knights of the shire in parliament standing with respect to the lords, the church and the crown, if the gradations of class were so slight and the links of interest so strong. The reply to the question must be worked out of the history through which we have made our way¹. It is too much to say that the knights as a body stood in opposition or hostility to the crown, church and lords; it is true to say that, when there was such opposition in the country or in the parliament, it found its support and expression chiefly in this body. It must be remembered that the baronage was never a united phalanx. Throughout the really important history of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries it was divided from head to foot by the hereditary political divisions in which the house of Lancaster was set against the crown, or the dynastic opposition against the Lancastrian king. When the nation was with the constitutional baronage against the court, the knights of the shire were strong in supporting, and were supported by, the constitutional baronage: but the court was strong too, and a little dealing with the sheriffs could change the colour of the parliament from year to year. The independent knights were a majority in the parliament of 1376; they were reduced to a dozen in that of 1377. There were subservient as well as independent parliaments; the subservient parliaments make little figure in history, but their members were drawn from the same class, perhaps the same families, as the independent parliaments. County politics, as we know so well from the Paston Letters, were not less troubled and not less equally balanced than were the national factions; and many of the local rivalries that originated in the fourteenth century waxed stronger as they grew older, until the competitors were matched against one another in the great war of the Rebellion. It is true then that what was done in parliament for the vindication of national liberties was mainly the work of the knights, but it is not true that their policy was an independent or class policy, or that their influence was always on the right side.

Attitude of the commons liable to change from year to year.

¹ The first trace of this is seen in the Good Parliament of 1376: 'Magna controversia inter dominos et communes;' Mon. Evesham, p. 44. The same writer in 1400 represents the 'plebeii' clamouring for the execution of the degraded lords, but resisted by the king; p. 165.

In one remarkable struggle, that of the Wycliffite party for the humiliation of the clergy, this conclusion should be carefully weighed. There was no point in which the proposals of a distinct policy were more pertinaciously put forward than that of the confiscation of the temporalities of the clergy: so at least we are told by the historians, and the same may be gathered from the controversial theology of the time. It cannot be doubted that session after session the project was broached; yet it never once reached the stage at which it would become the subject-matter of a common petition of the house; that is, it never once passed the house of commons or was carried up to the lords. It is easy to judge how it would have fared in the upper house, where the lords spiritual formed a numerical majority; but it never was presented to them. Nor ought it to be argued that, because it never appears on the Rolls of Parliament, it was excluded by ecclesiastical trickery: a house of commons such as that of which Arnold Savage was the spokesman, a body of justices of whom Gascoigne was the chief, could not have endured dishonest ecclesiastical manipulation of their records; such interference on the king's part was one of the points which contributed to the fall of Richard II. Arundel might persuade the king to decline a speaker like Cheyne, but he could not have falsified or mutilated a record of the house of commons. The conclusion is simply that the Wycliffite

Illustration
from the history of the Wycliffites.

knights were a pertinacious minority, never really strong enough to carry their measure through its first stages.

Importance of the yeoman class.

480. Next after the gentry, in respect of that political weight which depends on the ownership of land, was ranked the great body of freeholders, the yeomanry of the middle ages, a body which, in antiquity of possession and purity of extraction, was probably superior to the classes that looked down upon it as ignoble. It was from the younger brothers of the yeoman families that the households of the great lords were recruited: they furnished men-at-arms, archers and hobelers, to the royal force at home and abroad, and, settling down as tradesmen in the cities, formed one of the links that bound the urban to the rural population.

Permanent usages in the lower ranks of life.

As we descend in the scale of social rank the differences between mediæval and modern life rapidly diminish; the habits of a modern nobleman differ from those of his fifteenth-century ancestor far more widely than those of the peasantry of to-day from those of the middle ages, even when the increase of comfort and culture has been fairly equal throughout. But to counter-balance this tendency to permanence in the lower ranks of society, comes in the ever-varying influence arising from the changes of ownership; the classes of nobility, gentry and yeomanry, having their common factor in the possession of land, expand and contract their limits from age to age. When personal extravagance is the rule at court, the noble class, and the gentry in its wake, gradually lose their hold on the land; great estates are broken up; the rich merchant takes the place of the old noble, the city tradesman buys the manor of the impoverished squire; and in the next generation the merchant has become a squire, the tradesman has become a freeholder; both, by acquiring land, have returned to strengthen the class from which they sprang. On the other hand, when the greed for territorial acquisition is strong in the higher class, the yeoman has little chance against his lordly neighbour: if he is not overwhelmed with legal procedure, ordered to show title for lands which his fathers have owned before title-deeds were invented, driven or enticed into debt, or simply uprooted with

Change in the balance of landown-ing classes.

Transmu-tation of classes.

the strong hand, he is always liable to be bought out by the baron who takes advantage of his simplicity and offers him ready money. So in many cases the freeholder sinks into the tenant farmer, and the new nobles make up their great estates.

This rule of expansion and contraction was in the middle ages somewhat restricted in its operation by the difficulty of alienating land: but the ingenuity of lawyers seldom failed to overcome that difficulty when might or money was concerned in the overruling of it. As the freeholding class possessed in itself greater elements of permanence than either the nobility or the gentry, was less dependent on personal accomplishments, and less liable to be affected by the storms of political life, the balance of strength turned in the long run in favour of the yeomanry. There are traces amply sufficient to prove their importance from the reign of Henry II onwards, but the recognition of their political right grows more distinct as the middle ages advance; and the election act of 1430, whatever its other characteristics may have been, establishes the point that the freeholders possessing land to the annual value of forty shillings were the true constituents of the 'communitas comitatus,' the men who elected the knights of the shire. They were the men who served on juries, who chose the coroner and the verderer, who attended the markets and the three-weeks court of the sheriff, who constituted the manorial courts, and who assembled, with the arms for which they were responsible, in the muster of the forces of the shire.

Check arising from the restraints on the alienation of land.

Freeholders recognised as the electoral body in the counties.

After the economical changes which marked the early years of the fifteenth century, the yeoman class was strengthened by the addition of the body of tenant farmers, whose interests were very much the same as those of the smaller freeholders, and who shared with them the common name of yeoman. These tenant farmers, succeeding to the work of the local bailiffs who had farmed the land of the lords and of the monasteries in the interest of their masters, were of course less absolutely dependent on the will of the landlord than their predecessors had been on the will of the master: they had their own capital, such as it was, and, when their rent was paid, were account-

Growth of the class of tenant farmers.

Their advantages and disabilities.

Gradations in the yeoman class.

able to no one. They were also free from many of the burdens in the shape of legal obligation to which the freeholder was liable, and, whatever may have been their position before the statute of 1430, they were, unless they also possessed a freehold, excluded by that act from the county franchise. They contributed however to the taxes in very much the same proportion¹, being assessed 'in bonis' whilst the freeholder was assessed 'in terris'; their rank and comforts were the same. Their personal weight and influence depended, as always, rather on the amount of cattle and extent of holding, than on the exact nature of the tenure. Under the older system the pampered bailiff could safely look down on the poor freeholder; under the newer the wealthy tenant was far more independent than the man whose all was in the few fields to which he was as much bound by his necessities as was the legal villein by the condition of birth and tenure. But it would be a mistake to argue as if all the freeholders were owners of forty-shilling freeholds, and all the tenant farmers were rich men. The gradations of wealth and poverty were the same throughout; the political franchise linked the poor freeholder on to the gentry and nobility; community of habits and a common liability to suffer by the caprices of the seasons, good and bad harvests

¹ This distinction became very important after the adoption of the later form of 'subsidy' in taxation, a measure which does not fall within our period, but deserves some notice here as a sequel to our inquiries into the earlier taxes. The custom of granting a round sum had already appeared in the reign of Edward IV, in 1474; see above, p. 220; and particular methods of levying the money were devised in such cases. Under Henry VIII the sums were much increased; the grant in 1514 was £160,000, which was raised on an elaborately graduated calculation of lands, goods, and rents. Under queen Mary the name of subsidy, like that of tenths and fifteenths, acquired a technical sense, and meant a tax raised by the payment of 4s. in the pound for lands, and 2s. 8d. for goods; aliens paying double. Each of these brought in a sum of about £70,000; and the clerical subsidy £20,000 more. The taxes were then granted in the form of one subsidy and one or two tenths and fifteenths; the latter being likewise fixed sums of about £29,000; in the 31st of Elizabeth, the parliament voted an unparalleled grant, two subsidies and four tenths and fifteenths; Coke, 4th Inst. p. 33. How these sums were locally raised we learn from the Subsidy Rolls, some of which have been printed by the Yorkshire and other Archaeological Societies; and especially from Best's Farming Book (Surtees Society), pp. 86, 87-89, where will be found some invaluable hints for the history of local administration.

and the like, linked him on to the villain class. The tenant farmer was not so linked to the gentry, and was not so tied to the land. In other respects the two classes were companions and equals.

481. The Black Book of Edward IV, describing the domestic economy of the squire who can spend fifty pounds a year, may be compared with Hugh Latimer's often-quoted account of his father's yeoman household. Of his £50 the squire spends in victuals £24 6s.; on repairs and furniture £5; on horses, hay and carriages £4; on clothes, alms and oblations £4 more. He has a clerk or chaplain¹, two valletti or yeomen, two grooms, 'garciones,' and two boys, whether pages or mere servants; and the wages of these amount to £9; he gives livery of dress to the amount of £2 10s., and the small remainder is spent on his hounds and the charges of hay-time and harvest².

Economy of the squire's household.

Hugh Latimer's father was not a freeholder, but farmed land at a rent of from £3 to £4; from which he 'tilled so much as kept half a dozen men.' His wife milked thirty kine; he had walk for a hundred sheep. He was able and did find the king a harness with himself and his horse, until he came to the place of muster where he began to receive the king's wages: this of course was a rare piece of occasional service. He could give his daughters at their marriage £5 or 20 nobles each. He sent his son to school, and gave alms to the poor: 'and all this he did of the same farm; where he that now [in 1549] hath it payeth £16 by the year or more, and is not able to do anything for his prince or for himself or for his children, or give a cup of drink to the poor³.' The balance of comfort in this comparison is in favour of the yeoman.

Compared with that of the yeoman.

Comparison of squire and yeoman.

The wills and inventories of the well-to-do freeholder and ¹ 'Clericus' at 40s. wages. The ordinary fee of a chaplain which gave him a title for holy orders was fixed by a constitution of archbishop Zouch at a maximum of 6 marks (£4). In 1378 the choice was given between 8 marks and 4 marks with victuals; see above, vol. ii. p. 465; Johnson, Canons, ii. 405.

² Ordinances of the Household, p. 46.

³ First sermon before King Edward, cited in the Preface to the Northumberland Household Book, p. xii.

Comparative comfort of the yeoman class.

farmer furnish similar evidence of competency¹; and these are an irrefragable answer to the popular theories of the misery and discomfort of medieval middle-class life: all the necessities of living were abundant and cheap, although the markets were more precarious owing to there being no foreign supplies to make up for bad harvests, and the necessary use of salted provisions, during great part of the year, was an unwholesome burden which fell heavily on this class; the supply of labour was fairly proportioned to the demand; the life of the country was almost entirely free from the evils that in modern times have resulted from the overgrowth or unequal distribution of population. The house of the freeholder was substantially but simply furnished, his stores of clothes and linen were ample, he had money in his purse and credit at the shop and at the market. He was able in his will to leave a legacy to his parish church or to the parish roads, and to remember all his servants and friends with a piece of money or an article of clothing. The inventory of his furniture, which was enrolled with his will, enables the antiquary to reproduce a fair picture of every room in the house: there were often comforts and even luxuries, although not such as those of later days; but there was generally abundance. It is of course to be remembered that only the fairly well-to-do yeoman would think it worth while to make a will; but also it was only the fairly well-to-do yeoman who could contribute to the political weight of his class.

The 'valetti' or yeomen.

482. If the 'vadlettus' of the reign of Edward II distinctly answered to the 'vadlettus' of 1445, we should have in him a certain link between the 'liberi homines' and 'libere tenentes' of Henry II and the yeoman of the fifteenth century. In 1311 Rutland returned two 'homines' to parliament because there were no knights, and in 1322 several counties returned 'valetti' in the same capacity²: this was doubtless done on

Return of valetti to parliament.

¹ No evidences on social matters are half so convincing as wills and inventories; and fortunately large selections of medieval wills are now in print or accessible: eight volumes of Yorkshire and Durham wills have been issued by the Surtees Society.

² See above, p. 411.

the principle according to which Henry II allowed 'legales homines,' in default of knights, to act as recognitors. But it would seem more probable that the class which furnished the 'valletti' of 1322 was that of the squires, and that they themselves would have been a few years later called 'armigeri.' On the other hand, the 'valletti' of 1445, whom the sheriffs are forbidden to return as knights, are certainly yeomen. The statute enumerates the classes who may be chosen, notable knights, or notable squires,—gentlemen of birth,—and excludes those who are 'en la degree de vadlet et desouth'.¹ But, as has been already stated, very little can be inferred from this act; for although it is distinctly aimed at the exclusion of persons of inferior rank from the body of knights of the shire, it does not appear to have caused any change in the character of the persons returned. In every county the same family names recur before and after the passing of the act, and it can only be conjectured that the statutory change was called for by the occurrence of some particular scandal the details of which have been forgotten. As it stands, however, it proves that the position of a knight of the shire was not further removed from the ambition of a well-to-do yeoman, than it is from that of the tenant farmer or gentleman farmer of the present day. The precedent of 1322, if it applies at all, is weakened by the fact that there was a strong reluctance in the knights to undertake the task of representation, and a consequent anxiety on the part of the sheriff to return any one who was willing to attend.

Valetti are yeomen in 1445.

The act of 23 Hen. VI did not materially affect the representation.

483. It is not then in the point of eligibility to serve in parliament, but in the collective weight given by the right of franchise, that we must look for the real political influence which the yeomanry exercised. What was the exact state of affairs which the forty-shilling franchise was intended to remedy, can only be conjectured, for, plain as the words of the statute seem, they are met by what seems equally conclusive evidence in the lists of the knights returned. By the existing law the elections were to be made by all who were Political influence of the yeomanry.

The statute on the franchise intended to secure order, not to alter the balance of representation.

¹ See above, p. 415.

Illustrations
from the returns to parliament.

present at the county court; according to the popular interpretation of that law, as the statute informs us, they were made by persons of little substance and no value¹, that is, by the medley multitude that held up their hands for or against the nominees of the hustings. It is a natural inference from the changes which had been going on since 1381, to suppose that the self-enfranchised villeins may have formed a formidable part of these assemblies; or that the Wycliffite or socialist mobs that rose under Jack Sharp, in 1431², attempted in certain cases to turn the election in favour of unworthy candidates. But these are mere conjectures. It happens fortunately that the returns of both 1429 and 1431 are extant; and a careful scrutiny of the lists of the two parliaments will show that there is no difference whatever in the character and position of the knights elected. In both parliaments they are almost exclusively members of families which furnished knights to both preceding and succeeding parliaments, and out of whose number the sheriffs were selected. The alteration of the franchise made no change in this; and the necessary inference from the fact is that the words of the statute, describing the character of the elective assemblies with a view to their reform, must not receive a wider interpretation than literally belongs to them; the county courts were disorderly, but it does not follow that unfit persons were elected, or that any great constitutional change was contemplated.

Less clear in the later acts.

Into the status of the forty-shillings freeholder it is impossible to inquire with complete certainty; that sum was the qualification of a juror and was probably for that reason adopted as the qualification of an elector. But on any showing, if £50 was the annual expenditure of a small country squire, an act which lodged the franchise in the hands of the forty-shillings freeholder cannot be regarded as an oligarchic restriction. The later effects of the change in the law cannot have been within the contemplation of its authors.

With the more distinct evidence of the act and writs of 1445 and 1447 it is less easy to deal, for the returns of previous years are incomplete, and it must be allowed that unfit persons had probably made their appearance as knights of the shire. General inference on the subject. But the act of 1445 did not alter the franchise, it merely attempted the more complete regulation of the elective assemblies, and the exclusion of members who were below the customary rank; in this point following the precedents of the earlier reigns. These considerations then do not much qualify our general conclusion that both before and after the act of 1430 the franchise was in the hands of the substantial freeholders, and that both before and after 1445 the representation of the counties was practically engrossed by the gentry; the election of a yeoman as knight of the shire was not impossible or improbable, but no proof of such election having been made is now forthcoming. It may be remarked by the way that in 1445 political feeling was already rising, and that in 1447 it had risen to a dangerous height. Duke Humfrey, whose overthrow was contemplated in the parliament of the latter year, was, however undeservedly, a favourite with the commons, and it would not have been a strange weapon in the hands of political agents to term the leaders of the opposing party yeomen, ignoble, neither knights nor gentlemen.

¹ See above, p. 426.

² See above, p. 115.

484. From the condition of the commons of the shires we turn to a much more intricate subject, the condition of the commons of the boroughs, and the questions touching town constitutions generally, which have arisen since we left them in an earlier chapter, just achieving municipal independence. The difficulty of this investigation consists in the fact that whilst certain general tendencies can be traced throughout the whole of the borough history, the details of their working vary so widely, and the results are so divergent. It is possible to detect a certain development, now towards liberty, now towards restriction, and to account for local struggles as resulting in definite steps one way or the other; but it is not easy to combine the particulars into a whole, or to formulate any law of municipal progress. Condition of the commons in the boroughs. It is possible that, had there been any such law, or had there been more decided concert between the several boroughs, the influence of the Absence of any law of progress.

Insignificance of town members in parliament.

town members in the house of commons would have been more distinctly apparent. Throughout the middle ages it scarcely can be detected at all except in two or three very narrow points; a tendency to precision in mercantile legislation, a somewhat illiberal policy towards the inhabitants of towns who were not privileged members of the town communities¹, and an anxiety to secure local improvements; the only important act attributed to any borough member is that for which the member for Bristol, Thomas Yonge, was imprisoned, the proposal, in 1450, to declare the duke of York heir to the crown; and the only distinct act of the borough members as a body is the grant of tunnage and poundage, at the request of the Black Prince.

General estimate of municipal change during the period.

The two limits of municipal change, between the reign of Henry III and that of Henry VII, may be simply stated. In 1216 the most advanced among the English towns had succeeded in obtaining, by their respective charters and with local differences, the right of holding and taking the profits of their own courts under their elected officers², the exclusion of the sheriff from judicial work within their boundaries, the right of collecting and compounding for their own payments to the crown, the right of electing their own bailiffs and in some instances of electing a mayor; and the recognition of their merchant guilds by charter, and of their craft guilds by charter or fine. The combination of the several elements thus denoted was not complete; the existence of bailiffs implies the existence of a court leet and court baron or court customary of the whole body of townsmen; the existence of the merchant guild implies an amount of voluntary or privileged association, which in idea, whatever may have been the case in fact, is in contrast with the universality and equality of the courts leet; the relations of the craft guilds to the merchant guild are by no means definite; and the character of a communa, which is symbolised by the title of the mayor, is not clearly reconcilable either with the continued existence of the ancient courts, or with the restrictive character of the merchant guild. Such in very general terms is the condition of affairs at the starting-point. At the close of the period the typical constitution of a town is a close corporation of mayor, aldermen and council, with precisely defined numbers and organization, not indeed uniform but of the same general conformation; possessing a new character denoted by the name of corporation in its definite legal sense; with powers varying in the different communities which have been modified by the change, and in practice susceptible of wide variations. Between these two limits lies a good deal of local history which it is scarcely possible even briefly to summarise.

¹ See vol. ii. pp. 485, 509.

² In many of the towns which are called 'hundreds' in Domesday, and doubtless in others, the right of holding their own courts was already established (vol. i. pp. 101, 443). In other cases, as at Dunwich, 'sac and soc' were given by charter (Select Charters, p. 311). In towns like Beverley, which were under a great lord, the jurisdiction remained with him, and the courts were held by his officers, the merchant guild confining itself to the management of trade and local improvements. For the completion of municipal judicature, it would appear that these three points were necessary, the holding of the courts, the reception of the fines, and the election of the bailiffs or mayor.

Condition of towns at the close of the period.

485. The most important preliminary points to be determined are these: the first, at what date does the chief magistracy pass from the old bailiffs or praepositi to a mayor, whose position gives to the town constitution a unity which is not apparent before; the second, what is the precise relation of the merchant guild to the craft guild on the one side and to the municipal government on the other; and thirdly, how were those bodies finally created and constituted to which charters of incorporation were granted.

Points to be examined.

The first historical appearance of the office of mayor is in London¹, where the recognition of the communa by the national council in 1191 is immediately followed by the mention of Henry Fitz-Alwyn as mayor: he retained the office for life, and in 1215, three years after his death, John granted to the citizens, or recognised, the right of electing their mayor annually². In the year 1200, twenty-five citizens had been

Office of mayor.

¹ In the lists of mayors of other places, e.g. Oxford and York, there are names much earlier than 1191, but no reliance can be placed upon the lists, and, if the persons designated really bore the name, it must be regarded as an imitation of continental usage which has no further constitutional significance.

² Select Charters, p. 314; Rot. Chart. p. 207.

Institution of aldermen.

Aldermen and wards.

chosen and sworn to assist the mayor in the care of the city¹; if these twenty-five jurats are in this respect the predecessors of the twenty-five aldermen of the wards, the year 1200 may be regarded as the date at which the communal constitution of London was completed. The more ancient designation of barons, with 'sac and soc' in the several franchises, would gradually disappear. The title of alderman had been applied in the reign of Henry II to the head of a craft guild²; early in the reign of Henry III the twenty-five wards appear; and, as the name 'Aldermaneria' seems to be used exchangeably with 'Warda,' thus much of the municipality was already in existence. Before the end of John's reign, York, Winchester and Lynn, and many other towns, had their mayors; possibly by special grants or fines in each case, but more probably by a liberal interpretation of the clause inserted in their charters, by which they were entitled to the same liberties as London. In those towns in which there was no mayor the presidency of the local courts remained with the bailiffs, whether elected by the townsmen or nominated by the lord of the town. The development however of the idea of municipal completeness as represented by a mayor and aldermen may be placed at the very beginning of the thirteenth century³.

¹ 'Hoc anno fuerunt xxv electi de discretioribus civitatis et jurati pro consulendo civitatem una cum majore;' Lib. de Antt. Legg. p. 2. There are now twenty-six wards, two of them sub-divisions of older wards. One, 'Cordwainer,' retains the name of a guild; Castle Baynard that of a magnate, Portsoken that of the ancient jurisdiction of the Cnihtengild and Portreeve. All the rest are local divisions. Faringdon Without was created in 1394; Rot. Parl. iii. 317. In 1229 the Aldermanni acted with the 'magnates civitatis' in framing a law; Lib. de Antt. Legg. p. 6. These must have been the aldermen of the wards, the magnates being the lords of franchises, such as the lord of Castle Baynard, and the ecclesiastical dignitaries who joined in the government of the city, such as the Prior of Trinity Aldgate.

² See Madox, Hist. Exch. p. 490. Of the wards there mentioned all are designated by the name of the alderman of the time except the 'Warda Fori,' or Cheap, Portsoken, and Bassishaw: Michael de S. Elena was probably the alderman of Bishopsgate ward. Under Edward II the wards had all acquired the names which they still bear; ib. p. 694; Firma Burgi, p. 30. In a list of aldermen of adulterine guilds in 1180, three appear as aldermen of the Gilda de Ponte.

³ The following towns are mentioned, in the Rolls of John, as having mayors: Bristol, York, Ipswich, London, Lynn, Northampton, Norwich, Oxford, and Winchester.

The history of the merchant guild, in its relation to the craft guild on the one hand, and to the municipal government on the other, is very complex. In its main features it is a most important illustration of the principle which constantly forces itself forward in mediæval history, that the vindication of class privileges is one of the most effective ways of securing public liberty, so long as public liberty is endangered by the general pressure of tyranny. At one time the church stands alone in her opposition to despotism, with her free instincts roused by the determination to secure the privilege of her ministers; at another the mercantile class purchase for themselves rights and immunities which keep before the eyes of the less highly favoured the possibility of gaining similar privileges. In both cases it is to some extent an acquisition of exclusive privilege, an assertion of a right which, if the surrounding classes were already free, would look like usurpation, but which, when they are downtrodden, gives a glimpse and is itself an instalment of liberty. But when the general liberty, towards which the class privilege was an important step, has been fully obtained, it is not unnatural that the classes which led the way to that liberty should endeavour to retain all honours and privileges which they can retain without harm to the public welfare. But the original quality of exclusiveness which defined the circle for which privilege was claimed still exists; still it is an immunity, a privilege in its strict meaning, and as such it involves an exception in its own favour to the general rules of the liberty now acquired by the community around it; and if this is so, it may exercise a power as great for harm as it was at first for good. Such is one of the laws of the history of all privileged corporations; fortunately it is not the only law, and its working is not the whole of their history. It applies however directly to the guild system.

Relations of the guilds.

Importance of the struggle for class privilege

The great institution of the 'gilda mercatoria'¹ runs back, as we have seen, to the Norman Conquest and far beyond it; the

Antiquity of the guilds.

¹ On the Merchant Guild the most recent speculations and conclusions are to be found in Dr. Charles Gross's The Gild Merchant, Oxford, 1891; Pollock and Maitland, Hist. of English Law, i. 648 sq.

Relation of the gilda mercatoria to the craft guilds

craft guilds, the 'gilda telariorum,' the 'gilda corvesariorum' and the like, are scarcely less ancient in origin, but come prominently forward in the middle of the twelfth century. The 'gilda mercatoria' may be regarded as standing to the craft guilds either inclusively or exclusively; it might incorporate them and attempt to regulate them, or it might regard them with jealousy, and attempt to suppress them. Probably in different places and at different stages it did both. It would be generally true to say that, when and where the merchant guild continued to exist apart from the judicial machinery of the town, as a board for local trade and financial administration, it incorporated and managed the craft guilds; but, when and where it merged its existence in the governing body of the town, identifying itself with the corporation and only retaining a formal existence as the machinery for admitting freemen to a participation of the privileges of the town, it became an object with the craft guilds to assert their own independence and even to wrest from the governing body judicial authority over their own members.

Power of the merchant guild to regulate trade.

The charter granted by Henry II to Oxford distinctly lays down the principle that the merchant guild has an exclusive right of regulating trade except in specified cases¹; it is provided that no one who is not of the guildhall shall exercise any merchandise in the town or suburbs, except as was customary in the reign of Henry I, when, as we know from the Pipe Rolls, the craft guilds of weavers and cordwainers had purchased their freedom by fines². We may infer from this that, wherever such exceptions had not been purchased, the merchant guild possessed full power of regulating trade. In the charter granted to the city of Worcester by Henry III a similar provision is inserted, and at Worcester as late as 1467 we find the citizens in their 'yeld merchant' making for the craft guilds regulations which imply that they had full authority over them³.

¹ Select Charters (2nd ed.), p. 167; Peshall's Oxford, p. 339. So also the charter granted by Henry III to Worcester; Madox, Firma Burgi, p. 272; and other instances noted above, vol. i. p. 452.

² In the charter of Oxford the exceptions are 'nisi sicut solebat tempore regis Henrici avi mei;' in that of Worcester 'nisi de voluntate eorundem civium.'

³ Smith's English Gilds, pp. 371-412.

When the merchant guild had become identified with the corporation or governing body, its power of regulation of trade passed, together with its other functions and properties, into the same hands. It is probable that this is true in all cases except where the towns continued to be in the demesne of a lord who exercised the jurisdiction through his own officers, as the archbishop of York did at Beverley. In that town the merchant guild administered the property of the town, regulated trade, and exercised most of the functions which the 'local boards' of modern towns now possess; it elected the twelve governours of the town annually; but the courts were held in the archbishop's name and by his bailiffs, down to the reign of Henry VIII¹. But as a rule it was otherwise: the ancient towns in demesne of the crown either possessed a hundredal jurisdiction at the time of the Conquest or obtained 'sac and soc' by grant from the crown²; as soon as they obtained the exclusion of the sheriffs and the right of electing their magistrates, they were municipally complete; and then the merchant guild merged its existence in the corporation. In some cases it dropped altogether out of sight; at York for instance it had either been forgotten, or newly organised as a merchants' company, one among many craft guilds, at the beginning of the fifteenth century³: and at London it is uncertain whether any primitive merchant guild ever existed. But, even where the name was suppressed, the function of admitting freemen was discharged in such a way as proved that the powers exercised by the corporation were those of the old merchant guild. At York the right of freedom was acquired by birth, apprenticeship or purchase: the admission of apprentices was subject to the jurisdiction of eight chamberlains⁴, who were no doubt

The merchant guild merged in the corporation.

Cases in which the merchant guild was not the governing body of the town.

Union of the merchant guild with the leet jurisdiction.

The office of chamberlain.

¹ See Poulson's Beverlac, passim; and below, p. 601.

² As for example Dunwich, Select Charters, p. 311; Worcester, Nash's Worcestershire, vol. ii. App. p. cx; the Cnihtengild of London, Madox, Firma Burgi, p. 23.

³ So also at Beverley there is a Mercers' guild; Poulson, pp. 254, 255; at Coventry a new merchant guild is instituted in 1340; Smith's Gilds, p. 226.

⁴ Drake, Eboracum, pp. 187, 199. One of the earliest customals in which freedom of the town is mentioned is that of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, where it is said 'si burgensis habeat filium in domo suo ad mensam suam, anciently guild officers; and, as all apprenticeship was transacted through the members of the craft guilds, the older relation between the two institutions must be regarded as continuously subsisting. In Leicester the connexion is still more clear; for there the admission to freedom was distinctly designated as admission to the merchant guild¹. At Oxford the freemen were admitted to the guild and liberty of the whole city. In other places, such as Preston in Lancashire, where, owing to some ancient custom or endowment, the idea of the guild had been kept prominently in view as furnishing occasion for a splendid pageant, the name was still more permanent, and the powers of the guild were more distinctly maintained. But in all these cases it may be said that the 'gilda mercatoria' had become a phase or 'function' of the corporation; where there was no ancient merchant guild, or its existence had been forgotten, the admission of freemen to a share in the duties and privileges of burghership was a part of the business of the leet². Whether apart from, or identified with, the governing body of the borough, the relation of the merchant guild to the craft guilds may on this hypothesis be regarded as corresponding with the relation subsisting at Oxford and Cambridge between the University and the Colleges with their members. Lastly, in some places probably, as at Berwick, the several craft guilds having united to form a single town guild, all trade organisation and administration was lodged, by a reverse process, in the governing body of the town³.

Merchant guilds at Leicester and Preston.

Results of the union of the merchant guild with the governing body.

When the merchant guild had acquired jurisdiction or merged its existence in the corporation, the communa or governing body, the guild hall became the common hall of the city, filius ejus eandem habeat libertatem quam et pater suus; Acts of Parl. of Scotland, i. 33, 34.

¹ Nichols, Leicestershire, i. 375, 377, 379 sq. At Beverley the governors admitted the freemen; see Poulson, p. 163. At Winchester, the admission to the merchant guild constituted freedom; persons not taking up their freedom paid 6s. 8d., half to the bailiffs, half to the chamber; Woodward, Hampshire, i. 270 sq.

² As at Huntingdon; Merewether and Stephens, pp. 1714, 2186.

³ Vol. i. p. 453.

and the 'porte mote,' for that seems to be the proper name for the court of the guild, became the judicial assembly of the freemen and identical with the leet; the title of alderman which had once belonged to the heads of the several guilds was transferred to the magistrates of the several wards into which the town was divided, or to the sworn assistants of the mayor in the cases in which no such division was made; the property held by the merchant guild became town property and was secured by the successive charters.

The craft guilds, both before and after the consolidation of the governing bodies, aimed at privileges and immunities of their own, and possessed, each within the limits of its own art, directive and restrictive powers corresponding with those claimed by the merchant guilds. Consequently under Henry II they are found in the condition of illegal associations, certainly in London, and probably, in other towns. The adulterine guilds, from which heavy sums were exacted in 1180, were stigmatised as adulterine because they had not purchased the right of association, as the older legal guilds had done¹, and had set themselves up against the government of the city which the king had recognised by his charter. The later development of the contest must be looked at in connexion with the general view of municipal development. The most important features of the history are still found in London, where the craft guilds, having passed through the stages in which they purchased their privileges year by year with fines, obtained charters from Edward III. The guilds thus chartered became better known as companies, a designation under which they still exist. An act of 1364 having compelled all the artisans to choose and adhere to the company proper to their own craft or mystery, a distinction between greater and smaller companies was immediately developed. The more important companies, which were twelve in number, availed themselves of the licence, reserved to them in the acts against livery, to bestow livery on their members, and were distinguished as the livery companies. Between these and the more numerous but less influential and guilds.

The craft

Restriction on craft guilds.

Growth of the craft guilds into trading companies.

¹ 'Quia constitutae sunt sine waranto;' Madox, Exch. p. 391.

Classes within the trading companies.

The livery-men of London.

Diversity of growth in the different towns.

lesser companies the old struggle for privilege and equality was renewed. And lastly, within the livery companies themselves a distinction was made between the liverymen and the ordinary freemen of the craft, the former being entitled to share in all privileges, and proprietary and municipal rights, in the fullest degree, and the latter having a claim only to the simple freedom of the trade. Unfortunately the details of these two processes are very obscure, and only very wide limits can be fixed as dates between which the great companies engrossed the municipal power, and the more powerful men in each constituted themselves into the body of liverymen, excluding the less wealthy members of the company as mere commonalty or ordinary freemen¹.

The third point, referred to above, the growth of the governing bodies which in the fifteenth and succeeding centuries were incorporated by charter, will be cleared up as we proceed: there is great diversity in the results, and accordingly considerable diversities must be supposed to have coloured the history which produced them; in some towns the new constitution was simply the confirmation of a system rooted in municipal antiquity, in others it was the recognition of the results of a movement towards restriction or towards greater freedom; in all it was more or less the establishment, by royal authority, of usages which had been before established by local authority only, which had grown up diversely because of the loose language in which the early charters of liberties were worded. In the following brief sketch of municipal history it will not be necessary to call attention to the diversities and multiplicities of legal usages, such as the courts of law or their customs. These vary widely in different places, and, although in some parts of the earliest constitutional investigations they illustrate the continuity of ancient legal practice, they lose their interest from the period at which they become a merely subordinate part of the machinery of civic independence. The election of magistrates, and the municipal arrangements by which such elections are determined, are on the other hand matters of permanent constitutional interest, not only in themselves and in their social aspect, but in the light they throw on the political action of the towns. The modes of electing members of parliament varied directly with the municipal usages.

¹ Brentano (in Smith's Gilds, p. cli) describes the state of these bodies in the sixteenth century: 'The gild members were divided into three classes: the livery, to which the richer masters were admitted; the householders, to which the rest of the masters belonged; and the journeymen, yeomanry, bachelors, or simple freemen. From the middle of that century the management of the companies was engrossed by the courts of assistants; Herbert, i. 118.

486. London claims the first place in any such investigation, as the greatest municipality, as the model on which, by their charters of liberties, the other large towns of the country were allowed or charged to adjust their usages, and as the most active, the most political and the most ambitious. London has also a preeminence in municipal history owing to the strength of the conflicting elements which so much affected her constitutional progress.

Importance of the municipal history of London.

The governing body of London in the thirteenth century was composed of the mayor, twenty-five aldermen of the wards, and two sheriffs. All these were elective officers; the mayor was chosen by the aldermen, or by the aldermen and magnates of the city, and required the approval of the crown; the aldermen were chosen by the citizens or commons of their respective wards¹; and the election of the sheriffs, which was a point much disputed, was probably transacted by the mayor and aldermen, with a body of four or six 'probi homines' of each ward. The sheriffs, like the mayor, were presented to the king for his approval. The term for which both mayor and sheriffs were chosen was a year; but the mayor was generally continued in office for several years together until 1319, after which date a change was annually made². The sheriffs, by a by-law passed in 1229, were not allowed to hold office for more than two years together³. In the administration of their

London in the thirteenth century.

¹ A.D. 1248: 'Homines illius wardae accepta licentia eligendi elegerunt . . . Alexandrum le Ferrun . . . qui postea veniens in hustingo . . . admissus est aldermannus;' Liber de Antt. Legg. p. 15.

² See Liber de Antt. Legg. p. 22; Liber Albus, p. 22.

³ 1229: 'Omnes aldermanni et magnates civitatis per assensum universorum civium;' Liber de Antt. Legg. p. 6.

Common
councillors.

wards the aldermen were assisted by a small number of elected councillors who are said to make their appearance first in 1285¹.

Struggles with the crown.

The supremacy of the governing body was constantly endangered from two sides. On the one hand, the kings, especially Henry III and Edward I, frequently suspended the city constitution for some offence or on some pretext by which money might be exacted²; a custos was then substituted for the mayor, and the whole independence of the municipality remained for the time in abeyance. On the other side the body of the citizens, or a large portion of the less wealthy and more excitable 'commons,' begrudged the authority exercised by the mayor and aldermen, demanded a share in the election of officers, and something more than the right to hear and consent to the proceedings of their rulers in the Guildhall. In 1249, when the mayor and aldermen met the judges at the Temple for a conference on rights claimed by the abbot of Westminster, the populace interfered, declaring that they would not permit them to treat without the participation of the whole 'Communa ³.' In 1257 the king attempted to form a party among the commons by charging the mayor and aldermen with unfair assessment of tallage⁴. In 1262 Thomas Fitz-Thomas the mayor encouraged the populace to claim the title of 'Communa civitatis' and to deprive the aldermen and magnates of their rightful influence; by these means he obtained a re-election by the popular vote in 1263, the voices of the aldermen being excluded: in 1264-5 he obtained a reappointment. But his power came to an end after the battle of Evesham; he was imprisoned at Windsor and the citizens paid a fine of £20,000 to regain the royal favour which they had lost by their conduct in the barons' war⁵. Although at this price they recovered the right of electing a sheriff, the city still remained under him as

Struggles between the magnates and the commons.

Thomas Fitz-Thomas.

¹ Norton, Commentaries on London, p. 87; quoting Liber Albus, fo. 116.

² In 1239 the king attempted to appoint a sheriff; Lib. de Antt. Legg. p. 8: in 1240 he refused to accept the mayor elect; ibid.: in 1244 he took the city into his own hands, and exacted £1000 before he gave it up; see also the years 1249, 1254, 1255; ibid. pp. 9, 21, 23 sq.

³ Lib. de Antt. Legg. p. 17.

⁴ Ibid. p. 32.

⁵ Ibid. pp. 29-86.

custos and the mayoralty remained in abeyance. The commons at the election of the new sheriff declared that they would have no mayor but Thomas Fitz-Thomas, and the king had to put down a riot. Another change was made the next year; the citizens were allowed to elect two bailiffs instead of a custos: Disputes after the barons' war. the election was dispatched in the guildhall before all the people¹. When the earl of Gloucester seized the city in 1267 the dominant party was again humbled; when he submitted, they recovered their power². But the king did not trust the Londoners again; and, although they were allowed to elect bailiffs, there was no mayor until 1270, when, at the intercession of Edward, and on condition of an increase in the ferm, Henry was induced to restore the recognised constitution of the city³. The communal or popular faction was not however Contests for the office of mayor of London. crushed. On the feast of S. Simon and S. Jude in 1272 there was a contested election to the mayoralty. The aldermen and more 'discreet' citizens chose Philip le Taylur, the populace, 'vulgas,' chose the outgoing mayor, Walter Hervey. The aldermen betook themselves to the king, and explained to him that the election of mayor and sheriffs rightly belonged to them; the mob declared that they were the Communa of the city and that the election was theirs by right. The arguments of the aldermen are important as showing that their opponents were not an organised body of freemen, but simply the aggregate of the populace. They urged that the election of the mayor belonged to them; the commons were the members, they were the heads; they also exercised all jurisdiction in lawsuits set on foot within the city; the populace contained many who were not owners of lands, rents or houses in the city, who were 'the sons of diverse mothers,' and many of them of servile origin, who had little or no interest in the welfare of the city. As the king was on his deathbed his court endeavoured to mediate; it was proposed that both candidates should be withdrawn and a custos appointed until a unanimous choice could be made; five persons were to be elected by each party, and they were to choose a mayor. Before the election could be made the king died, and the earl of Gloucester, who was the leading man among the lords, seeing that the majority of the Londoners were determined to force Walter Hervey into office, prevailed on the royal council to advise the aldermen to submit. They agreed thereupon that he should be mayor for a year. The next year Henry le Waleys was chosen, apparently by the aldermen; he was speedily involved in a quarrel with his predecessor, obtained an order for his arrest, and, with the permission of the council, removed him from the office of alderman. Thus ended, not without much complication with national politics, one phase of the communal quarrel¹. The aldermen, in alliance with the king and council, had overcome the party of the commons, the leaders of whom had certainly been in alliance with Simon de Montfort and Gloucester.

¹ Lib. de Antt. Legg. p. 88. ² Ibid. pp. 90-93. ³ Ibid. p. 124.

The city
during the reign of Edward I.

Arrangement for the election of mayor.

The condition of the city during the next reign was anything but easy: and the relations of the magistracy with the king seem to show that the popular party had now got a hold on the municipal government, or else that the reforms which Edward had introduced into legal procedure had offended the jealous conservatism of the governing body; from 1285 to 1298 the liberties of the city were in the king's hands, owing to an attempt made by the mayor to defy or to elude the jurisdiction of the justices in Eyre: the king appointed a custos and exacted a heavy fine when he relaxed his hold. The election of a new mayor after so long a period of abeyance was made by the aldermen with twelve men selected by them from each ward²; an important change from the old and closer system of election by the aldermen alone, and especially interesting as it coincides in point of time with the earliest elections of members of parliament. The efforts of Thomas Fitz-Thomas and Walter Hervey bore, it would appear, fruit thus late. Up to this time however no trace is discovered of trade disputes underlying the political rivalry; the struggle has been between the two political parties, the magnates on the one side and the commons on the other.

¹ Lib. de Antt. Legg. pp. 142 sq., 164 sq.

² Norton, Commentaries, p. 87; quoting Liber B. fol. 38; Fabyan, pp. 389, 400.

It is probable that two new points, which now emerge, are connected with a relaxation of the close government by the mayor and aldermen. In 1285 the aldermen began to act with the aid of an elected council in each ward; and under Edward II we find distinct traces of the creation of a body of freemen other than the resident householders and house-owners who had until now engrossed the title of citizens. An article of the charter granted by Edward II to London lays down very definite rules as to the admission of freemen; no alien is to be admitted except in the hustings court, and native traders only on the manucaption or security of six good men of the mystery or guild¹: all so admitted are to pay lot and scot with the commoners. To the same reign belongs the great quarrel between the weavers' guild and the magistracy, one of the first signs of that change in the constitution of London which placed the supreme influence in the hands of the craft guilds or city companies.

Expansion of the system of government.

Admission of freemen.

Quarrel of the weavers' guild.

487. The weavers' guild was the oldest, or one of the oldest, of the trade communities; it could look back to the twelfth century, and perhaps even further, for Robert, the London citizen who in 1130 accounted for sixteen pounds paid by this guild, was son of Leofstan, who had been the alderman of the still more ancient cnihtengild. The weavers had obtained from Henry II a very important privilege, which placed in their hands the exclusive control of their craftsmen, and confirmed to them the liberties which they had enjoyed under his grandfather. Their payments for the royal protection appear regularly in the Pipe Rolls: the annual sum of two marks of gold, or twelve pounds of silver, fixed by their charter². With some of the other wider crafts, the bakers in particular, they managed by these means to elude the royal jealousy which fell so heavily on the unauthorised or adulterine guilds. On the establishment of the communal authority under Henry Fitz-Alwyn, the weavers' guild ran some risk of destruction, for in 1202

Growth of the weavers'
guild.

It is viewed with jealousy by the body of the citizens.

¹ Liber Albus, i. pp. 142, 143.

² Pipe Rolls of Henry I, p. 144; Hen. II, p. 4; Madox, Exch. p. 231; Firma Burgi, pp. 191, 192, 284; Herbert, Livery Companies, i. 17-21; cf. Liber Albus, i. p. 134; Liber Custumarum, i. pp. 33, 48, 417.

the citizens offered the king sixty marks 'pro gilda telaria delenda ita ut de cetero non suscitetur¹.' The guild however outbid the citizens, and the king confirmed their privileges, raising their annual payment to twenty marks of silver. In 1223, in fear that the citizens would seize and destroy their charter, they lodged it in the treasury of the Exchequer. Notwithstanding these perils they grew stronger and more independent, obtained a fresh charter from Edward I, elected bailiffs to execute their regulations², and, going beyond the letter of their privilege, established courts and passed by-laws, which they enforced to the hurt of public liberty; in particular, they persecuted the guild of burrillers, a sort of clothworkers who interfered with their interests, and attempted to punish offenders against their rules by a verdict of twenty-four men of the guild³. Although there is no positive evidence to connect them and their fellow-guildsmen with the factions of Thomas Fitz-Thomas and Walter Hervey, or with the later troubles under Edward I, it is not at all unlikely that their struggle with the governing body was a continuous one. Edward I seems to have encouraged the development of the guild jurisprudence, and may have been induced to do so by his hostility to the magnates of the commune; under his son the whole case came before the royal courts. In the 14th year of Edward II, on a plea of 'quo warranto,' the citizens, before Hervey de Staunton and his companion judges, called on the weavers to show by what authority they exercised the right of holding courts, trying offenders, enforcing their sentences, and assuming, as they did, complete independence of administration. The guildsmen produced their charter, and the verdict of the jury, impannelled to determine the question of fact, was, that they had gone beyond their charter 'ad damnum et dispendium populi⁴.'

Usurped rights.

The lawsuit between the city and the weavers'
guild.

¹ Madox, Exch. p. 279.

² Liber Custumarum, i. p. 126.

³ Herbert, Livery Companies, i. 20.

⁴ Liber Custumarum, i. 416-424; Madox, Firma Burgi, p. 285. This is only one of the contests waged by the weavers' guild for the control of trade and exclusion of foreign workmen; others occurred in 1352, and 1409; ibid. pp. 192 sq., 283 sq.; Rot. Parl. iii. 600, iv. 50.

It is possible that this trial was only one sign of the growing importance of the trades. In the regulations for the government of the city, confirmed by Edward II in 1318, occurs an order that no native merchant of certain mystery or office shall be admitted to the freedom of the city except on security given by six good men of certain mystery or office¹. This order may be construed as implying either that the trades had such hold on the city as to exclude all claimants of the freedom who were not able to produce six sureties belonging to a craft, or that the governing body was so jealous of admitting any tradesman to the freedom that it required six sureties for his good behaviour. But this obscurity does not long embarrass the subject; the article, with another of the same code ordering the annual election of the aldermen, soon acquired a very definite application; for before the end of the reign of Edward III the victory of the guilds or companies was won; but it was won by the greater guilds for themselves rather than for the whole body of the tradesmen.

Freedom of the city acquired on the security of members of crafts.

Victory of the trading companies.

The guilds had increased and multiplied since Henry II had crushed the 'adulterine' aspirants to independence. There were now forty-eight, and of these the weavers were not in the first-class: the grocers, mercers, goldsmiths, fishmongers, vintners, tailors and drapers being evidently richer and more influential bodies². All had been liberally inclined towards the king, and he probably saw that, in allowing them to remodel the city constitution in their own way, he would gain strength in the city and make friends in that class from which all through his reign he had contrived to raise supplies.

Multiplication of trading companies.

By an ordinance of 1346 the deliberative council of the city had been made strictly representative; each ward, in its annual moot, was to elect, according to its size, eight, six, or four members, who were to be summoned to consult on the common Representative councils in the city.

¹ Liber Albus, i. p. 142.

² The twelve great companies, later called the Livery Companies, are the Mercers, Grocers, Drapers, Fishmongers, Goldsmiths, Skinners, Merchant Taylors or Linen Armourers, Haberdashers, Salters, Ironmongers, Vintners, and Clothworkers. Of these only the Fishmongers have charters as early as the reign of Edward I. They were however of much greater antiquity as guilds.

The trading companies obtain exclusive power in the councils, interests; and all elections were to be made by a similar assembly of representatives, twelve, eight, or six, from each ward, specially summoned¹. The deliberative council was thus a standing body of citizens, the elective courts were composed of persons summoned for the occasion. The qualification for membership of the council, or for the electoral summons, was simply freedom or citizenship, although that freedom may already have been closely connected with guild-membership. The plan did not work well, and was superseded in 1375. The governing body had summoned the representatives of the wards to both councils and elections very much as they pleased: it was now established that the common councilmen should be nominated by the trading companies and not by the wards; and that the same persons so nominated, and none others, should be summoned to both councils and elections². The considerable body of citizens who were not members of the companies were thus altogether excluded from municipal power, although they retained the right of choosing their aldermen; and to this they were not disposed to submit.

Possible connexion with political events,

We can but regret that we have no information as to the part played by Philipot, Walworth and John of Northampton, in these changes; we know however that political and party spirit ran high during these years in London, and the history of John of Gaunt, Wycliffe, and Wat Tyler, shows that the factions were fairly balanced³. The history and fate of Nicholas Brember, who forced himself into the mayoralty to further the designs of Richard II and Michael de la Pole, assume the importance of a constitutional episode.

Further changes,

In 1384 another change was made: the election of the deliberative council was given back to the wards, but the choice of the electoral bodies was left to the companies⁴. From this date the greater companies appear to engross the power thus secured to the traders. In 1386 Nicholas Brember was elected to the mayoralty 'by the strong hand of certain crafts,' in

¹ Norton, Commentaries, p. 114, quoting Liber F. ultimo fol. 5 b.

² Norton, Commentaries, p. 115, quoting Liber Leg. fol. 25 b.

³ See above, vol. ii, p. 464.

⁴ Norton, Commentaries, p. 116, quoting Liber H. fol. 173.

opposition to the great body of the freemen. The mercers, cordwainers, founders, saddlers, painters, armourers, embroiderers, spurriers and bladesmiths, petitioned the king and parliament against the violence with which the election had been conducted, and alleged that the election of the mayor ought to be 'in the freemen of the city by good and peaceable advice of the wisest and truest.' Brember was supported by the grocers, who numbered at the time not less than sixteen aldermen in their company¹. His fall in 1388 probably prevented any judicial proceedings which might have put a stop to the usurpations of the greater companies. The growth of their pretensions is however as yet unchronicled; their final victory was gained in the reign of Edward IV.

The stronger companies and Nicholas Brember.

Final victory of the companies.

One further change, and this nearly at the close of the period, completes this curious chapter of history. Edward IV had found good friends among the Londoners; his father had succeeded to the popularity of duke Humfrey, and Henry VI had had none to lose. Edward too had the instincts of a merchant, and sympathised, as much as he could sympathise with anything, with the interests of trade. It is however unnecessary to suppose that he had any personal share in the alteration, which may have been desired simply in the interests of order. The usage which had prevailed in the elections had left the number of electors quite indeterminate; it was necessary, according to the idea of the time, that the number should be fixed, and it was certainly inexpedient to leave the mode of summons and the exercise of the right at the discretion of the officials. In the seventh year of Edward IV it was enacted that the election of the mayor and sheriffs should be in the common council, together with the masters and wardens of the several mysteries; in the fifteenth year of the same king this body was widened by an act of the common council, who directed that the masters and wardens should associate with themselves the honest men of their mysteries, and come in their last liveries to the election². The discretionary power of the Progress under Edward IV.

¹ Rot. Parl. iii. 225, 226.

² Norton, Commentaries, pp. 126, 127.

Supremacy
of the livery.

mayor or presiding officer in summoning electors was thus taken away, and the election lodged altogether in the hands of the liverymen. The liverymen were those on whom, under the saving clause of the act of Henry IV¹ already mentioned, the several guilds were allowed to bestow their livery, which was done, and still is done, according to the rules of the several companies. The election of members to parliament was in all these proceedings treated in the same way as that of the mayor. The result may be briefly stated: the mayor, sheriff, other corporate officers, and members of parliament, were elected by the livery and common council. The aldermen were elected by the citizens of the wards for life; the common council annually by the wards, four from each. The position of freemen, the right to which might be based on birth or inheritance, which might be given as a compliment, or acquired by purchase, was generally obtained by apprenticeship under one of the companies: it simply gave the right to trade; the freeman who became a resident householder, and took the livery of his company, entered into the full enjoyment of civic privilege.

Position of freemen of the city.

Stages of municipal history.

Such then was the medieval constitution of London in the point which most nearly touches national politics; and such the tendency of all the changes through which it passed, from the unorganised aggregation of hereditary franchises, of which it seems in the eleventh century to have been composed; through the communal stage in which magnates and commons conducted a long and fruitless strife, to a state of things in which the mercantile element secured its own supremacy. It was on this condition of things that the charter of Edward IV, which allowed the city to acquire lands by purchase and in mortmain, conferred the complete character of a corporation². Most of the essential features of such a body London already possessed; the city had long had a seal, and had made by-laws: the other three marks which the lawyers have described as constituting a corporation aggregate are the power to purchase lands and hold them, 'to them and their successors' (not simply

Charter of Edward IV.

¹ Statutes, ii. 156; above, p. 553.

² Norton, Commentaries, pp. 75, 379.

their heirs, which is an individual and hereditary succession only); the power of suing and being sued, and the perpetual succession implied in the power of filling up vacancies by election. Into the possession of most of these London had grown long before the idea was completed or formulated: and it would be difficult to point to any one of its many charters by which the full character was conferred. It is accordingly regarded as a corporation by prescription¹; and in this respect, as in some others, takes its place rather as a standard by which the growth of other similar communities may be tested than as a model for their imitation in details.

Prescriptive character of the corporation.

488. The growth of municipal institutions in the other towns follows, at long distances and in very unequal stages, the growth of London. Even those cities whose charters entitle them to the privileges of the Londoners, and which may be supposed to have framed such new usages as they adopted upon the model of the capital, very soon lose all but the most superficial likeness: they had early constitutions of their own, the customs of which affected their later development quite as much as any formal pattern or exemplar could; and they were much more earnest in acquiring immunities of trade and commerce, which they were to share with London, than in reforming their own domestic institutions.

Country corporations.

York was the second capital of the kingdom; it retained in the twelfth century vestiges of the constitutional government by its lawmen which had existed before the Conquest; it had also its merchant guild and its weaver's guild; its citizens attempted to set up a communa, and were fined under Henry II; but it had achieved the corporate character and possessed a mayor and alderman under John². Under Henry III the citizens of York were more than once in trouble on account of the non-payment of their ferm; Edward I kept the liberties of the city for twelve years in his own hands, and settled an appeal, which came before him on account of the renewal of an ancient guild, in favour of the guildsmen³;—a fact which per-

Municipal history of York.

Disputes with the crown.

¹ Coke, 2 Inst. p. 330; Blackstone, Comm. i. 472.

² See vol. i. pp. 447, 454.

³ Rot. Parl. i. 202.

Contests for the mayoralty.

Gisburn's case.

New constitution given by Richard II.

haps denotes that in York as well as in London the party most dangerous to royal authority was the old governing body, the mayor and aldermen. Under Edward III, in 1371, we find a contested election between John Langton and John Gisburn for the mayoralty, in which the king's peace and the safety of the city were endangered, and the bailiffs and 'probi homines' were directed to proceed to a new election, from which both the competitors should be excluded¹. John Langton had already been nine times mayor, and John Gisburn had represented the city in parliament. Gisburn retained the mayoralty for two years, and was again, in 1380, involved in an election quarrel which came before the parliament which was sitting at the time at Northampton. He had been duly elected and held office until the 27th of November, on which day the common people of the city had risen, broken into the guildhall, and forced Simon of Whixley into the mayor's place. The earl of Northumberland was, by the direction of parliament, sent down to confirm Gisburn in possession and to arrest the offenders; but the next year Simon of Whixley was chosen, and held the office for three years running; and in 1382, by a fine of a thousand marks, the citizens purchased a general pardon for all their offences against the peace². It is not impossible that these troubles may have had a direct connexion with the rising of the commons in 1381; but it certainly appears, from the circumstances recorded, that the chief magistracy was made the bone of contention between two factions, one of which was the faction of the mob, while the other was supported by royal authority. One result of this state of things was, that Richard bestowed by charter a new constitution on the city. He had, in 1389, presented his own sword to the mayor, who thenceforward was known as the lord mayor; and in 1393 he had given the lord mayor a mace. In 1396 he made the city a county of itself, annexing to it the jurisdiction of the suburbs, and substituting two sheriffs for the three bailiffs who had hitherto assisted the mayor; the sheriffs were to be chosen by the citizens and community, and to hold their county court in the regular way¹. The favour shown by Richard II to the city won the affection of the citizens, in so far at least as to implicate them in the revolt of the Percies in 1405, when their liberties were again seized for a short time.

¹ Drake, Eboracum, App. p. xxvi.

² Ibid. App. p. xxvi; Rot. Parl. iii. 96.

The corporate body at this time consisted of the lord mayor and twelve aldermen, who represented either the ancient aldermen of the guilds or the more ancient lawmen of Anglo-Saxon times. The city was divided into four wards, named after the four gates, each having its leet jury and its pasture master chosen in ward-mote. The freemen of the city were made as usual by service, inheritance or purchase; and the great number of companies, thirteen greater and fifteen smaller, proved the importance of the craft-guilds.

After an important exemplification and extension of their privileges by Henry VI², in which the circle of their county jurisdiction was extended over the wapentake of the Ainsty, and which accounts in some measure for the reverence with which his memory was regarded, succeeded a period during which the Yorkist kings carefully cultivated the friendship of the citizens. Edward IV, in 1464, issued directions for the election of mayor which show that he was inclined to assimilate the constitution of the city to that of London in one more point of importance, and which possibly imply that the old disputes about the elections had again arisen amid the many other sources of local division. He directed that the searchers or scrutators of each craft should summon the masters of the trades to the guildhall, where they should nominate two of the aldermen, one of whom should be selected by the upper house of aldermen and assistants to fill the vacant office³. The plan was soon modified. During the short restoration of Henry VI, in 1470, a new scheme is said to have been proposed in parliament, and a lord mayor was appointed by royal mandamus⁴; and almost immediately after the restoration of Edward IV, the

Character of the corporation.

Charter of Henry VI.

Attempts to throw the elections into the hands of the trades.

¹ Drake, Eboracum, pp. 205, 206; Madox, Firma Burgi, pp. 246, 247, 293.

² Madox, Firma Burgi, p. 293.

³ Ibid. p. 33; Rymer, xi. 529.

⁴ Drake, Eboracum, p. 185.

restriction of the elective power to the masters of the trades was abolished; the searchers were directed to summon the whole body of the citizens and to elect an alderman as mayor without any interference from the upper house¹. As the aldermen of York retained the power of filling up vacancies in their own body, and the twenty-four assistants were men who had served the office of mayor, this proceeding left a fair share of power to both houses; and the constitution underwent no further change until Henry VIII instituted the common council composed of two representatives for each of the thirteen greater and one for each of the smaller companies; the election of the mayor was then given to the common council and senior searchers, who presented three candidates to the aldermen for their final choice².

Final arrangement under Henry VIII.

Difficulty of understanding these changes.

Although we have these details of changes, we sadly want a clue to the interpretation of them. In the earlier part of the period the city does not seem to have been disturbed by political disputes; the influence of the archbishops and of the neighbouring lords was great but not provokingly strong, and the citizens acted fairly well together. In the later part there was no doubt a party of the White Rose as well as of the Red, and the increased weight given to the trade organisations by both Edward IV and Henry VIII is a distinct recognition of their supreme influence. As the division into four wards does not seem to have any direct relation to the body of twelve aldermen, we must trace the existence of the aldermanate either to the ancient guild system, or to the combination of the merchant guild with the leet jury. The connexion of the freemen with the craft-guilds is not distinctly stated; but as these guilds were so numerous, and as no master craftsman was allowed to trade unless he were a freeman, such a connexion must necessarily have existed: the lord mayor and the eight chamberlains constituted a court which took cognisance of all apprenticeships, and which must have fulfilled the functions of the merchant guild, if it were not the merchant guild itself in a new form.

General conclusions.

¹ Drake, Eboracum, p. 185.

² Ibid. p. 207. By the charter of Charles II the Common Council is made to consist of 72 members, 18 from each of the four wards,

The constitution of Leicester may be taken as a type of a large class of borough forms, which retained the older names of local institutions, and thus maintained a more distinctly continuous history. There the chief court of the town, after it became consolidated, was the portman-mote, in which the bailiff of the lord continued to preside until the middle of the thirteenth century; and there was likewise a merchant guild, at the head of which were one or two aldermen. From the year 1246 a mayor took the place of the aldermen, and gradually edged out the bailiff, but the portman-mote and the merchant guild retained their names and functions; the latter as the means by which the freemen of the borough were enfranchised, whilst the former was the court in which they exercised their municipal functions. Under this merchant guild were the craft guilds; the tailors' guild paid ten shillings to the merchant guild for every new master tailor enfranchised, and doubtless the other trades were under similar obligations. In 1464, Edward IV recognised the position of twenty-four burgesses or mayor's brethren, and a court of common council who, in 1467, were empowered to elect the mayor. In 1484 the twenty-four took the title of aldermen, and divided the town into twelve wards; and in 1489 the mayor, the twenty-four, and forty-eight councillors, formed themselves into a strictly close corporation; took an oath by which all the other freemen were excluded from municipal elections, and obtained an act of parliament to confirm their new constitution: a new charter was granted in 1504¹.

Municipal history of Leicester.

Portman-mote and merchant
guild.

At Worcester, the merchant guild maintained a still stronger vitality, and was indeed the governing body of the city, the bailiffs, twenty-four and forty-eight, being the livery men of the guild; but the constitution is more liberal at Worcester than at Leicester². At Shrewsbury, on the other hand, although the constitution to some extent resembles that of Worcester, there is no mention of the guild in the act which created the Constitution of Worcester;

Shrewsbury;

¹ Nichols, Leicestershire, i. pp. 374, 380, 383, 385.

² Nash, Worcestershire, ii. pp. cx. sq.; Green, Hist. Worcester, ii. 31 sq.; Smith's Gilds, pp. 370 sq.

Exeter ; corporation¹. At Exeter, where the merchant guild was not one of the privileges originally granted, we find the mayor and burgesses exercising or attempting to exercise supreme authority over the craft guilds². At Bristol there had been a merchant guild, but there, as at York, it had merged its existence in the communal organisation ; in the year 1314 there was an association of fourteen of the greater men of the city, who were stoutly resisted by the community ; the quarrel between the two bodies was one of the minor troubles of the reign of Edward II, and was rather of a political than of a municipal character, although the oligarchy of fourteen strengthened themselves by alliance with the royal officers, and the commonalty, with the covert assistance of the opposition, carried on a local war for some four years. Bristol was now the third, if not the second, town in the kingdom, and it was probably with a view of consolidating its constitution, as well as by way of compliment, that Edward III in 1373 gave it a shire organisation³.

Towns in demesne of prelates.

Constitution of Beverley.

In some towns which were part of the demesne or franchises of prelates, the relation between the lord and the municipal organisation gave a peculiar colour to the whole history. Two or three such cases may be mentioned here. Beverley was an ancient possession of the see of York ; there the archbishop retained his manorial jurisdiction until the Reformation, when he exchanged the manor for other estates. But although he retained jurisdiction, the townsmen in their guild, erected under archiepiscopal charter and with royal licence, administered the property and regulated the trade of the town, by a body of twelve governours ; on one or two occasions they attempted, during vacancies of the see, to have some of their governours appointed justices of the peace, but in this they were defeated by the new archbishops. The constitution of a council of twenty-four to assist the twelve was ratified by the archbishops, and became a permanent part of the constitution, which, after the town became a royal borough, was completed by the addition of a mayor and aldermen. In Beverley the rights of the archbishop were older than that of the merchant guild¹. In Ripon, another franchise of the archbishop, there was no chartered merchant guild; the jurisdiction was exercised by the bailiffs in the manorial courts, and the elective wakeman, an official of very ancient origin and peculiar to this town, had certain functions in the department of police. In both places there was generally harmony between the lord and the town. At Reading it was otherwise². Reading had an ancient merchant guild which claimed existence anterior to the date at which the town was given to the abbey by Henry I. There was in consequence a perpetual conflict of jurisdiction between the mayor with his guild and the abbot with his courts leet and baron. In 1253 there was open war between the two bodies; the abbot had seized the merchant guild and destroyed the market; under royal mediation the townsmen bought their peace, their guild and corporate property, the abbot being allowed to nominate the warden of the guild. In 1351 the mayor, and the commons who had chosen the mayor, insisted on their right to appoint constables; this the abbot claimed as appurtenant to his manor; this dispute ran on to the reign of Henry VII. The election of the mayor himself was another bone of contention. The abbot had chosen the warden of the guild from three persons selected by the brethren; in 1460 the abbot chose the mayor 'cum consensu burgensium.' But in 1351 the right of choosing the mayor was claimed as an immemorial privilege of the burghers. An end was put to these contests by the charter of Henry VII, which divided the town into wards and prescribed the rights of the guildsmen. Similar difficulties marked the earlier history of Winchester and other towns where the bishops claimed not the whole, but a distinct quarter. But these instances must suffice.

¹ Rot. Parl. iv. 476, v. 121.

² Izaack's Exeter, pp. 89, 91 ; Smith's Gilds, pp. 297 sq.

³ See Seyer's Charters of Bristol, p. 39.

Constitution of Ripon;

and of Reading.

Municipal troubles at Reading.

The first and perhaps the only distinct conclusion that can be drawn from these details is that the town constitutions

¹ See Scaum's Beverlac, i. pp. 149-321.

² Coates, History of Reading, pp. 49-56.

No general law of growth to be traced in detail.

The town councils of twenty-four.

Division into wards.

Office of alderman.

General type.

reached the stage at which they were recognised by charters of incorporation, rather by growth than by any act of creation. Where the constitution of the guild had been insufficient for the administration of the borough, or where there had been no guild, some plan of electing a permanent or annual committee of councillors to assist the mayor or the bailiffs had sprung up. In the same way, where the ancient machinery of court-leet and court-baron had worn itself out, the want of magisterial experience or authority had been supplied by an elected council. Such in their origin were the 'twenty-four' in corporations like Cambridge and Lynn, where they acted as a common council; the 'twenty-four' at York, who were the aldermen that had passed the chair, the name bearing no reference to the existing number; such were too the mayor's brethren at Leicester. The constant recurrence of the number of twenty-four in this connexion may possibly imply an early connexion with the jury system, and the 'jurati' of the early communes, which again must have been connected with the system of the hundred court as exhibited in the East Anglian counties. The division of the larger towns into wards can scarcely be accounted for upon any one principle applicable to all cases; for it took place at very different times in different towns; the simplest way of accounting for it is to suppose that it was intended to supply a more efficient police system. The connexion of the aldermanship with the ward varies in different towns; in some it is a result, as in London, of the coalition of several jurisdictions; in others, as in Winchester, of the subdivision for the purposes of police; in others, as in Reading, it is of late origin, and simply a measure of local reform. Finally, in all the cases cited, there is a common tendency towards the general type of an elective chief magistrate, with a permanent staff of assistant magistrates, and a wider body of representative councillors—in other words, to the system of mayor, aldermen, and common council, which with many variations in detail was the common type to which the charter of incorporation gave the full legal status.

The several marks of a legal corporation, which were impressed, conferred, or perpetuated by the charter of incorporation, are five in number: the right of perpetual succession, to sue and be sued by name, to purchase lands, to have a common seal, and to make by-laws¹. The first involved, in the case of towns and collective organisations generally, the right of perpetuating its existence by filling up vacancies as they occur; and this right was exercised by all the organised communities, whether by guild or leet, or by mere admission to civic privileges, from the earliest times. It is true that the early charters were granted to the burghers and their heirs, but, although the form implied simple inheritance, the power of admitting new members, a power of very primitive antiquity, involved the idea of succession, and secured it. In the same way a town could be sued or sue, could be fined or otherwise punished by royal authority as a whole, long before charters of incorporation were granted. Again, the ancient guilds could hold property; the towns themselves, whether as organised guilds or as ancient communities of landowners like the village communities, could hold land in common; and, although in the latter case the basis of the common ownership was inheritance, the grants of land to the burghers and their successors were sufficiently early to prove that there was no recognised bar to the possession of corporate property even in the fourteenth century. It was in the reign of Richard II that the acquisition of land by guilds was first made subject to a licence of amortization, a fact which proves that the power of acquiring without such licence had not as yet been limited by law. The common seal and the right to make by-laws had been enjoyed by the boroughs from time immemorial, the latter by the original borough charter, if not earlier, the former from the date at which public seals came into common use. Thus viewed, all the ancient boroughs of England, or nearly all, must have possessed all the rights of corporations and have been corporations by prescription long before the reign of Henry VI; and the acquisition of a formal charter of incorporation could only recognise, not bestow, these rights.

Legal idea of corporations.

Prescriptive rights of the boroughs.

Right of acquiring land.

Common seal and by-laws.

¹ Blackstone, Comm. i. 475.

Grants of charters of incorporation.

These new charters were, however, required in many instances to give firmness and consolidation to the local organisations which had been up to this time a matter of spontaneous and irregular growth; they gave to the local by-laws the certainty of royal authorisation, and they served to bring up the general status of the privileged communities to the point at which the lawyers had fixed the true definition of incorporation. Before the complete charter was devised, some towns, Shrewsbury for instance, had procured an act of parliament to secure their local constitutions; it was on the whole easier to procure a royal charter. From the reign of Henry VI these charters were multiplied, and they contained both a recognition of the full corporate character of the town and some scheme of municipal constitution¹. As time advanced these schemes were made more and more definite, and contained more precise rules for proceeding. The charter of Henry VI to Southampton mentions only a mayor, bailiffs, and burgesses, and that of Edward IV to Wenlock only a bailiff and burgesses; in such cases the corporate government already existing was merely confirmed or recognised. A century later the number of aldermen and councillors is often prescribed; and a century later still, in the reign of Charles II and onwards, alterations are made in the constitution of the several bodies, not only by royal nomination of individual aldermen and councillors, but by varying the numbers and functions of the several bodies that formed the corporations.

Increase of definiteness in the chartered corporations.
More exact organisation.

Irregularity a mark of growth.

These changes for the most part lie a long way beyond the point at which our general view of the social state of England must now stop, but the later development of the corporation system serves to illustrate a tendency which is already perceptible in the fifteenth century. Much of the freedom of the town system was inseparable from the idea of growth; with the definite recognition conferred by the charters of incorporation comes in a tendency towards restriction. The corporate governing body becomes as it were hardened and crystallised, and exhibits a constantly increasing disposition to engross in its own hands the powers which had been understood to belong to the body of the burghers. The town property comes to be regarded as the property of the corporation; the corporation becomes a close oligarchy; the elective rights of the freemen are reduced to a minimum, and in many cases the magistracy becomes almost the hereditary right of a few families. The same tendency exists in the trading companies also. The highest point of grievance is reached when by royal charter the corporation is empowered to return the members of parliament. And this power, notwithstanding the legal doctrine that such a monopoly, although conferred by royal charter, could not prejudice the already existent right of the burgesses at large, was in many cases, as we have noted already, exercised by the municipal corporations until it was abolished by the Reform Act of 1832.

¹ The charter of Hull, 18 Hen. VI, is said to be the first charter in which incorporation is distinctly granted to a town; Merewether and Stephens, p. xxxiv.

Tendency towards restriction.

Oligarchic corporations.

Exclusive political rights.

The highest development of corporate authority had in some few instances been reached, a century before the charter of incorporation was invented, in the privileges bestowed on some of the large towns when they were constituted counties, with sheriffs and a shire jurisdiction of their own. This promotion, if it may be so called, involved a more complete emancipation than had been hitherto usual, from the intrusion of the sheriff of the county; the mayor of the privileged town was constituted royal escheator in his place, and his functions as receiver and executor of writs devolved on the sheriffs of the newly constituted shire; a local franchise, a hundred or wapentake, was likewise attached to the new jurisdiction, in somewhat the same way as the county of Middlesex was attached to the corporation of London. After London, to which it belonged by the charter of Henry I, the first town to which this honour was granted was Bristol, which Edward III, in 1373, made a county with an elective sheriff. In 1396 Richard II conferred the same dignity on York, constituting the mayor the king's escheator, instituting two sheriffs in the place of the three primitive bailiffs, and placing them in direct communi-

Towns made counties.

Shire constitution of large towns.

cation with the royal exchequer. Newcastle-on-Tyne was similarly promoted in 1400, Norwich in 1403, Lincoln in 1409, Hull in 1440, Southampton in 1448, Nottingham in 1449, Coventry in 1451, and Canterbury in 1461. At later periods, Chester, Exeter, Gloucester, Lichfield, Worcester, and Poole were added to the number of 'counties corporate'.¹

Political importance of town history.

489. It is by no means easy to ascertain the definite amount of political consciousness which underlay the municipal struggles of medieval England; or even to determine the direction in which the influence of municipal feeling helped the national advance. On the other hand it is very easy to speculate on the affinities and analogies of continental town history and to draw a picture of what may have been. Some speculation indeed is necessary, but it must be guarded with many provisos and hedged in with stubborn facts. It has been already remarked more than once that the battle of the medieval constitution, so far as it was fought in the house of commons, was fought by the knights of the shire. This fact is capable of two explanations; it may imply the hearty concurrence of the town representatives or it may imply their neutrality and insignificance. As they are seldom even mentioned in connexion with the greater struggles of the fourteenth century, it is impossible to determine from any positive evidence which was really the case. But there are some reasons for doubting whether political foresight was to any considerable extent developed in the towns. In parliament, throughout the fourteenth century, the presence of the borough members is only traceable by the measures of local interest, taken on petitions which we must infer to have been presented by them, local acts for improvement of the towns, paving acts, diminution of imposts in consideration of the repair of walls, and the redress of minor grievances. Outside the parliament, the merchant interest of England is seen to have been nourished, utilised, and almost ruined by Edward III; conniving at and profiting by his acts of financial Insignificance of the towns in parliament.

Action of the mercantile interest under Edward III.

¹ I must content myself here with a general reference to Merewether and Stephens on the History of Corporate Boroughs, where most of the details given above may be found.

chicanery, and enabling him, by supplying money as long as it was forthcoming, to disregard the wishes of the nation expressed in the parliament. As the town members must have been in many cases the great merchants of the country, the only conclusion that we can draw from their conduct is that they thought it more profitable and more prudent to negotiate with the king in private or half public assemblies, than to support his claims for increased grants of money in parliament; out of parliament they were his pliant instruments, in parliament they were silent or acquiescent in the complaints of the knights. In another point, which affects the history of the following century, the inaction of the town members is remarkable: there is scarcely a vestige of an attempt to reform or even to regulate the borough representation. There is no trace whatever, except in the statute of 1382, of any interest felt on this point. There is a long string of petitions and statutes touching the shire representation, from the year 1376 to the year 1445; but, with the exception of a single complaint against the sheriffs in 1436, there is nothing answering to it on the part of the towns. Yet, as we have seen, the borough franchise was in a very anomalous condition, subject generally to the manipulation of the governing bodies of the towns, whilst custom was nowhere so strong or so uniform as to have presented any obstacle to a general project of reform.

Subservi-ence to the king.

In these two points must be read distinctly an insensibility, in the represented classes of the towns, as to the great questions at stake between the king and the nation, and as to the line on which political liberty was ultimately to advance. This absence of political insight may be explained in more ways than one: and in some ways which, although in themselves contradictory, may have been true in reference to different parts of the country. In some counties the towns followed with a good deal of sympathy the politics of their great neighbours, who also led the shires; in others there was no doubt a rivalry, in England as elsewhere, between town and country. In some towns the family factions of the royal house,

Absence of political wisdom in the towns.

How this may be accounted for.

Internal jealousies in the towns.

Possible alliance between Richard II
and the towns.

Policy of Richard II.

or of the neighbourhood, were reproduced and intensified, and the two representatives would be the nominees of two rival parties. In most of the towns however the members would almost certainly be the nominees of the local magistrates rather than of the great body of the commons; and the facility or difficulty with which this result was secured would be the only index of any political aspiration in the inferior body. Traces of any such difficulty in the matter of parliamentary elections are, as we have seen, extremely rare; but they are not altogether absent, and they have their reflexions in the proceedings of parliament. In the reign of Richard II several petitions were presented in parliament which show that the strife between the governing bodies and the craft guilds was not yet decided; possibly the statute which subjected the guild lands to the restraints of the mortmain acts owed its acceptance to this jealousy; and, more distinctly, the proposal to limit the right of the towns to enfranchise villeins speaks of an intention in the represented classes to hold fast their power¹. The most offensive of these proposals were rejected by the king, but they were made in the most subservient parliaments of the reign, and by that party no doubt which might have reckoned most securely on the king's support. But Richard had probably conceived the idea of appealing to the lower stratum of the nation in order to crush the baronial opposition; and with all his weakness he was clever enough to see that, in the class which had risen against his ministers in 1381, there was a power which it would be foolish to oppress, and which it might be wise to propitiate. He would defend the villein against the burgher, the burgher against the knight, the knight against the baron, but it was that he himself might profit by the overthrow of all. And this has to be borne in mind in reading the whole of his most instructive history. There were many points in his policy which were, in themselves, far more liberal than the policy of the barons; yet it was on the victory of the barons that the ultimate fate of the constitution hung. Richard, very early in his career, would have saved the villeins when the parliament revoked the charters; he refused to sanction later restrictive measures against them; his court, if not himself, was strongly inclined to tolerate the Wycliffites; many of the wisest measures against the papacy were passed during the time of his complete supremacy; the barons and knights of the shire may be represented as a body of self-seekers and oppressors in these very points, and they certainly were in the closest alliance with the persecuting party in the church. Yet they were the national champions, and their victory was the guarantee of national progress. If Richard had overcome them England might have become the counterpart of France, and, having passed through the ordeal, or rather the agony, of the dynastic struggle and the discipline of Tudor rule, must have sunk like France into that gulf from which only revolution could deliver her.

¹ See above, vol. ii. pp. 485, 509.

In the fifteenth century the towns seem to have shared pretty evenly the sympathies of the dynastic parties; but they do not play, either in or out of parliament, an important part in the struggle. They were courted by the kings as a counterpoise to the still overpowering baronage, and by the aspirants to power against its actual possessors; they were courted by Henry IV as against the party of Richard, and by the Yorkists against Henry VI; and it was the absence of any popular qualities in Henry, as compared with the gallant and popular manners of the rival princes, which, far more than any questions of deeper import, placed him at a disadvantage regarding them. But the readiness with which the Tudor succession was welcomed proved that there was no real affection felt for the house of York, and proves further that the towns as well as the nation at large were weary of dynastic politics. From that time the municipal organisation is strengthened and hardened, still with that tendency towards restriction which betrays a want of political foresight: the victory of the trading spirit once won, the trading spirit shows itself as much inclined to engross power and to exclude competition as any class had done before.

The politics of the towns under the Lancaster kings.

Relation of the house of York to the towns.

490. It cannot be too carefully borne in mind, especially as

Work of different classes of society in the securing general progress towards liberty.

we approach more modern times and have to look at questions more or less akin to those which divide modern opinion, that political progress does not advance in a single line, and political wisdom is the heirloom of no one class of society. There is an age of ecclesiastical prevision, an age of baronial precaution, an age of municipal pretension; of country policy, of mercantile policy, of trade policy, of artisan aspiration: all, one after the other, putting forth their best side in the struggle for power, showing their worst side in the possession and retention of it. But, in spite of selfish aims and selfish struggles for the maintenance of power, each contributes to the great march of national wellbeing, and each contributes an element of its own, each has a strong point of its own which it establishes before it gives way to the next. The church policy of the earlier middle ages was one long protest against the predominance of mere brute strength, whether exemplified in the violence of William Rufus, or in the astute despotism of Henry I: the baronial policy, which, from the reign of John to the accession of Henry IV, shared or succeeded to the burden of the struggle, was directed to the securing of self-government for the nation as represented in its parliament: and the country interest, as embodied in the knights, worked out in the fifteenth century the results of the victory: the other influences are only coming into full play as the middle ages close; but we can detect in them some signs of the uses that they are still to serve. The country interest has still to continue the battle of self-government; the mercantile spirit to inform and reform the foreign policy; the trade influence to remodel and develop national economy; the manufacturing influence to improve and to specialise in every region of national organisation. Such has been the result so far; it is vain and useless to prophesy. But it would seem that the peculiar tendencies which are encouraged by the habits and trains of thought which these pursuits severally involve, have worked and are working their way into real practical influence as the balance of national power has inclined successively to the several classes which are employed on these pursuits. The churchman struggled for

Influence of social pursuits on political life and progress.

moral against physical influence, as for the cause of the spirit against the flesh; he forgot sometimes that the very law of the spirit is a law of liberty. The baron struggled for national freedom against royal encroachment; the habits of the warrior and the hunter, the judge and the statesman, were all united in him; the mediæval baron was a wonderful impersonation of strength and versatility, and combined more great qualities, for good or for evil, than any of the rival classes; but in the idea of corporate freedom the idea of individual and social freedom was too often left out of sight: the whole policy of the baronage was insular and narrowed down to one issue. The mercantile influence tended to widen the national mind; it grew under the Tudors to great importance and power, but it did not directly tend to the increase of liberty. The national programme of liberation had to be taken up under the Stewarts in a condition scarcely more developed than when it was laid down under the Lancastrian kings: only the nation had learned in the meantime more of the world, of diplomacy, of the balance of nations, and of the bearing of commercial alliances on domestic welfare. The economical and administrative reforms for which trade and manufacture train men until the balance of national power falls to them, are matters which we ourselves have lived to witness. What organic changes the further extension of political power to the labourer in town and country may bring, our children may live to see.

To return however to the special point. One fact remains to be considered, which must to a great extent modify all conclusions on the subject. The town members in parliament during the middle ages represented only a very small proportion of the towns, and those selected, as it would seem, by the merest chance of accident or caprice. They were, as we have seen, very unequally distributed, and were in no way, like the knights of the shire, a general concentration of local representation. In so far then as they represented an interest at all, they represented it very inadequately; and if, as we have supposed, they represented chiefly the governing bodies among their constituencies, they are still farther removed from being regarded as the true

The borough representation was no adequate representation of a class.

Hence its insignificance.

exponents of any element of the national will. And this consideration will account in great measure for their insignificance in action and their obscurity in history.

Social life of the townsman.

491. Of the social life and habits of the citizen and burgher we have more distinct ideas than of his political action. Social habits no doubt tended to the formation of political habits then as now. Except for the purposes of trade, the townsman seldom went far from his borough; there he found all his kinsmen, his company, and his customers; his ambition was gratified by election to municipal office; the local courts could settle most of his legal business; in the neighbouring villages he could invest the money which he cared to invest in land; once a year, for a few years, he might bear a share in the armed contingent of his town to the shire force or militia; once in his life he might go up, if he lived in a parliamentary borough, to parliament. There was not much in his life to widen his sympathies; there were no newspapers, and few books; there was not enough local distress for charity to find interest in relieving it; there were many local festivities, and time and means for cultivating comfort at home. The burgher had pride in his house, and still more perhaps in his furniture; for although, in the splendid panorama of medieval architecture, the great houses of the merchants contribute a distinct element of magnificence to the general picture, such houses as Crosby Hall and the Hall of John Hall of Salisbury must always, in the walled towns, have been exceptions to the rule, and far beyond the aspirations of the Comfort and wealth of the burgher.

ordinary tradesman; but the smallest house could be made comfortable and even elegant by the appliances which his trade connexion brought within the reach of the master. Hence the riches of the inventories attached to the wills of medieval townsmen, and many of the most prized relics of medieval handicraft. Somewhat of the pains, for which the private house afforded no scope, was spent on the churches and public buildings of the town. The numerous churches of York and Norwich, poorly endowed, but nobly built and furnished, speak very clearly not only of the devotion, but of the artistic culture, of the burghers of those towns. The crafts vied with one churches.

Town

another in the elaborate ornamentation of their churches, their chantries, and their halls of meeting ; and of the later religious guilds some seem to have been founded for the express purpose of combining splendid religious services and processions with the work of charity. Such was one of the better results of a confined local sympathy. But the burgher did not either in life or in death forget his friends outside the walls. His will generally contained directions for small payments to the country churches where his ancestors lay buried. Strongly as his affections were localised, he was not a mere townsman. Nine tenths of the cities of medieval England would now be regarded as mere country towns, and they were country towns even then. They drew in all their new blood from the country ; they were the centres for village trade ; the neighbouring villages were the play-ground and sporting-ground of the townsmen, who had, in many cases, rights of common pasture, and in some cases rights of hunting, far outside the walls. The great religious guilds, just referred to, answered, like race meetings at a later period, the end of bringing even the higher class of the country population into close acquaintance with the townsmen, in ways more likely to be developed into social intercourse than the market or the muster in arms. Before the close of the middle ages the rich townsmen had begun to intermarry with the knights and gentry, and many of the noble families of the present day trace the foundation of their fortunes to a lord mayor of London or York, or a mayor of some provincial town. These intermarriages, it is true, became more common after the fall of the elder baronage and the great expansion of trade under the Tudors, but the fashion was set two centuries earlier. If the adventurous and tragic history of the house of De la Pole shone as a warning light for rash ambition, it stood by no means alone. It is probable that there was no period in English history at which the barrier between the knightly and mercantile class was regarded as insuperable, since the days of Athelstan, when the merchant who had made his three voyages over the sea and made his fortune, became worthy of thegn-right : even the higher grades of chivalry were not beyond his

Country interests.

Religious
guilds.

Intermar-riages with the country folk.

No barrier between trade and gentry.

reach, for in 1439 we find William Estfeld, a mercer of London, made Knight of the Bath¹. As the merchant found acceptance in the circles of the gentry, civic office became an object of competition with the knights of the county; their names were enrolled among the religious fraternities of the towns, the trade and craft guilds; and, as the value of a seat in parliament became better appreciated, it was seen that the readiest way to it lay through the office of mayor, recorder, or alderman of some city corporation.

Absence of 'professional'
classes.

492. Beside these influences, which without much affecting the local sympathies of the citizen class joined them on to the rank above them, must be considered the fact that two of the most exclusive and 'professional' of modern professions were not in the middle ages professions at all. Every man was to some extent a soldier, and every man was to some extent a lawyer; for there was no distinctly military profession, and of lawyers only a very small and somewhat dignified number. Thus, although the burgher might be a mere mercer, or a mere saddler, and have very indistinct notions of commerce beyond his own warehouse or workshop, he was trained in warlike exercises, and he could keep his own accounts, draw up his own briefs, and make his own will, with the aid of a scrivener or a chaplain who could supply an outline of form, with but little fear of transgressing the rules of the court of law or of probate. In this point he was like the baron, liable to be called at very short notice to very different sorts of work. Finally, the townsman whose borough was not represented in parliament, or did not enjoy such municipal organisation as placed the whole administration in the hands of the inhabitants, was a fully qualified member of the county court of his shire, and shared, there and in the corresponding institutions, everything that gave a political colouring to the life of the country gentleman or the yeoman.

Variety of employment.

Difference of class in towns mainly a difference in wealth.

Many of the points here enumerated belong, it may be said, to the rich merchant or great burgher, rather than to the ordinary tradesman and craftsman. This is true, but it must be remembered always that there was no such gulf between the rich merchant and the ordinary craftsman in the town, as existed between the country knight and the yeoman, or between the yeoman and the labourer. In the city it was merely the distinction of wealth; and the poorest apprentice might look forward to becoming a master of his craft, a member of the livery of his company, to a place in the council, an aldermanship, a mayoralty, the right of becoming an esquire for his life and leaving an honourable coat of arms for his children. The yeoman had no such straight road before him; he might improve his chances as they came; might lay field to field, might send his sons to war or to the universities; but for him also the shortest way to make one of them a gentleman was to send him to trade; and there even the villein might find liberty and a new life that was not hopeless. But the yeoman, with fewer chances, had as a rule less ambition, possibly also more of that loyal feeling towards his nearest superior, which formed so marked a feature of medieval country life. The townsman knew no superior to whose place he might not aspire; the yeoman was attached by ties of hereditary affection to a great neighbour, whose superiority never occurred to him as a thing to be coveted or grudged. The factions of the town were class factions and political or dynastic factions, the factions of the country were the factions of the lords and gentry. Once perhaps in a century there was a rising in the country; in every great town there was, every few years, something of a struggle, something of a crisis, if not between capital and labour in the modern sense, at least between trade and craft, or craft and craft, or magistracy and commons, between excess of control and excess of licence.

¹ Ordinances of the Privy Council, vi. 39.

Different
position of the country yeoman.

Town
struggles.

493. In town and country alike there existed another class of men, who, although possessing most of the other benefits of freedom, lay altogether outside political life. In the towns there were the artificers, and in the country the labourers, who lived from hand to mouth, and were to all intents and purposes 'the poor who never cease out of the land.' There were the craftsmen who could or would never aspire to become masters,

Artisans and labourers.

The poorer classes.

Not overcrowded ;

except in walled towns,

Villages not over-peopled.

Population of the country varied very slowly.

or to take up their freedom as citizens ; and the cottagers who had no chance of acquiring a rood of ground to till and leave to their children : two classes alike keenly sensitive to all changes in the seasons and in the prices of the necessities of life ; very indifferently clad and housed, in good times well fed, but in bad times not fed at all. In some respects these classes differed from that which in the present day furnishes the bulk of the mass of pauperism. The evils which are commonly, however erroneously it may be, regarded as resulting from redundant population, had not in the middle ages the shape which they have taken in modern times. Except in the walled towns, and then only in exceptional times, there could have been no necessary overcrowding of houses. The very roughness and uncleanness of the country labourer's life was to some extent a safeguard ; if he lived, as foreigners reported, like a hog, he did not fare or lodge worse than the beasts that he tended. In the towns, the restraints on building, which were absolutely necessary to keep the limited area of the streets open for traffic, prevented any very great variation in the number of inhabited houses ; for, although in some great towns, like Oxford, there were considerable vacant spaces which were apt to become a sort of gypsy camping-ground for the waifs and strays of a mixed population, most of them were closely packed ; the rich men would not dispense with their courts and gardens, and the very poor had to lodge outside the walls. In the country townships again, there was no such liberty as has in more modern times been somewhat imprudently used, of building or not building cottage dwellings without due consideration of place or proportion to the demand for useful labour. Every manor had its constitution and its recognised classes and number of holdings on the demesne and the freehold, the village and the waste ; the common arable and the common pasture were a village property that warned off all interlopers and all superfluous competition. So strict were the barriers, that it seems impossible to suppose that any great increase of population ever presented itself as a fact to the medieval economist ; or, if he thought of it at all, he must have regarded the recurrence of wars and pestilences as a providential arrangement for the re-adjustment of the conditions of his problem. As a fact, whatever the cause may have been, the population of England during the middle ages did not vary in anything like the proportion in which it has increased since the beginning of the last century; and there is no reason to think that any vast difference existed between the supply and demand of homes for the poor. Still there were many poor; if only the old, the diseased, the widows, and the orphans, are to be counted in the number. There were too, in England, as everywhere else, besides the absolutely helpless, whole classes of labourers and artisans, whose earnings never furnished more than the mere requisites of life; and, besides these, idle and worthless beggars, who preferred the freedom of vagrancy to the restrictions of ill-remunerated labour. All these classes were to be found in town and country alike.

Classes of poor.

494. The care of the really helpless poor was regarded both as a legal and as a religious duty from the very first ages of English Christianity. S. Gregory, in his instruction to Augustine, had reminded him of the duty of a bishop to set apart for the poor a fourth part of the income of his church; and some vestiges of the usage, which does not seem ever to have been generally adopted, are found in the ecclesiastical legislation of the fourteenth century: in 1342 archbishop Stratford ordered that in all cases of appropriation a portion of the tithe should be set apart for the relief of the poor. The neglect of the poor was alleged as one of the crying sins of the alien clergy¹. The legislation of the witenagemotes of Ethelred, although there seems to be no evidence that it was ever carried into effect, bore the same mark; a third portion of the tithe that belonged to the church was to go to God's poor and to the needy ones in thralldom; it was enjoined on all God's servants that they should comfort and feed the poor. Even in the reign of Henry I the king was declared to be the kinsman and advocate of the poor. On such a point it is needless to multiply proof; almsdeeds were always regarded as a religious duty, whether as an act of merit

Religious duty of providing for the poor.

Legislation for the care of the poor.

¹ Johnson, Canons, ii. 364; Rot. Parl. iv. 290.

A duty of the clergy.

Fulfilled by the guilds.

Confiscation of guild property.

Legislation
against begging.

or as an act of gratitude. The dispensation of alms was as a rule left to the clergy, just as the duty of inculcating almsgiving was chiefly left to them. The beneficed clergy in their parishes, the almoners of the monasteries, and the hosts of mendicant friars, to some extent fulfilled the task, and certainly kept the duty of almsgiving prominently before men's eyes. The guilds too, in each of their aspects, whether they were organised for police, for religious, social, or trade purposes, made the performance of this duty a part of their regular work. In the frith-guild of London the remains of the feasts were dealt to the needy for the love of God; the maintenance of the poorer members of the craft was, as in the friendly societies of our own time, one main object in the institution of the craft guilds; and even those later religious guilds, in which the chief object seems at first sight, as in much of the charitable machinery of the present day, to have been the acting of mysteries and the exhibition of pageants, were organised for the relief of distress as well as for conjoint and mutual prayer. It was with this idea that men gave large estates in land to the guilds, which, down to the Reformation, formed an organised administration of relief. The confiscation of the guild property together with that of the hospitals was one of the great wrongs which were perpetrated under Edward VI, and, whatever may have been the results of the stoppage of monastic charity, was one unquestionable cause of the growth of town pauperism. The extant regulations and accounts of the guilds show how this duty was carried into effect; no doubt there was much self-indulgence and display, but there was also effective relief; the charities of the great London companies are a survival of a system which was once in full working in every market town.

Side by side with the organisations for the relief of real poverty must be set the measures for the restraint of idleness and begging. These formed a part of the legislation on labour which was attempted from the middle of the reign of Edward III, and which has been regarded by political economists as one of the great blemishes of medieval administration. The same principle of combination, which had its better side in the charity of the guilds, had, if not its worst, at least its most dangerous side, in the associations of the artisans for the purpose of enforcing a higher rate of wages. The great plague of 1348 caused such a terrible diminution of the population that the land was in danger of falling out of cultivation; labour was extremely scarce, and excessive wages were immediately demanded by those who could work; excessive wages at once produced improvidence and idleness. As early as 1349, in the first ordinance on labour, it was found necessary not only to fix the amount of wages, and to press all able-bodied men into the work of husbandry, but to forbid the giving of alms to sturdy or valiant beggars¹. The quick succession of enactments on this point shows the urgency of the evil and the inadequacy of the remedy sought in the limitation of wages and of the prices of victuals, and in peremptory interference between the employers and the employed. The ordinance of 1349 was followed by the statute of 1351 which, among other enactments, provided a regular machinery by which the excess of wages paid to the labourers could be recovered from them by process before justices assigned for the purpose, the proceeds of these actions being appropriated, where the masters did not sue for them, to the relief of the local contributions towards the national taxes². In 1357 the money so recovered was assigned to the lords of franchises on the understanding that they should contribute to the expenses of the justices³. An almost immediate result of this over-repression was seen in the formation of conspiracies among the carpenters and masons, the flight of labourers from their native counties, and the crowding of the corporate towns with candidates for enfranchisement. All these practices were attacked by the statute of 1362, but ineffectually, as the results showed⁴. The statutes of 1349 and 1351 were confirmed in 1368 on the prayer of the employers of paid labourers, '*la commune que vivent par geynerie de lour terres ou marchandise*⁵,' who have no lordships or villeins to serve them. In almost every parliament petitions were presented for the enforcement labourers.

Statutes of

Statutes and petitions on labour.

¹ Statutes, i. 307. ² Statutes, i. 311, 312. ³ Statutes, i. 350.

⁴ Statutes, i. 375.

⁵ Rot. Parl. ii. 296.

Legislation
on labour.

of the statutes, or for the increase of their stringency; but the chief result was the spread of disaffection and disorder. From the paid artificers the dread of servitude and the desire of combination spread to the villeins, against whose conspiracies for constraining their masters a statute was passed in 1377, and who were thus drawn or driven into participation with the rebellion of 1381, for which at the time they suffered such heavy retribution. Although the events of that year tended to bring the employers to a more just sense of their relation to the employed, petitions every now and then emerge, showing that the lesson had not been completely learned, and from this time the cause of the villein and the artisan is one. Besides the petitions for the enforcement of the statutes, which are presented as late as the year 1482, statutes were passed in 1388, 1427, and 1430 confirming or amending the acts of Edward III¹. As early as 1378 the commons had petitioned that agricultural labourers might not be allowed to be received into towns, there to become artisans, mariners, or clerks; in 1391 occurs the famous petition that villeins may not be allowed to send their children to the schools; in the first parliament of Henry IV the same feeling is displayed in a request that they may no longer be enfranchised by being received into a market town². All attempts however either to compel the artisans to work at husbandry, or to prevent the villeins from becoming artisans, failed; the land went rapidly out of cultivation; pasturage succeeded to tillage; poverty in the labouring class became a growing evil, and the laws against the beggars grew more and more stringent.

Deficiency of labour.

First appearance of a law of settlement.

It is to the legislation of 1388 that England owes her first glimpse apparently of a law of settlement and organised relief. The act by which the statute of labourers was confirmed and amended contained a clause which forbade the labourer to leave his place of service or to move about the country without a passport. Another clause directed that impotent beggars should remain in the places where they were at the passing of the statute, and that, if the people of those places would not provide for them, they were to seek a maintenance in other townships within the hundred or wapentake, or in the places where they were born, within forty days after the proclamation of the statute, there to remain during their lives¹. The same intention appears in the acts of 1495 and 1504, which were no doubt an expansion of the statute of 1388, and which direct that beggars not able to work are to be sent to the place where they were born or have dwelt or are best known, to support themselves by begging within the limits of the hundred². All these acts refer to mendicancy as if it were a recognised profession, in which both pilgrims and poor scholars of the Universities were included, and such as was practised in Germany by both apprentices and students in much later times. It is probable, and indeed certain, that for the poor who remained at home no such legislation was needed: in the towns the guilds, and in the country the lords of the land, the clergy, and the monasteries, discharged the duty, whether on legal or religious grounds, of providing for the settled poor without putting them to unnecessary shame.

¹ Statutes, ii. 63, 233; 244.

² Rot. Parl. iii. 46, 294, 296, 448.

Legislation for vagrant poor.

495. One class of the poor, the villein class, has engrossed almost the whole of the interest which the sympathy of historical students can furnish for the medieval poor; and in our former chapters we have attempted to gather from the extremely obscure statements of legal writers, and in spite of the diversities of local customs, some slight notion of their condition at different periods of our history. We have seen how in Anglo-Saxon times the relation of the landless man to his lord placed him under a protection which was liable to be merged in total dependence, whilst between him and the bondslave there still existed a difference so wide as to be really a difference in kind; and how under the Norman government the differences of rank in the lower classes of the native population were probably confused; the bondman possibly gained, whilst the villein for the time as certainly lost. Both were 'rustici' or 'nativi,' both had land on customary conditions, both were so far 'adscriptitii glebae,' that they could not leave their land without losing their all, or escape from the claims of their

The villeins.

Early
villenage.

¹ Statutes, ii. 58.

² Statutes, ii. 569, 656.

Acts of manumission.

Bondmen on manors.

lord without the risk of being brought again into bondage. There was no doubt a strong tendency to make the servile relation altogether dependent on the tenure of land, and to put an end even to the forms of personal servitude, the disabilities which were attached to the blood as well as to the territorial status of the villein. By acts of emancipation or manumission the 'native' was made a freeman, even though with the disabilities he lost the privileges of maintenance which he could claim on the land of his lord. And acts of emancipation were regarded by the church as meritorious. The old law books drew a distinction between the villein regardant and the villein in gross: the villein regardant was a villein who laboured under disabilities in relation to his lord only; the villein in gross possessed none of the qualities of a freeman. This distinction is now regarded as fallacious, and English sentiment has always been adverse to considering any man of native blood as less than free¹. Until we have a much more thorough investigation of the manorial records than has been yet attempted, no absolutely convincing decision can be arrived at on this point; but it appears certain from known instances that there were, down to the close of the middle ages, and perhaps longer, bondmen on many manors, for whom the definition of villein regardant would not be adequate. Possibly these were the survivors of the peasant population which had been servile before the Conquest; or, possibly they had been depressed by the very definitions of the law which they are found to illustrate. All that is certain is that they were disqualified from all the functions of political life, and were, owing to their depressed social state, the objects of much pity. It is from the acts of manumission that we learn what little we know of their legal status; and some of those acts of manumission are, in language at least, creditable to the age that encouraged them. 'Whereas,' writes bishop Sherborne of Chichester in 1536, quoting the Institutes of Justinian, 'at the beginning nature brought forth all men free, and afterwards

¹ See on the whole subject, Vinogradoff on Villainage, Oxford, 1892; Pollock and Maitland, Hist. of Eng. Law, i. 395 sq.

the law of nations placed certain of them under the yoke of servitude; we believe that it is pious and meritorious towards God to manumit them and to restore them to the benefit of pristine liberty;’ and on this consideration he proceeds to liberate Nicolas Holden, a ‘native and serf,’ who for many years has served him on his manor of Woodmancote and elsewhere, from every chain, servitude, and servile condition, by which he was bound to the bishop and his cathedral church; ‘and, so far as we can,’ he adds, ‘we make him a freeman; so that the said Nicolas, with the whole of the issue to be begotten by him, may remain free, and have power freely to do and exercise all and singular the acts which are competent to free men, just as if he had been begotten by free parents¹.’ All acts of manumission, it is true, are not worded like this; but it is obvious that, in such an act, something more was done than the mere release of the villein from the services that were due by reason of his lord’s right over the land which he occupied, and that the native so emancipated laboured under other disqualifications than those from which he could have delivered himself by obtaining his lord’s leave to quit his holding. On whatever the hold of the lord over his ‘native’ was originally based, there were at the date of the Reformation, and after it, whole families who were liable to be sold as well as to be emancipated. Against this is to be set the fact that the sums for which the villein and his whole family and chattels were transferred from one owner to another were so small as to prove that the rights thus acquired, however heavy the disabilities of the villein may have been, were worth little to the master; and from this it may be inferred that the act of manumission itself was intended rather to prove that the emancipated person was not disqualified for holy orders or for knighthood, than to give him the ordinary powers of a freeman. We may conjecture that the one class of villeins had fallen into villenage by occupying some of the demesne of the lord on servile conditions, and that another was a chattel of

A manu-mission of a bondman.

Importance of manu-mission.

Possible grades of villenage.

¹ From Bishop Sherborne’s Register at Chichester; folio 150. Other forms will be found in Madox, Formulare Anglicanum, pp. 416-420.

the lord whom he paid or maintained by a similar allotment of land; that the former class could not be alienated without the land which they occupied, but were in most other respects free, whilst the latter might be sold from one manor to another, and were by reason of villein blood incapable of most legal acts; that the condition of the former was ameliorated and perhaps altogether made free by the substitution of rents for services from the tenant, and by the institution of copyhold titles, in which the custom of the manor fettered the will of the lord; whilst the lot of the latter remained unimproved, except by separate manumissions, until the country was ashamed of such servitude, and thought it best to forget that it had ever existed. But, as has been already said, the obscurity of the question, and the certain diversities of usage,—the conflict between legal dicta and extant record—prevent us from offering any mere conjecture like this as a possible solution of the difficulty.

No barriers between classes.

496. Whatever theoretical conclusion may be drawn touching the condition of the poor, and there is no occasion that either way it should be exaggerated by false sentiment, there is very little evidence to show that our forefathers, in the middle ranks of life, desired to set any impassable boundary between class and class. The great barons would probably, at any period, have shown a disinclination to admit new men on terms of equality to their own order, but this disinclination was overborne by the royal policy of promoting useful servants, and the baronage was recruited by lawyers, ministers, and warriors, who in the next generation stood as stiffly on their privilege as their companions had ever done. The country knight was always regarded as a member of the noble class, and his position was continually strengthened by intermarriage with the baronage. The city magnate again formed a link between the country squire and the tradesman; and the tradesman and the yeoman were in position and in blood close akin. Even the villein might, by learning a craft, set his foot on the ladder of promotion. But the most certain way to rise was furnished by education. Over against the many grievances which modern thought has alleged against the unlearned ages which passed

Blending of society by intermediate classes.

Education the best means for rising.

before the invention of printing, it ought to be set to the credit of medieval society that clerkship was never despised or made unnecessarily difficult of acquisition. The sneer of Walter Map, who declared that in his days the villeins were attempting to educate their ignoble and degenerate offspring in the liberal arts, proves that even in the twelfth century the way was open.

Richard II rejected the proposition that the villeins should be forbidden to send their children to the schools to learn 'clergie'; and, even at a time when the supply of labour ran so low that no man who was not worth twenty shillings a year in land or rent was allowed to apprentice his child to a craft, a full and liberal exception was made in favour of learning; 'every man or woman'—the words occur in the petition and statute of artificers passed in 1406,—'of what state or condition that he be, shall be free to set their son or daughter to take learning at any school that pleaseth them within the realm¹.' What, it may be asked, was the supply that answered to a demand so large as this? It would be very unfair to underrate the debt which England owes to the statesmen who, after the dissolution of monasteries, obtained in the foundation of grammar schools a permanent, free, and to some extent independent, source of liberal education for the people, or to object to the claim made by that liberal education to have been higher in character and value than anything that had preceded it. Yet it must be remembered that the want which it supplied was one which had been to a great extent created by the destruction of the religious houses and other foundations in which the middle ages had cultivated a modicum of useful learning. In a former chapter attention has been called to the fact that absolutely unlettered ignorance ought not to be alleged against the middle and lower classes of these ages; that in every village reading and writing must have been not unknown accomplishments, even if books and papers were so scarce as to confine these accomplishments practically to the mere uses of business. Schools were by no means uncommon things; there were schools in all cathedrals; monasteries and colleges were every-

Education not restricted by legislation.

Education furnished by the monastic and other schools.

¹ Rot. Parl. iii. 602; Statutes, ii. 158.

where, and wherever there was a monastery or a college there was a school. Towards the close of the middle ages, notwithstanding many causes for depression, there was much vitality in the schools. William of Wykeham at Winchester and Henry VI at Eton set conspicuous examples of reform and improvement; the Lollards taught their doctrines in schools; the schools of the cathedrals continued to flourish. The depression of education was recognised but not acquiesced in. In 1447 four parish priests of London, in a petition to parliament, begged the commons to consider the great number of grammar schools 'that sometime were in diverse parts of the realm beside those that were in London, and how few there be in these days;' there were many learners, they continued, but few teachers; masters rich in money, scholars poor in learning; they asked leave to appoint schoolmasters in their parishes, to be removed at their discretion; and Henry VI granted the petition, subjecting that discretion to the advice of the ordinary¹. Learning had languished, as may be inferred from the fact that the decline of the Universities had only been arrested by the rapid endowment of the new colleges, and that the restriction of the church patronage of the crown to University men had been offered as an inducement to draw men to Oxford and Cambridge. But the great men of the land, ministers and prelates, were devoting themselves and their goods liberally to prevent further decline, and their efforts were not unappreciated in the class they strove to benefit. In this, as in some other matters, it is probable that the invention of printing acted at first somewhat abruptly, and by the very suddenness of change stayed rather than stimulated exertion. Just as men ceased for the moment to write books because the press could multiply the old ones to a bewildering extent, the flood of printing threatened to carry away all the profits of teaching and most of the advantages which superior clerkship had included. It is true the paralysis of literary energy in both cases was short, but it had in both cases the result of giving to the revival that followed it the look of a

Attempts to remedy the depression of education.

First effects of the invention of printing.

¹ Rot. Parl. v. 137.

new beginning. The new learning differed from the old in many important points, but its novelty was mainly apparent in the fact that it sprang to life after the blow under which the old learning had succumbed. So it was with education generally: the new schools for which Colet and Ascham and their successors laboured, and the new schools that Edward VI, Mary and Elizabeth, founded out of the estates of the chantries, were chiefly new in the fact that they replaced a machinery which for the time had lost all energy and power. It is not improbable that the fifteenth century, although its records contain more distinct references to educational activity than those of the fourteenth, had experienced some decline in this point, a decline sufficiently marked to call for an effort to remedy it. But however this may have been, whether the foundation of Winchester and Eton, and the country schools that followed in their wake, was the last spark of an expiring flame, or the first flicker of the newly lighted lamp, the middle ages did not pass away in total darkness in the matter of education; and it was not in mockery that the parliament of Henry IV allowed every man, free or villein, to send his sons and daughters to school wherever he could find one. For anything like higher education the Universities offered abundant facilities and fairly liberal inducements to scholars; every parish priest was bound to instruct his parishioners in a way that would stimulate the desire to learn wherever such a desire existed. Lollardism would have been, if not innocuous, still incapable of anything like secret propagandism, if the faculty of reading had not been widely diffused. But it is impossible now to discuss at any length a subject, the importance of which is at least equalled by its difficulty.

Character
of the educational revival.

Existence of earlier schools.

497. Great facilities for rising from class to class in the social order are not at all inconsistent with very strong class jealousies and antipathies and broad lines of demarcation. So, although we may readily grant that it was not impossible or even rare for the son of a yeoman to reach the highest honours in the church, or for the son of a merchant to reach the highest grade of nobility, it would be wrong to shut our eyes to the Strength of class jealousies.

Clergy and laity.

Landowners and landless.

In the lower classes.

estranging and dividing influences by which interest was set against interest, estate against estate. The relation of the clergy to the laity was, as to some degree it always must be, an obstacle to any perfect identity of class interests. The legal and social immunities which belonged to the former were begrudged and watched jealously by the latter. Between the landowning and landless classes there were similar grounds of division; for, although the actual value of land, as property, was neither so great nor so highly appreciated as in later times, the privileges which the possession of it included were even greater, politically and socially, than they are at the present day. A lower rate of taxation, the possession of the county franchise and of a considerable share of the borough franchise also, the legal protection with which the ownership of land had been guarded from the earliest times, and the strictness of the land-law framed upon feudal ideas, were benefits which were not shared by even the wealthiest of the mercantile classes. The landowner had a stake in the country, a material security for his good behaviour; if he offended against the law or the government, he might forfeit his land; but the land was not lost sight of, and the moral and social claims of the family which had possessed it were not barred by forfeiture. The restoration of the heirs of the dispossessed was an invariable result or condition of every political pacification; and very few estates were alienated from the direct line of inheritance by one forfeiture only. With the merchant, it was not so; if he offended, all his material security was at once swallowed up by the forfeiture; a record might be kept of the profits, but they were not to be recovered; as he had risen, so he fell, unless he had in good time invested some part of his fortune in land. In the lower classes, again, the distinctions of interest in land, and varying views as to the employment of it, caused great heart-burnings and social discontents. As the freeholder engrossed the county franchise, the political divisions in the agricultural class scarcely rose to the level of parliament; but out of parliament they were the causes of much discontent, which found vent in the popular risings, and a welcome sympathy in the social doctrines of Lollardy. The burdens of the copyhold and customary tenures, the heavy heriots and fines, the unpaid services of villenage, the difficulty of obtaining small holdings on fair terms, combined with the equally important questions between tillage and pasturage to divide the agricultural class against itself. The price of wool enhanced the value of pas-Tillage and pasturage.

 torage, the increased value of pasturage withdrew field after field from tillage; the decline of tillage, the depression of the markets, and the monopoly of the wool trade by the staple towns, reduced those country towns which had not encouraged manufacture to such poverty that they were unable to pay their contingent to the revenue, and the regular sum of tenths and fifteenths was reduced by more than a fifth in consequence. The same causes which in the sixteenth century made the inclosure of the commons a most important popular grievance, had begun to set class against class as early as the fourteenth century, although the thinning of the population by the Plague acted to some extent as a corrective. Besides these deeply-seated sources of division, the invidious laws on apparel and sumptuary regulations were small matters of aggravation, which served to bring more prominently before men's eyes the outward marks of inequality.

That these causes were at work during the fifteenth century, as well as those which preceded and followed it, there is no doubt. The great dynastic quarrel gave more prominence to Connexion
of class grievances with the dynastic quarrel.
 local and personal faction than to class distinctions and separations; the great crisis of the constitutional history turned, or seemed to turn, on points rather of dynastic than of social importance. But whilst town and country, clergy, nobles, and commons, were alike divided, house against house, family against family, bishop against bishop, man against wife, we can see in the attempts made by the two rival factions to turn the social divisions to account, that the social divisions were scarcely less deep and wide than they had been in the days of Wat Tyler and Jack Straw. The anti-Lancastrian party in the reign of Henry IV courted the Lollards in and out of parliament; the Lancastrian House fortified itself in the support of the clergy, until the duke of York, by appointing Bouchier to the primacy, divided the camp of the bishops. The Mortimer interest was put forward as an excuse for popular disturbances as well as for court intrigues and political conspiracies, in so much that, even when the duke of York had united in his own person the claims of indefeasible hereditary right and popular championship, the name of Mortimer continued to be the watchword of disaffection. It is true that, like almost everything else but dynastic hatred, the social causes worked with diminished strength in the general attenuation and exhaustion of national vitality. But they certainly subsisted, and exercised a secondary influence, widening, perhaps, and deepening unseen, in preparation for the ages in which they would work with greater intensity and with fewer extrinsic incumbrances. A nation that seems to be perishing takes less heed of the minor causes of ruin, although they may be still acutely felt by individuals and classes of sufferers.

Close of the middle ages.

498. And here our survey, too general and too discursive perhaps to have been wisely attempted, must draw to its close. The historian turns his back on the middle ages with a brighter hope for the future, but not without regrets for what he is leaving. He recognises the law of the progress of this world, in which the evil and debased elements are so closely intermingled with the noble and the beautiful, that, in the assured march of good, much that is noble and beautiful must needs share the fate of the evil and debased. If it were not for the conviction that, however prolific and progressive the evil may have been, the power of good is more progressive and more prolific, the chronicler of a system that seems to be vanishing might lay down his pen with a heavy heart. The most enthusiastic admirer of medieval life must grant that all that was good and great in it was languishing even to death; and the firmest believer in progress must admit that as yet there were few signs of returning health. The sun of the Plantagenets went down in clouds and thick darkness; the coming of the Tudors gave as yet no promise of light; it was 'as the morning spread upon the mountains,' darkest before the dawn.

Marks of a period of transition.

The natural inquiry, how the fifteenth century affected the development of national character, deserves an attempt at an answer; but it can be little more than an attempt; for very little light is thrown upon it by the life and genius of great men. With the exception of Henry V, English history can show throughout the age no man who even aspires to greatness; and the greatness of Henry V is not of a sort that is peculiar to the age or distinctive of a stage of national life. His personal idiosyncrasy was that of a hero in no heroic age. Of the best of the minor workers none rises beyond mediocrity of character or achievement. Bedford was a wise and noble statesman, but his whole career was a hopeless failure. Gloucester's character had no element of greatness at all. Beaufort, by his long life, high rank, wealth, experience and ability, held a position almost unrivalled in Europe, but he was neither successful nor disinterested; fair and honest and enlightened as his policy may have been, neither at the time nor ever since has the world looked upon him as a benefactor; he appears in history as a lesser Wolsey,—a hard sentence perhaps, but one which is justified by the general condition of the world in which the two cardinals had to play their part; Beaufort was the great minister of an expiring system, Wolsey of an age of grand transitions. Among the other clerical administrators of the age, Kemp and Waynflete were faithful, honest, enlightened, but quite unequal to the difficulties of their position; and besides them there are absolutely none that come within even the second class of greatness as useful men. It is the same with the barons; such greatness as there is amongst them,—and the greatness of Warwick is the climax and type of it,—is more conspicuous in evil than in good. In the classes beneath the baronage, as we have them portrayed in the Paston Letters, we see more of violence, chicanery and greed, than of anything else. Faithful attachment to the faction which, from hereditary or personal liking, they have determined to maintain, is the one redeeming feature, and it is one which by itself may produce as much evil as good; that nation is in an evil plight in which the sole redeeming quality is one that owes its exist-

Little light on national character.

No great ministers.

Warwick
the type of baronial greatness.

General decline in literature and religion.

ence to a deadly disease. All else is languishing: literature has reached the lowest depths of dulness; religion, so far as its chief results are traceable, has sunk, on the one hand into a dogma fenced about with walls which its defenders cannot pass either inward or outward, on the other hand into a mere war-cry of the cause of destruction. Between the two lies a narrow borderland of pious and cultivated mysticism, far too fastidious to do much for the world around. Yet here, as everywhere else, the dawn is approaching. Here, as everywhere else, the evil is destroying itself, and the remaining good, lying deep down and having yet to wait long before it reaches the surface, is already striving toward the sunlight that is to come. The good is to come out of the evil; the evil is to compel its own remedy; the good does not spring from it, but is drawn up through it. In the history of nations, as of men, every good and perfect gift is from above; the new life strikes down in the old root; there is no generation from corruption.

Charm of medieval history.

499. So we turn our back on the age of chivalry, of ideal heroism, of picturesque castles and glorious churches and pageants, camps, and tournaments, lovely charity and gallant self-sacrifice, with their dark shadows of dynastic faction, bloody conquest, grievous misgovernance, local tyrannies, plagues and famines unhelped and unaverted, hollowness of pomp, disease and dissolution. The charm which the relics of medieval art have woven around the later middle ages must be resolutely, ruthlessly, broken. The attenuated life of the later middle ages is in thorough discrepancy with the grand conceptions of the earlier times. The thread of national life is not to be broken, but the earlier strands are to be sought out and bound together and strengthened with threefold union for the new work. But it will be a work of time; the forces newly liberated by the shock of the Reformation will not at once cast off the foulness of the strata through which they have passed before they reached the higher air; much will be destroyed that might well have been conserved, and some new growths will be encouraged that ought to have been checked. In the new world, as in the old, the tares are mingled with the

Features of a gradual transition.

wheat. In the destruction and in the growth alike will be seen the great features of difference between the old and the new.

The printing press is an apt emblem or embodiment of the change. Hitherto men have spent their labour on a few books, written by the few for the few, with elaborately chosen material, in consummately beautiful penmanship, painted and emblazoned as if each one were a distinct labour of love, each manuscript unique, precious, the result of most careful individual training, and destined for the complete enjoyment of a reader educated up to the point at which he can appreciate its beauty. Henceforth books are to be common things. For a time the sanctity of the older forms will hang about the printing press; the magnificent volumes of Fust and Colard Mansion will still recall the beauty of the manuscript, and art will lavish its treasures on the embellishment of the libraries of the great. Before long printing will be cheap, and the unique or special beauty of the early presses will have departed; but light will have come into every house, and that which was the luxury of the few will have become the indispensable requisite of every family.

Illustration
from the printing press.

With the multiplication of books comes the rapid extension and awakening of mental activity. As it is with the form so with the matter. The men of the decadence, not less than the men of the renaissance, were giants of learning: they read and assimilated the contents of every known book; down to the very close of the era the able theologian would press into the service of his commentary or his summa every preceding commentary or summa with gigantic labour, and with an acuteness which, notwithstanding that it was ill-trained and misdirected, is in the eyes of the desultory reader of modern times little less than miraculous: the books were rare, but the accomplished scholar had worked through them all. Outside his little world all was comparatively dark. Here too the change was coming. Scholarship was to take a new form; intensity of critical power, devoted to that which was worth criticising, was to be substituted as the characteristic of a learned man for the indiscriminating voracity of the earlier learning. The multi-

Illustration from literature.

Transition
in learning.

plication of books would make such scholarship as that of Vincent of Beauvais, or Thomas Aquinas, or Gerson, or Torquemada, an impossibility. Still there would be giants like Scaliger and Casaubon, men who culled the fair flower of all learning, critical as the new scholars, comprehensive as the old; reserved for the patronage of sovereigns and nations, and perishing when they were neglected like the beautiful books of the early printers. But they are a minor feature in the new picture. The real change is that by which every man comes to be a reader and a thinker; the Bible comes to every family, and each man is priest in his own household. The light is not so brilliant, but it is everywhere, and it shines more and more unto the perfect day. It is a false sentiment that leads men in their admiration of the unquestionable glory of the old culture to undervalue the abundant wealth and growing glory of the new.

Diffusion of light.

Illustration from architecture and mechanical inventions.

The parallel holds good in other matters besides books. He is a rash man who would with one word of apology compare the noble architecture of the middle ages with the mean and commonplace type of building into which by a steady decline our churches, palaces, and streets had sunk at the beginning of the present century. Here too the splendour of the few has been exchanged for the comfort of the many; and, although perhaps in no description of culture has the break between the old and the new been more conspicuous than in this, it may be said that the many are now far more capable of appreciating the beauty which they will try to rival, than ever the few were of comprehending the value of that which they were losing. But it is needless to multiply illustrations of a truth which is exemplified by every new invention: the steam plough and the sewing machine are less picturesque, and call for a less educated eye than that of the ploughman and the sempstress, but they produce more work with less waste of energy; they give more leisure and greater comfort; they call out, in the production and improvement of their mechanism, a higher and more widely-spread culture. And all these things are growing instead of decaying.

Emblems of new growth.

500. To conclude with a few of the commonplaces which must be familiar to all who have approached the study of history with a real desire to understand it, but which are apt to strike the writer more forcibly at the end than at the beginning of his work. However much we may be inclined to set aside the utilitarian plan of studying our subject, it cannot be denied that we must read the origin and development of our Constitutional History chiefly with the hope of educating ourselves into the true reading of its later fortunes, and so train ourselves for a judicial examination of its evidences, a fair and equitable estimate of the rights and wrongs of policy, dynasty, and party. Whether we intend to take the position of a judge or the position of an advocate, it is most necessary that both the critical insight should be cultivated, and the true circumstances of the questions that arise at later stages should be adequately explored. The man who would rightly learn the lesson that the seventeenth century has to teach, must not only know what Charles thought of Cromwell and what Cromwell thought of Charles, but must try to understand the real questions at issue, not by reference to an ideal standard only, but by tracing the historical growth of the circumstances in which those questions arose: he must try to look at them as it might be supposed that the great actors would have looked at them, if Cromwell had succeeded to the burden which Charles inherited, or if Charles had taken up the part of the hero of reform. In such an attitude it is quite unnecessary to exclude party feeling or personal sympathy. Whichever way the sentiment may incline, the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth, is what history would extract from her witnesses: the truth which leaves no pitfalls for unwary advocates, and which is in the end the fairest measure of equity to all. In the reading of that history we have to deal with high-minded men, with zealous enthusiastic parties, of whom it cannot be fairly said that one was less sincere in his belief in his own cause than was the other. They called each other hypocrites and deceivers, for each held his own views so strongly that he could not conceive of the other as sincere. But to us they are both of them true and sincere, whichever way our sympathies

Concluding reflexions on the study of history.

A training for the study of controversial history.

Respect for sincerity on both sides.

Training supplied by study of earlier history.

or our sentiments incline. We bring to the reading of their acts a judgment which has been trained through the Reformation history to see rights and wrongs on both sides, sometimes to see the balance of wrong on that side which we believe, which we know, to be the right. We come to the Reformation history from the reading of the gloomy period to which the present volume has been devoted; a worn-out helpless age, that calls for pity without sympathy, and yet balances weariness with something like regrets. Modern thought is a little prone to eclecticism in history: it can sympathise with puritanism as an effort after freedom, and put out of sight the fact that puritanism was itself a grinding social tyranny, that wrought out its ends by unscrupulous detraction and by the profane handling of things which should have been sacred even to the fanatic if he really believed in the cause for which he raged. There is little real sympathy with the great object, the peculiar creed that was oppressed; as a struggle for liberty the Quarrel of Puritanism takes its stand besides the Quarrel on the Investitures; yet like every other struggle for liberty, it ended in being a struggle for supremacy. On the other hand, the system of Laud and of Charles seems to many minds to contain so much that is good and sacred, that the means by which it was maintained fall into the background. We would not judge between the two theories which have been nursed by the prejudices of ten generations. To one side liberty, to the other law, will continue to outweigh all other considerations of disputed and detailed right or wrong: it is enough for each to look at them as the actors themselves looked at them, or as men look at party questions of their own day, when much of private conviction and personal feeling must be sacrificed to save those broader principles for which only great parties can be made to strive.

Two parties in the reading of later history.

Political dishonesty.

The historian looks with actual pain upon many of these things. Especially in quarrels where religion is concerned, the hollowness of the pretension to political honesty becomes a stumblingblock in the way of fair judgment. We know that no other causes have ever created so great and bitter struggles, have brought into the field, whether of war or controversy, greater and more united armies. Yet no truth is more certain than this, that the real motives of religious action do not work on men in masses; and that the enthusiasm which creates Crusaders, Inquisitors, Hussites, Puritans, is not the result of conviction, but of passion provoked by oppression or resistance, maintained by selfwill, or stimulated by the mere desire of victory. And this is a lesson for all time, and for practical life as well as historical judgment. And on the other hand it is impossible to regard this as an adequate solution of the problem: there must be something, even if it be not religion or liberty, for which men will make so great sacrifices.

The best aspect of an age of controversy must be sought in the lives of the best men, whose honesty carries conviction to the understanding, whilst their zeal kindles the zeal of the many. A study of the lives of such men will lead to the conclusion that, in spite of internecine hostility in act, the real and true leaders had far more in common than they knew of; they struggled, in the dark or in the twilight, against the evil which was there, and which they hated with equal sincerity; they fought for the good which was there, and which really was strengthened by the issue of the strife. Their blows fell at random: men perished in arms against one another whose hearts were set on the same end and aim; and that good end and aim which neither of them had seen clearly was the inheritance they left to their children, made possible and realised not so much by the victory of one as by the truth and self-sacrifice of both.

The lives of the best men illustrate the great lesson of history.

At the close of so long a book, the author may be suffered to moralise. His end will have been gained if he has succeeded in helping to train the judgment of his readers to discern the balance of truth and reality, and, whether they go on to further reading with the aspirations of the advocate or the calmness of the critic, to rest content with nothing less than the attainable maximum of truth, to base their arguments on nothing less sacred than that highest justice which is found in the deepest sympathy with erring and straying men.

INDEX.

- Abbots, appointment of, 329.
 — in parliament, 417, 459 sq.
 Accounts, audit of, 56, 122, 274.
 Adrian IV, pope, 300.
 Alexander III, pope, 302, 312, 353.
 Alfred, proposal to canonise, 133.
 Alienation of land, restrictions on,
 evaded, 571.
 Alien priories, 48, 84, 86.
 Aliens, legislation against, 44.
 — taxation of, 103, 128, 131, 147, 168, 225.
 Appeals to Rome, 360-364.
 Appropriation of grants of money,
 271, 272.
 Armies of Edward IV and Richard
 III, 285-287.
 Array, commissions of, 269, 281, 285-287.
 Arrest, freedom from, 508 sqq.
 Arundel, Thomas, earl of Arundel and Surrey, 16, 52; commands in France, 81; is lord treasurer, 78.
 — Thomas, archbishop of Canterbury, preaches at the accession of Henry IV, 13; discusses Richard's fate, 20; has damages from Walden, 23; restored by a papal act, 25; legislates against the Lollards, 32, 33;
 repels the attack of the knights, 48; urges the king against the Lollards, 48; purges himself, 50; intercedes for Scrope, 52; in parliament of 1406, 55; his hostility to the Beauforts, 61; moves against the Lollards, in convocation, 64; forbids unauthorised translations of the Bible, ib.; chancellor again, 71; displaced, 78; renews the persecution of the Lollards, 79 sqq.; dies, 83; his constitutional speeches, 244, 246.
 Ascough, William, bishop of Salisbury, murdered, 157.
 Assize, justices of, to take cognisance of elections, 264, 265, 437.
 Attainder, bills of, 184, 202, 273, 480.
 Audley, James Touchet, lord, killed at Blore Heath, 184.
 — John Touchet, lord, fails to take Calais, 187; changes sides, 193.
 Aumâle, honour of, 449.
 Bagot, Sir William, 19.
 Banneret, dignity of, 456.
 Bardolf, Thomas, lord, rebels in 1405.
 50; flies to Wales, 59; dies, 64.
 Baronage, importance of, 539.
 Barony, 451 sqq.
 Beauchamp, John, of Holt, created a
 baron, 452.
 Beauforts, legitimised, 59; with a reservation, 61; adhere to the prince of Wales, 61, 68, 69; to Bedford against Gloucester, 97.
 Beaufort, John, marquess of Dorset, degraded, 22; declared loyal, 32;
 refuses to be restored as marquess, 39; at the head of the fleet, 47;
 dies in 1410, 68.
 — Henry, bishop of Lincoln, chancellor, 39; made bishop of Winchester, 49, 59; opposes the marriage of Clarence, 68; chancellor, 78, 86; his loans, 90, 93; resigns the great seal, 91; is chancellor again in 1423, 103; his speech on the elephant, 103; his first quarrel with Gloucester, 104; garrisons the Tower, ib.; sends for Bedford, ib.; defends himself against Gloucester's charges, 196; resigns the seal, 107; goes abroad, 109; made a cardinal, 111; heads the Hussite crusade, 109, 112; attempt to exclude him from council, 114; goes to France, 116; attempt to remove him, ib.; his jewels seized, 117; declared loyal, 118; leads the coun-

- cil after Bedford's death, 125; attacked by Gloucester in 1440, 129; is the king's chief adviser, 135; death, 143; his political character, 143 sq.; the king refuses his treasure, 143; his constitutional speeches, 246.
- Beaufort, Thomas, 59; condemns Scrope and Mowbray, 52; chancellor, 64-69; earl of Dorset, 84; duke of Exeter, 91; charged with the care of Henry VI., 95, 100; dies, 107.
- John, earl of Somerset, 127; commands in France, 128; his expedition, 136; duke of Somerset, ib.; dies, ib.
- Margaret, heiress of Somerset, 136; plan for marrying her to John de la Pole, 139, 152; attainted, 236.
- Edmund, count of Mortain, his early rivalry with the duke of York, 126; marquess of Dorset, 136; at duke Humfrey's arrest, 140; lieutenant in France, 144; made duke of Somerset, 146; loses Normandy, 145, 146; his antagonism to the duke of York, 158; returns from Normandy, and is made constable, 161; petition for his dismissal from court, 163; attacked by the duke of York in 1452, 165; charges against, 169; repeated by the duke of Norfolk, 170; arrested, ib.; released, 175; killed at S. Alban's, 176.
- Henry, duke of Somerset, 176; at war with Warwick, 181; fails to take Calais, 187; is absent from parliament, 193; wins battles at Worksop and Wakefield, 193; escapes after Towton, 196; attainted, 202; pardoned by Edward IV., 204; rejoins Margaret, 205; beheaded, 206.
- Edmund, duke of Somerset, brother, 215; put to death at Tewkesbury, 217.
- Beaumont, John, viscount of, arrests duke Humfrey, 140; killed, 189.
- William, viscount of, attainted, 202.
- Bedford, John of Lancaster, duke of, 59, defeats the rebellion of 1405, 51; constable, 42, 60; made duke, 84; lieutenant of the realm, 87, 88, 91, 92, 94; left guardian of England and France on Henry's death, 94; his character, 97; connexion with the Beauforts, ib.; his position as regent, 100; thwarted by Gloucester, 101 sq.; recalled by Beaufort, 104; his alliance with Gloucester, 105; mediates, 106; undertakes to respect the authority of the council, 108; returns to France, 109; quarrels with Burgundy, 120; returns home to defend himself, ib.; proposes to economise, 122; undertakes to be chief counsellor, 123; dispute with Gloucester, ib.; dies, 124; marriage of his widow, 127; his treatment of the Maid of Orleans, 115.
- Benevolences, 219 sq., 224, 258, 281, 283; abolished, 237 sqq.
- Beverley, constitution of, 602.
- Bishops, in parliament, 458.
- noble, 380, 381.
- prisons of, 359.
- right of appointment of, 303-329.
- fealty and homage of, 302, 304; deposition of, 327; translation of, 316.
- Boniface VIII, pope, his episcopal nominations, 316, 317.
- Boniface IX, pope, 25, 326.
- Bourchier, Thomas, bishop of Ely, made archbishop of Canterbury, 172; proceedings against Pecock, 182; mediates for peace, ib.; welcomes the Yorkist invasion, 187; his conduct with respect to the duke's claim, 190; recognises Edward IV., 195; welcomes him on his return, 216; accepts Richard III as king, 232.
- Henry, viscount, treasurer, 177; dismissed, 181; summoned to parliament and made earl of Essex by Edward IV., 200; treasurer, 220; dies, 227.
- Bracton, quoted, 403, 535.
- Brember, Nicolas, 593.
- Buckingham, Humfrey Stafford, duke of, earl of Stafford, 105; duke, 140; at duke Humfrey's arrest, ib.; half-brother of archbishop Bourchier, 172; is surety for Somerset, 175; his son killed at S. Alban's, 176;

- supports Henry VI, 181; killed at Northampton, 189.
- Buckingham, Henry Stafford, duke of, grandson, 208; steward at Clarence's trial, 222; in the council 227; conspires with Gloucester, 229; declares his claim to the throne, 230; rebels, 233; beheaded, 234.
- Bulls, papal, restraint on, in England, 334.
- Burgage, tenure by, 434.
- Bury St. Edmund's, parliaments at, 140, 400.
- Butler, James, earl of Wiltshire, 173; treasurer, 175; again, 183; executed, 196; attainted, 202.
- Cade, Jack, rebellion of, 155 sqq., 168, 184.
- Cambridge, parliament at, 401.
- Richard, earl of, 84; his plot and fate, 87, 88, 159.
- Canon law, its authority in England, 333.
- Canterbury, primacy of, 303.
- archbishops of—
- Anselm, 303.
 - Ralph, 311.
 - William of Corbeuil, 307.
 - Theobald, 311.
 - Thomas Becket, 302, 312.
 - Stephen Langton, 313.
 - Richard, 313.
 - Edmund, 314.
 - Boniface, 314, 354.
 - Robert Kilwardby, 314.
 - John Peckham, 314, 515.
 - Robert Winchelsey, 315.
 - Walter Reynolds, 322.
 - Simon Mepeham, 323 sq.
 - John Stratford, 324.
 - Thomas Arundel, 326. See Arundel.
 - Roger Walden, 23, 26, 326.
 - Henry Chichele, 85. See Chichele.
 - John Stafford, 117, 136, 148.
 - John Kemp, 167-171. See Kemp.
 - Thomas Bouchier, 172-232. See Bouchier.
- Cantilupe, Walter, bishop of Worcester, 381.
- Thomas, bishop of Hereford, 381.
- Carlisle, parliament of, 321, 338-340, 401.
- Castles, fortification of, 555 sq.
- Chancellor, office of, in the house of Lords, 473.
- Chancellors—
- Thomas Arundel, fourth time, 61; fifth time, 71.
 - Edmund Stafford, 34, 38, 39.
 - John Scarle, 15, 34.
 - Henry Beaufort, 39-49; again, 78; again, 103.
 - Thomas Longley, 49; again, 91, 99.
 - Thomas Beaufort, 64.
 - John Kemp, 107. See Kemp.
 - John Stafford, 117, 136, 148.
 - Richard Neville, earl of Salisbury, 172.
 - Thomas Bouchier, 175-181.
 - William Waynflete, 181, 184.
 - George Neville, bishop of Exeter, 189, 200, 209.
 - Robert Stillington, bishop of Bath, 209.
 - Thomas Rotherham, archbishop of York, 220.
 - John Russell, bishop of Lincoln, 229.
- Chester, palatine earldom of, held by the heir apparent, 447, 529.
- Chichele, Henry, archbishop of Canterbury, not responsible for the French war, 85; opens the parliament of 1422, 99; mediates between Beaufort and Gloucester, 104; again, 105; threatened with the loss of his legation, 309.
- Cinque Ports, representatives of, summoned to parliament, 416, 435, 466, 468.
- Clarence, Lionel, duke of, 448.
- Thomas of Lancaster, duke of, 34; lieutenant of Ireland, 39, 60; marries his uncle's widow, 68; commands an army in alliance with Orleans, 71; made duke, ib.; killed, 93.
- George, duke of, 200; intrigues with Warwick, 209, 210; married to Isabella Neville, 212; joins in Warwick's invasion, 212; pardoned, 213; flies to France, 214; succession settled on him, 215; goes over to Edward, 216; accused

- and attainted, 222; his death, ib.
- Clarendon, constitutions of, 304, 354.
- Sir Roger, 37, 51.
- Clement V, pope, his usurpation of patronage, 322.
- Clement VI, pope, 324.
- Clergy, relation of, to the state, 298 sqq.
- social importance of, 378 sqq.;
- great numbers of, 379; want of unity in, 382; political importance of, 539 sqq.
- parliamentary representation of, 330 sqq.
- benefit of, 355.
- convict, 359.
- Collector, papal, 340.
- Commons, wages of members, 440; numbers of, 463 sq.
- share the legislative power of parliament, 268-270; and the taxative, 270 sq.
- privileges of, 508 sqq.
- debate on all public matters, 267.
- Communa, 579.
- Constable, strained jurisdiction of, 289, 290.
- Constables—
- Henry Percy, 15.
- John of Lancaster, 42.
- Richard Wydville, 208, 290.
- John Tiptoft, 214, 288-290.
- Edmund, duke of Somerset, 161.
- Henry, duke of Buckingham, 232.
- Convocation of the clergy, its relation to parliament, 331 sq.; proceedings in, 479.
- its constitution, 330; royal interference with, 334 sqq.; 349 sq.
- Cornwall, duke of, 448.
- Sir John, 105; made a baron in parliament, 119, 132, 452.
- Coronation of Henry IV, 15.
- Council, privy, vote of confidence in, 56, 255; Fortescue's plan of, 251; president of, 252.
- names of, declared in parliament, 45, 255; wages and oaths, 257, 258; rules for, 258, 259; powers of, defined, 259, 260; petitions in, 261.
- ordaining power of, 260.
- executive power of, 262.
- Councils, provincial, 331 sq. See Convocation.
- limitations of action of, 334.
- County courts, election of knights in, etc., 58, 67, 80, 114, 119, 263-265, 415, 417 sqq.
- Courts, ecclesiastical, jurisdiction of, 352-360; abuses of, 386.
- Coventry, parliament at, 184, 400.
- Creation money, 450, 451.
- Cromwell, Ralph, lord, a councillor in 1422, 101; mediates between Beaufort and Gloucester, 105; removed from the chamberlainship 117; demands a reason in parliament, 118; becomes treasurer, 120; his accounts, 118, 122, 475; resigns in 1443, 136; leads the attack on Suffolk, 149 sqq.; quarrels with the duke of Exeter, 174; with Warwick, 178.
- De la Pole, Michael, restored to the earldom in 1399, 23; his advice on war, 35.
- William, earl of Suffolk, ambassador to France, 136; concludes the marriage treaty of Henry VI, 137; thanked in parliament, ib.; his rapid rise, 138; intends to marry his son to Margaret Beaufort, 139; question of his complicity in the arrest of Gloucester, 141 sq.; duke of Suffolk, 147; his impeachment, trial, and fate, 149 sqq.
- John, duke of, a Yorkist, 186; married to a sister of Edward IV, 227.
- John, earl of Lincoln, son, declared heir to Richard III, 238.
- Demesne, of the crown, proposed under Henry IV, 25, 48. See Resumption, acts of.
- Dispenser, Henry le, bishop of Norwich, reconciled, 32.
- Thomas le, made earl of Gloucester, 16; deprived of the earldom, 22; killed at Bristol, 26; sentence of forfeiture, 32; his widow Constance, 49.
- Devonshire, Thomas Courtenay, earl of, 165, 170; is on the king's side at S. Alban's, 176.
- Thomas Courtenay, earl of, son, 185, 193; executed after Towton, 196; attainted, 202.
- Humfrey Stafford made earl of, by Edward IV, 292; put to death, 213.

Devonshire, Thomas Courtenay, law-ful earl, killed at Tewkesbury, 217.
 Dukes, dignity of, 448, 449, 545.

Earls, creation of, in parliament, 450 sq.

Edward the Confessor, palace of, 397.

Edward, Prince of Wales, son of Henry VI, 169, 174; his right to regency recognised, 172, 179; said to be a changeling, 183; goes to Scotland, 196; killed at Tewkesbury, 217.

Edward IV, as earl of March, 185, 187; wins the battle of Mortimer's Cross, 194; becomes king, 195; history of his reign, 199-225; his death, 225; character, 225 sq.; his reputed marriage with Eleanor Butler, 230.

— V, born, 218; succeeds, 227; his reign, 227-231.

— son of Richard III, prince of Wales, 233; dies, 238.

Elections of knights of the shire, 410, 417 sq.; legislation on, 58, 67, 80, 114, 119, 263 sqq.; contested, 435-438.

— of bishops, 215 sqq.

— of borough representatives, 427 sqq.

Electors of knights of the shire, 58, 67, 80, 114, 119, 263 sqq.

Emperor, Sigismund, 89, 268.

Falty, form of, 532 sqq.

Fleta, 536.

Forest law, clerical offenders against, 355.

Fortescue, Sir John, 199; attainted, 202; taken at Tewkesbury, 217; pardoned, 220; his theory of the English constitution, 247-253; on torture, 288.

France, Henry V's war with, 84 sqq., 275, 276.

Freeholders, political position of, 571 sqq. See Elections and Electors.

Fulford, Baldwin, 187.

Fulthorpe, Sir William, 52.

Gascoigne, Sir William, 52, 78, 79.

Gentry, origin and growth of, 563 sqq.

Gloucester, parliament at, 267, 401.

— Thomas of Woodstock, duke of, his enemies accused, 19-22; his descendants, 173.

— Humfrey of Lancaster, duke of, 59; made duke, 84; lieutenant of the realm in 1420, 92; charge of Henry V to, 95; his character, 97; opposition to the Beauforts, ib.; vicegerent in England, 98; his position settled by parliament, 99, 100; his foreign intrigues and expedition, 101; his first quarrel with Beaufort, 104; his league with Bedford, 105; reconciled with Beaufort, 106, 107; agrees to act by the advice of the council, 108; his power as protector defined, 110; attacks Beaufort again, 112; his protectorate ends, 113; lieutenant during the king's absence, 115; makes a third attack on Beaufort, 116; compromises, 118; defence of lord Cromwell against, 121; dispute with Bedford, 123; his campaign in 1436, 126; bitterly attacks Beaufort in 1440, 129; his wife tried as a witch, 131; his opposition to the peace and to Henry's marriage, 138; his arrest and death, 139, 140-142; trial of his servants, 142.

— Reginald Bowers, abbot of, 163.

Gregory VII, pope, 299; his dealings with William I, 300.

— XI, pope, 325.

Grey, of Ruthyn, Reginald lord, 28, 35, 36, 39; suit of, against Hastings, 552.

— Thomas, marquess of Dorset, 227, 228.

Grosseteste, Robert, bishop of Lincoln, maintains clerical immunities, 354.

Guilds, merchant, 581-585.

— craft, 585 sqq.

— illegal or adulterine, 585.

Hastings, William lord, captain of Calais, 227, 228; beheaded, 228 sq.

Haxey, Thomas, 23.

Henry IV, claims the crown, 12; sketch of his reign, 12-74; his character, 7-9; summary of results, 72-74; relation of his reign to the next, 74.

- Henry V, as prince of Wales, 19; duke of Aquitaine and Lancaster, 23; lieutenant in Wales, 39; crown settled on 46, 58; his friendship with the Beauforts, 60; takes the lead in council, 67; allies himself with Burgundy, 68; attacked in council, 71; his father asked to resign, 70; succeeds, 78; his character, 74-78; sketch of his reign, 78-99.
- Henry VI, birth of, 94; his accession, ib.; sketch of his reign, 94-195; arrested and imprisoned, 207; restored and holds parliament, 214; taken by Edward IV, 216; death and burial, 217.
- Herbert, Sir William, 195; lord Herbert, 200, 209, 210; made earl of Pembroke, 211; put to death, 213.
- Heresy, legislation against, 25, 32, 33, 345, 364, 378; petition on, 65.
- Holland, John, duke of Exeter, degraded, 22; joins in the conspiracy of 1400 and is killed, 26; forfeited, 32.
- John, son of John, restored to the earldom, 89; victorious at sea, 91; duke of Exeter, 289.
- Henry, son of John, duke of Exeter, 174; escapes after Towton, 196; attainted, 202; returns to England, 215.
- Thomas, son of Thomas, duke of Surrey, degraded, 22; conspires and is killed, 26; forfeited, 32.
- Edmund, earl of Kent, brother of Thomas, 49.
- Homage, importance of, 532 sqq.
- of bishops, 296, 302, 304.
- Household, royal, attack on expenses of, 44.
- charges of, separated from the national accounts, 272.
- Howard, John, lord, 227; made duke of Norfolk, 232.
- Hungary, apostolic legation of the kings of, 301.
- Hungerford, Walter, lord, 101; treasurer, 107, 117.
- Robert, lord, 185.
- Robert, lord Moleyns, 185; attainted, 202; beheaded, 206.
- Huntingdon, earls of, see Holland; election at, in 1450, 423; 436.
- Hussite crusade, 109, 112.
- Impeachment, practice of, 273.
- Innocent III, pope, 313.
- IV, pope, 320.
- John XXII, pope, 301, 322.
- Judges summoned to parliament, 404, 406, 461.
- Jurymen, qualification of, 265.
- Keighley, Henry of, 470.
- Kemp, John, bishop of London, chancellor, 107; archbishop of York, ib.; opposes Gloucester, 115; resigns his seal, 117; attacked by Gloucester in 1440, 129; becomes chancellor again, 148; declares the king's sentence on Suffolk, 153; offers a pardon to Cade, 157; opens the parliament of 1450, 162; archbishop of Canterbury, 167; dies, 171.
- Kent, William Neville, earl of, 200.
- King, the, his personal influence and prerogative, 525-539; his presence in parliament, 495, sqq.
- his list, 272.
- Knaresborough, castle of, 18; forest of, 279.
- Knights, wages of, 501; form of writs of summons, 410.
- and squires, as an element in political life, 563 sqq.
- Kyme, Gilbert Umfravile, titular earl of, 68.
- William Taillebois, titular earl of, 150, 206.
- Ladies, not summoned to parliament, 453, 454.
- Lancaster sword, 11.
- Lancaster, Edmund, earl of, 11.
- Thomas, earl of, 211.
- Henry, duke of, 11.
- Lancaster, duchy of, 105, 128, 416, 529 sq.
- Latimer, Thomas, a Lollard, 32.
- Lawyers, not to be knights of the shire, 47, 263, 413.
- Legates from Rome, list of, 307 sq.
- Gualo, 308.
- Pandulf, 308.

- Otho, 308, 320.
 Othobon, 308.
 Guy, bishop of Sabina, 308.
 Peter of Spain, 339.
 Legatine Councils, 332.
 Legation, importance of, 306; acquired by the archbishops of Canterbury, 307, and York, 310.
 — of Wolsey, 309, 332.
 — offered to kings, 301 sq.
 Legislation, initiation of, 477 sqq.
 Leicester, parliament of 1414 at, 83; of 1426 at, 105, 400.
 — constitution of, 601.
 Libel of English policy, 275.
 Lincoln, parliaments of, 400.
 Livery, legislation against, 203, 549 sq.
 Lollards, legislation against, 25, 32 sqq.; influential men among, 32; petition against, 58; action against, 64, 65, 80 sqq.; see Heresy; statute of Leicester against, 83; share in Jack Sharp's rising, 115, 375; execution of, 377.
 London, municipal history of, 587 sqq.
 — election of representatives of, 430.
 Loyalty, sentiment of, 526.
 Lynn, elections at, 431, 439.
- Maintenance, legislation against, 550 sqq.
 Man, lordship of, 447 sq.
 Margaret of Anjou, her marriage, 137; promotes Suffolk, 138; her position after the battle of S. Alban's, 176; her foreign intrigues, 180, 181; flies to Scotland, 190; beats Warwick at S. Alban's, 194; retreats northwards, 195; her weakness and unpopularity, 197, 198; attainted, 202; goes to France, 204; taken prisoner at Tewkesbury, 217.
 Marquess, dignity of, 449, 450.
 Merton, statute of, 336.
 Modus tenendi parlamentum, 445.
 Moleyns, Adam, privy seal and bishop of Chichester; negotiates for peace, 146; is murdered, 141, 142, 150, 154.
 Mortimer, house of, their claim to the crown, 159.
- Mortimer, Edmund, earl of March, son of Roger, passed over in 1399, 10; attempt to seize, 49; in the confidence of Henry V, 87; plot to make him king, 88; a councillor in 1422, 100; plot in favour of, 103; goes to Ireland and dies, ib.
 — Edmund, uncle of the earl, 36, 40, 159.
 — Sir John, execution of, 103.
 — name of, assumed by Jack Sharp, 376; by Jack Cade, 156.
 Morton, John, attainted in 1461, 202; pardoned, 220; master of the rolls, ib.; bishop of Ely, imprisoned, 230; urges Buckingham to rebel, 233.
 Mowbray, John, earl of Nottingham, dies, 17.
 — Thomas, earl marshal, 50; his rebellion and fate, 51 sq.
 — John, earl marshal, a councillor in 1422, 100; made duke of Norfolk, 104.
 — John, duke of Norfolk, allies himself with the Yorkists, 162; accuses Somerset, 169, 170, 174; threatens archbishop Kemp, 171; has licence to go on pilgrimage, 182; swears allegiance to Henry, 185; recognises Edward IV, 195.
- Naples, papal hold upon, 300.
 National character, 633.
 Navy, under Henry V, 90 sq., 275.
 Neville, William, a Lollard, 32.
 — Ralph, lord, earl of Westmoreland, son-in-law of John of Gaunt, 18; advises on war, 35; opposes the Percies, 42, 44, 50 sq.; his fictitious speech in 1414, 85; a councillor in 1424, 100.
 — Ralph, earl of Westmoreland, 185.
 — Richard, earl of Salisbury, at duke Humfrey's arrest, 140; chancellor, 172 sq.; declared loyal, 178; wins the battle of Bloreheath, 184; flies to Calais, ib.; attainted, 185; plans invasion, 187; in parliament, 193; beheaded, ib.
 — John, lord Montague, made earl of Northumberland, 205, 206; marquess of Montague, 214; deserts Edward, ib.; killed at Barnet, 216.

- Neville, George, made bishop of Exeter, 172, 180; chancellor, 189, 194; archbishop of York, 206; removed from the chancery, 209; marries Clarence, 212; Edward surrenders to, 213; restores Henry VI, 214 sq.; makes peace after Barnet, 219.
- John, Lord Neville, on the Lancastrian side, 193; killed at Towton, 196; attainted, 202.
- Northampton, council at, 402.
- parliaments at, 400.
- battle of, 189.
- Northampton, John of, mayor of London, 594.
- Nottingham, parliament at, 401.
- Berkeley, earl of, 232.
- earl of; see Mowbray.
- Oath, of allegiance, 533.
- of councillors, 257.
- Oldcastle, Sir John, 34, 373; his trial and attempt at rebellion, 81-83; his end, 92.
- Owen Glendower, 27, 28, 35 sq.; assisted by France, 53; gives refuge to Percy and Bardolf, 59; his heirs pardoned, 90.
- Oxford, university of, resists archbishop Arundel, 64, 67; scholars of, at war with the county, 278.
- earls of, see Vere.
- Painted chamber, 398, 440.
- Pall, archiepiscopal, its importance, 305 sq.
- Papacy, relations of the crown to, 300.
- Pardons, Henry VI grants too many, 134.
- Parliament, antiquities of, 388 sqq.; Sir Thomas Smith's account of, 484, 495.
- powers of, under Henry VIII, 483.
- annual, petitioned for, 393 sq.
- suspension of, 282.
- place of, 395 sqq.
- prorogation of, 282, 499.
- clerks of, 468.
- the merciless, 402.
- the unlearned, 47, 400.
- of bats, 106, 400.
- Peace and war, discussions in parliament on, 268.
- Pecock, Reginald, bishop of Chichester, 182, 376.
- Peerage, rights of, for life, 454; resignation of, 458; privileges of, 503 sqq.
- Peeresses, trial of, 131.
- Peers, bishops, 106, 458.
- Percy, Henry, earl of Northumberland, is Mattathias, 11; constable of England, 15, 17; takes the votes on Richard's sentence, 20; his advice on war, 35; defeats the Scots, 37; his discontent, 39; submits, 42; his rebellion in 1405, 50; second rebellion and death, 63 sq.
- Henry, Hotspur, son of the earl, has the isle of Anglesey, 15; commands in Wales, 35; his rebellion and death, 41, 42.
- Henry, son of Hotspur, restored to his earldom, 87; a member of council, 100; killed at S. Alban's in 1455, 176.
- Henry, earl of Northumberland, son, 193; killed at Towton, 196; attainted, 202.
- Percy, Henry, earl of Northumberland, son, 232; chamberlain, 234; deserts Richard III, 239.
- Thomas, earl of Worcester, admiral, 15; his rebellion and death, 41, 42; mentioned, 266.
- Thomas, lord Egremont, 150, 189.
- Peter's pence, 346.
- Petition, right of, how treated in council and parliament, 478 sqq.; not to be altered, 84, 269; triers and receivers of, 443-469.
- Poor, condition of, 619 sqq.
- Postal service, 224.
- Praemunientes clause, 330, 407, 417, 462; see Clergy.
- Praemunire, statute of, 341 sq.
- Prerogative of the king, 24.
- Privileges of parliament, 503 sqq.
- Privy seal, keeper of, 252, 259; Richard Clifford, 23; Adam Moleyns, 141.
- Prohibitions, to church assemblies and courts, 335, 337, 353, 358.
- Prorogation of parliament, 498 sq.; long prorogations, 282.
- Protests of lords, 507.

- Provision, papal, to sees, 317 sqq.
 Provisors, statute of, 324, 338.
 Proxies, of peers, 505 sq.
 Purveyance, complaints against, 25.
- Raleigh, William, bishop of Winchester, 316.
 Reading, parliaments at, 167, 400.
 Redesdale, Robin of, 211 sqq.; rioters from, 278.
 Regency, under Henry VI, 99 sqq.
 — during his illness, 171, 178, 179.
 — under Edward V, 228.
 Resumption, acts of, in 1450, 154; re-enacted, 164; in 1456, 179; in 1473, 220; Fortescue's plan for, 251, 272.
 Revenue, refused to Henry IV, 66; granted to Henry V, 90; to Henry VI, 168; to Edward IV, 205; to Richard, 236.
 Richard II, of Bordeaux, his deposition, 13, 14; condemned to imprisonment, 20; question of his fate, 27; his first funeral, ib.; his second, 80; reported to be alive, 41, 61.
 Richard III, as duke of Gloucester, 200; marries Anne Neville, 220; conducts the war with the Scots, 224; his conspiracy, 229; declares himself king, 231; his reign, 232–239.
 Rioters, statutes against, 278.
- S. Alban's, 335.
 — second battle, in 1461, 194.
 Salisbury, parliaments at, 401.
 Salisbury, John Montacute, earl of, accused of the attack on Gloucester, 21; joins in the conspiracy of the earls, and is killed, ib.; forfeited, 32.
 — Richard Neville, earl of. See Neville.
 Sawtre, William, burned, 33; importance of his case, 370.
 Scot and lot, 434 sqq.
 Scrope, Richard le, spared in 1399, 25.
 — William le, son of Richard, earl of Wiltshire, 25.
 — Richard le, archbishop of York, his rebellion and fate, 50–52, 58; offerings to him, 80.
- Scrope, Henry le, lord of Masham, treasurer of England, 78; joins in the Southampton plot, and is put to death, 87, 88.
 Scrope and Grosvenor, law-suit of, 552.
 Sheriff, his precept, 428 sq.
 — of towns and cities, 416, 607.
 Sheriff's tourn, 418.
 Shire, third penny of, 451.
 Shrewsbury, John Talbot, earl of, 105, 167; killed, 168.
 — John Talbot, earl of, treasurer of subsidy, 173; treasurer of England, 181; killed, 189.
 — parliament of, 401.
 Sicily, monarchy of, 302.
 Speakers of the house of commons—
 Peter de la Mare, 470.
 Thomas Hungerford, 470.
 John Cheyne, 18, 55, 471.
 John Doreward, 19, 471.
 Arnold Savage, 29, 43, 55, 57, 245, 266.
 William Esturmy, 48.
 John Tibetot, 54.
 Thomas Chaucer, 62, 65, 68, 93, 266.
 Roger Flower, 92.
 Richard Banyard, 94.
 John Russell, 102, 117.
 Thomas Wauton, 103.
 Richard Vernon, 106.
 John Tyrell, 109, 116, 127.
 Roger Hunt, 93, 120.
 John Bowes, 125.
 William Tresham, 128, 131, 140.
 William Burley, 137.
 John Say, 147.
 John Popham, 148.
 William Oldhall, 163, 168, 185.
 Thomas Thorpe, 168, 169, 266, 471.
 Thomas Charlton, 171.
 John Wenlock, 178, 185.
 Thomas Tresham, 184.
 John Green, 190.
 James Strangeways, 200.
 William Alyngton, 113, 219, 222.
 John Wood, 224.
 William Catesby, 235.
 — election and protest of, 470 sqq.
 Stanley, Thomas, lord, petition for attainder of, 185; steward of Edward IV, 227; step-father of Henry

- Tudor, 239; constable, 234; joins Henry at Bosworth, 239.
 Stanley, Sir William, 234, 239.
 Statutes, of Merton, 336, 418.
 — de religiosis, 343.
 — of Carlisle, 339, 340.
 — of provisors, 309, 324.
 — of præmunire, 341 sq., 363.
 — de haeretico, 33, 369.
 Succession, acts settling the, 46, 58, 215, 528.
 Tallies, 398.
 Taxation, of the spirituals, 349 sqq.;
 of the stipendiary clergy, 271.
 — terms of the grant of, express the action of the commons, 270, 476.
 — by the popes, 346.
 Taxes of 1399, 23.
 — of 1401, 33.
 — of 1402, 38.
 — of 1404, 46.
 — of 1406, 58.
 — of 1407, 62.
 — of 1410, 66.
 — of 1411, 69.
 — of 1413, 80.
 — of 1414, 86.
 — of 1415, 88.
 — of 1416, 90.
 — of 1417, 92.
 — of 1419, 92.
 — of 1421, 94.
 — of 1422, 101.
 — of 1423, 102.
 — of 1425, 103.
 — of 1426, 107.
 — of 1427, 110.
 — of 1429, 114.
 — of 1431, 116.
 — of 1432, 119.
 — of 1433, 122.
 — of 1435, 125 sq.
 — of 1437, 127.
 — of 1439, 128.
 — of 1442, 131.
 — of 1445, 1446, 137.
 — of 1449, 147.
 — of 1450, 154.
 — of 1453, 168.
 — of 1463, 205.
 — of 1465, 205.
 — of 1468, 210.
 — of 1473, 219.
 — of 1474, 220.
 Taxes of 1478, 223.
 — of 1483, 225.
 — of 1484, 236.
 Temporalities, restitution of, 304;
 usurped by the popes, 317, 318.
 Terms, law, 392 sq.
 Testamentary causes, jurisdiction in,
 336, 356.
 Thirning, Sir William, 10, 13, 29, 30, 462.
 Tiptoft, John, a councillor in 1422,
 101; steward of the household, 117; resigns, ib.
 — John, son, earl of Worcester, treasurer, 167, 170, 173; beheaded, 214; his cruelties as constable, 288 sqq.
 Tithes, suits touching, 344, 353.
 — of underwood, 336.
 — of personalty, 352.
 Torture, practice of, 288, 289.
 Towns, elections of representatives in, 429 sqq.
 — later constitutional history of, 577
sqq.; made counties, 607.
 Treason, legislation on, 24, 535 sqq.
 — constructive, 290.
 — laws against, 535 sqq.
 Treasurers—
 John Northbury, 15, 34.
 Lawrence Allerthorpe, 34.
 Lord Roos, 43.
 Henry le Scrope, 64.
 Thomas, earl of Arundel, 78.
 John Stafford, 107.
 Walter, lord Hungerford, 107, 117.
 John le Scrope, 117.
 Ralph, lord Cromwell, 120.
 Ralph Boteler, lord Sudeley, 136.
 Marmaduke Lumley, 139, 148.
 Lord Say and Sele, 148, 155.
 Lord Beauchamp, 155.
 John Tiptoft, earl of Worcester,
 167.
 James Butler, earl of Wiltshire,
 175; again, 183.
 Henry, viscount Bouchier, 177;
 again, 195, 220.
 John Talbot, earl of Shrewsbury, 181.
 Richard Wydville, lord Rivers, 208.
 Treasurers of war, 46, 48, 55, 56.

- Trussell, Sir William, proctor for the parliament of 1327, 461, 470.
- Tudor, Edmund, 133.
- Jasper, 133; earl of Pembroke, 176, 194; attainted, 202; defeated and deprived of his earldom, 211.
- Henry, earl of Richmond, 221; negotiation for his marriage with Elizabeth of York, 233; lands at Milford Haven, 239; wins the crown at Bosworth, 239.
- Tunnage and poundage, properly applied to the maintenance of the navy, 250, 271. See Taxes.
- for life, granted to Henry V, Henry VI, and Edward IV, 88, 168, 205; to Richard III, 236.
- Urban II, pope, 301.
- VI, pope, 325, 338.
- Vere, John de, earl of Oxford, put to death, 204; by law of Padua, 290.
- John, earl of Oxford, seizes St. Michael's mount, 218; assists Henry Tudor in his attack on Richard, 239.
- Villenage, later history of, 623 sqq.
- Viscount, dignity of, 451.
- Voting in parliament, 492.
- Wages of members of parliament, 57, 440, 501 sq.
- Wakefield, battle of, 193.
- Wales, prince of, in parliament, 447.
- represented in the English parliaments, 463, 488.
- Warwick, Thomas Beauchamp, earl of, attempts to deny his confession of treason, 20; restored, 23.
- Richard Beauchamp, earl of, quarrels with the earl Marshall, in 1405, 50; left by Henry V as preceptor to his son, 94, 100; his quarrel with the earl Marshall, 104; instructions as Henry's tutor, 111; regent of France, 127; dies, ib.
- Henry, duke of, 449.
- Richard Neville, earl of, 166; captain of Calais, 177; again, 182; wins the battle of Northampton, 189; in parliament, 193; is beaten at S. Alban's, 194; joins in making Edward king, 195; his disgust at Edward's marriage, 206; plans a marriage for his daughter with Clarence, 208; suspected of treason, 209; connives at the rebellion of Robin of Redesdale, 212; goes to Calais, ib.; makes terms with Edward, 213; connives at the rising in Lincolnshire and flies to France, 214; lands and restores Henry, ib.; killed at Barnet, 216; his character, 218.
- Welles, Sir Robert, his rebellion and death, 213 sq.
- Leo, lord, attainted, 202.
- Westminster, palace of, 395 sqq.; chapter-house of, 398 sq., 444 sq.
- Wight, lordship of, 448.
- Winchester, parliaments at, 400.
- Worcester, constitution of, 601.
- Writs, of circumspecte agatis, 358.
- significavit, 357, 365, 369.
- de excommunicato capiendo, 370.
- de haeretico, 369 sq.
- of summons, variety of forms, 403 sqq.; sealing of, 401.
- Wycliffe, John, importance of the legal proceedings against, 365 sqq.
- Wydeville, Richard, lord Rivers, constable, 155, 187; Edward IV marries his daughter, 206; rivalry of his family with the Nevilles, 207; promotion of his children, 208; treasurer and constable, ib.; reconciled with Warwick, 210; beheaded, 213.
- John, married to the duchess of Norfolk, 208; put to death, 213.
- Antony, lord Scales, 208, 211; earl Rivers, 226; arrested, 228; executed, 231.
- Richard, 211, 226.
- Edward, 226, 228.
- Wykeham, William of, bishop of Winchester, dies, 49.
- Yeomanry, condition and political importance of, 570 sqq.
- Yonge, Thomas, member for Bristol, proposes to declare the duke of York heir to the throne, 163 sq., 511.
- York, Edmund of Langley, duke of, joins in the judgment on Richard, 20.
- York, Edward, duke of, son of Edmund; a possible competitor for

- the crown, 10; accused by Bagot, 19; reduced in rank, 22; betrays the conspiracy of the earls, 26; declared loyal, 32; advises on the war, 35; duke of York, 45, 49; accused by his sister, ib.; killed, 91.
- York, Richard, duke of, 87; Gloucester administers the Mortimer estates for, 104; declared of age, 119; regent of France, 126; again, 128; his rivalry with the Beauforts, 135, 158; his suspected complicity with Cade, 161; his early career, 157 sq.; and claims to the crown, 158, 159; visits Henry VI, after Cade's rebellion, 161; influences the elections, 162; proposal to declare him heir, 164; marches against the king in 1452, 165; reconciled, 157; has the speaker Thorpe arrested, 169; summoned to council, ib.; opens parliament, 170; chosen protector, 171 sq.; his administration, 174; dismissed, 175; wins the battle of S. Alban's, 176; high constable, 178; his second protectorate, 178, 179; is reconciled with the queen, 182; goes to Ireland, 184; attainted, 184; plans invasion, 187; returns, 190; claims the throne, ib.; accepts the succession, 191, 192; killed at Wakefield, 193.
- parliaments at, 399.
- Yorkshire, elections in, 424 sq.; lordships in, 547.

THE END.

